The London tourist board then makes some proposals for dealing with the problem, including the licensing of ticket agencies and the need to make it a legal requirement to inform the customer at the moment of purchase of the face value of the ticket. In that way, a customer will be able to make an informed choice and will be aware whether he is being ripped off. It also suggests that the touting of tickets outside major events should be unlawful; Wimbledon is an obvious example.

Touting is damaging our reputation as a tourist centre and may therefore make it difficult for us to attract tourists. The London tourist board believes that more regulation is necessary to tackle that problem. I have not had a chance to consider the implications of the proposals with those in the tourist industry and I am not advocating that such regulation is, necessarily, the right solution. It is clear, however, that if we do not take steps to enforce proper standards and to stop the gross exploitation of tourists and others by touts, our reputation will be damaged. That cannot be in the best interests of our tourist industry. A balance must be struck. We need regulations to prevent abuse and to protect public safety, but they must be sensible and they must encourage initiative. They should not damage the tourist industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) was right to stress that transport is critical to tourism in London. While people cannot travel around London comfortably, with reasonable confidence that they will get to their destination on time and that they will benefit from a service that is reliable and frequent, the London tourist industry, will inevitably be harmed.

I represent Greenwich, which is one of London's main tourist attractions, and I am only too well aware of the damage caused to it by inadequate transport links with the rest of London. Network SouthEast is a joke. The recent reduction in services on a Sunday, from two trains an hour, which was already inadequate, to one, will have a deplorable impact on an area which needs to attract more tourists to its considerable number of exhibitions and historic buildings and sites.

It is of fundamental importance that the quality of the existing rail services must be improved to assist Greenwich. We also need new rail services. We are still waiting for the promised Jubilee line extension. I wish that I could have received a pound for every time that Ministers have relaunched that project. Those of us who attended the debates on it would now be extremely rich, because that extension has been promised many times. When it is built, it will be the first tube link to Greenwich and it is long overdue.

The riverbus service has been clinging on by its fingernails for the past couple of years and the prospect of bankruptcy has hovered over it too many times. A reliable and regular river transport service will be an important feature in making London a more attractive environment for tourists in the 21st century.

What is needed for all transport is not deregulation but investment. The supposed competition that will flow from the privatisation of the railway services will not improve the rail service to Greenwich. That can be done only by investment in long-overdue new rolling stock and more reliable, regular services.

The riverbus service must also receive more investment to prevent its closure which would be a disaster for those who rely on it and would also damage London's overall transport network.

We need not deregulation, but investment in improved transport services. We must also ensure that our transport policies improve the environment for Londoners and tourists. One of the biggest problems that we face in Greenwich is the excessive volume of traffic that passes through an area that was never designed to cope with it. Greenwich and its residents are now under serious threat because of that traffic and the pollution that it causes.

We are urgently seeking a ban on heavy goods vehicles through our historic town centre and I hope that it will be in place before too long. If the Minister is keen to promote transport policies that will enable tourism to flourish in London, I hope that he will say a few words to his colleagues in the Department of Transport about the importance of measures that will make major tourist attractions like Greenwich a more pleasant environment for people to visit. Such policies will also avoid the risk of tourists suffering the risk of injury or death at the hands of 40-tonne lorries coming through the centre of an historic town which was never designed for that volume of heavy traffic. That measure could begin the process. We need more positive transport policies to improve the quality and appearance of tourist sites in London such as Greenwich.

One hon. Member suggested that local authorities were not always helpful in promoting tourism. The local authority in my constituency has been exceptionally keen to encourage and promote tourism and is doing its best to ensure that Greenwich becomes an even more important tourist attraction than it already is. However, it is hampered in one respect. It is a technical point, but I hope that the Minister will speak to his colleagues in the

[Mr. Raynsford]

Department of the Environment about it. It concerns the standard spending assessment provision for local government finance relating to tourism. Local authorities incur expenditure to promote tourism and cope with the consequences. This includes additional street cleansing, parks maintenance, traffic management and tourist information, which all cost money and should be provided for. However, the current formula is based entirely on the number of people who stay overnight in hotels, rather than on the number of day visitors. That is desperately unfair to the many tourist areas that attract large numbers of day visitors but do not have a large network of hotels and thus have a small number of overnight stays.

In Greenwich, we estimate that in 1991—the last year for which figures are available, because they were based on a survey rather than on regular monitoring, which reduces paperwork—the number of overnight stays represented just 7 per cent. of total tourist visits to the area. Those who know Greenwich will know that, because it is frequently visited by tourists who take a boat down the river or come by other means of transport to see the fine sights and tourist attractions, it is severely penalised by the SSA formula. Ironically, areas of London with a larger hotel network get the advantage of much more substantial expenditure in the form of hotel bills and the cost of meals, which are the most expensive items in tourists' total outgoings. Based on the 1991 survey of tourists coming to Greenwich, we estimate that tourists spend on average £9·59 a day, which is a small sum compared to the huge amounts spent by tourists staying in central London.

Authorities for which the SSA does not adequately reflect the need to cope with a considerable number of tourists, and which have the added disadvantage of not getting the financial benefit of tourists staying in the area, rightly feel aggrieved. I hope that the Department of the Environment, which is currently conducting a review of standard spending assessments, will reconsider the formula so that it reflects more accurately the pattern and cost of tourism, not just the number of overnight stays. I hope that the Minister will put in a good word with the Department of the Environment, as that issue concerns not only Greenwich but many other tourist areas with the phenomenon of a disproportionate number of day visitors to overnight stays.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde highlighted another issue relating to regulation in his opening speech from the Front Bench. It is an issue in which I have a constituency interest and it involved the collapse of the SFV Holidays travel company, and the problems encountered by people who booked holidays with it in the absence of bonding arrangements.

From the evidence that I have received, it appears that the DTI played a crucial role in giving guidance to SFV that, in the circumstances, the company did not have to comply with the bonding regulation. If that is true, the DTI has done no service to the many people who booked holidays with that company and lost substantial sums of money. One of my constituents lost more than £2,000 and his holiday as a result of booking with SFV. He rightly feels extremely aggrieved that the company, apparently on advice of the DTI, had no bonding arrangements in place to cover the eventuality.

That example emphasises the fact that we cannot be too relaxed about regulation. If we do not have appropriate regulations, which can be made to stick, some companies will always try to evade the provisions and, as a result, operate without proper safeguards. It is often just such companies which fail and, when they do so, innocent people suffer serious financial losses and have every right to feel aggrieved, not just about the treatment that they have received from the company, but about the British Government's failure to provide proper protection.

Tourism is crucial to Britain's economy, and there is considerable scope for growth in that industry, in terms of both internal tourism and the attraction of tourism from overseas. We need to encourage and support the tourist industry and to take measures to make it possible for all those involved to operate more effectively. The Government must give a lead and take more positive action. They should ensure that there is necessary infrastructure and investment, where necessary, to help tourism. They should be stamping out damaging practices such as touting and ensuring that regulation exists, where needed, to ensure high standards and public safety. They should look to change regulation where it is foolish and unnecessary.

Above all, our concern should be not with ideology and slogans, but with the promotion of tourism in Britain as a fundamental element in our economy. We should do everything that we can to put Britain back at the top of the league of international tourism.

1.32 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I am delighted to have the opportunity to participate in today's important debate on tourism and deregulation. We have heard precious little from the Labour Members present on the subject of deregulation. In some cases, they seemed to be proposing more regulations. It is not so much that they do not want to participate in the bonfire of regulations, but that they want to produce a regulation to supervise the bonfire. That is hardly surprising, as one does not have to scratch the surface very deeply to find the old Labour party which wants to control the lives of ordinary people and regulate for the sake of it.

I have a personal dream that one day in the not-too-distant future there will be a heritage theme park in London that is easily accessible to visitors and which is based on the history of the British Labour party. It will be populated with life-size working models of old Labour politicians—a sort of Jurassic park of the Labour party. It would be a tremendous tourism attraction—[Interruption.] I can hear some trumpeting from the dinosaurs opposite.

To be serious, I am not opposed to Government regulations, where appropriate. I would go so far as to say that I am opposed to deregulation when it leads to anomalies and problems for businesses. As my hon. Friend the Minister stressed, it is always a matter of judgment, although the burden of proof should always be on those who want more, rather than less, regulation.

Hon. Members have been good enough to refer to my Adjournment debate earlier this year on the use classes order. Relaxation of the regulations in that area of planning law may cause damage to the environment in various seaside resorts and other parts of the country, even though the Department of the Environment seems to regard this as its contribution to deregulation—in which view it is sorely mistaken. In essence, the change came about because the 1987 regulations lump together hotels and hostels in the same use class, so planning permission is no longer required to change the use from a hotel to a hostel.

No one is trying to deny the rights of those who want or have to live in hostels for various reasons, but there must be proper planning zones in these towns. The heart of a town's economy, if it is tourism, must be preserved; and the whole process should brought within planning regulations, or there will always be the danger that has been realised in some towns—not, I am pleased to say, in Eastbourne so far—of a downward spiral of noise, nuisance, petty crime and even violence.

I am particularly grateful for the efforts of the Eastbourne Hotels Association, which has done a great deal to preserve the character of the town as a seaside tourist resort and has tried to resist some of the worst effects of this ill-conceived stroke of the legal draftsman's pen. I am indebted to Mr. Edward Lewis, chairman of the association, for giving me some of the examples to which I will refer later.

The Minister will know that later this month I shall be accompanying a delegation from the Eastbourne Hotels Association to see him to discuss some of these subjects.

Let us move on from poor deregulation to poor regulations. I have said that I recognise the importance of Government regulations where appropriate. In some circumstances, the Government have a positive duty to regulate, but only if the regulations comply with certain criteria. First, their drafting must identify a specific problem or risk. Secondly, they must be accurately and clearly drafted. Thirdly, they must be a proportionate response to the risk with which they are supposed to deal. Finally, there must be no alternative course of action that the Government can take in the circumstances.

When these criteria are applied to certain regulations affecting the tourist industry, they provide examples of the nanny state's ability to scold and cajole in every aspect of our lives. To quote a letter from Mr. Lewis:

"The amount of bureaucracy has increased, mainly, it appears, as a result of initiatives emanating from the European Community, but often compounded . . . by more rigorous application by our own Government and, similarly, it appears that British authorities are applying the EC regulations in a stricter fashion than the authorities in other EC countries."

I join other hon. Members in commending my hon. Friend's initiative, announced on 14 June, to reduce bureaucracy and over-regulation. It has not surprised me in the least to learn that he has been almost overwhelmed with representations. We have heard something about the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1990. I have to admit that I am not averse to a bit of cheese. Finely presented on an attractive cheeseboard, it can be the highlight of a delicious meal, but I draw the line at hard Brie and Camembert with the consistency of an ice hockey puck. Soft cheese is supposed to be soft cheese, but one would not think so looking at the 1990 regulations, which require that all relevant food, including such cheeses, can be displayed at catering premises for up to only four hours "where such display is for the purpose of service to a purchaser for consumption on those premises".

In short, the cheeseboard has a life of four hours. What nonsense! Although I acknowledge the concerns about listeria, judging by what I have read, the regulation is disproportionate to the risk. In my grandfather's day the Stilton was kept for days, if not weeks, as more port was added to mature the cheese. He, like the cheese, lived to a ripe old age.

Then there are requirements upon hotels to keep record cards and registers. We have heard about that. The Immigration (Hotel Records) Order 1972 requires everyone over the age of 16 to register his name and nationality at the hotel. Those records must be kept for 12 months and be available for inspection by any police constable or any other person authorised by the Secretary of State. I have yet to find an hotelier in my constituency who can recall anyone authorised, or for that matter unauthorised, who has ever asked to see those records. It is absurd to restrict that duty to hotels or guest houses if it serves a purpose of keeping track of the movements of foreign visitors. It is yet another unnecessary bureaucratic burden on hotel owners and operators.

Not only visitors have to be logged in and logged out of hotels; items of food must be recorded and a history produced. That record of movements must be kept so that one can trace the journey of a lamb chop not only into the premises but into the freezer, out of it, into the refrigerator and on to the plate. It is another nightmare of records and log books for the small hotel keeper to contend with. The Food Safety Act 1990 requires individual itemised records of each item of food that is placed in the freezer, the checking of temperatures of fridges and freezers three times a day and the maintaining yet again of copious records. Even that is not the end of the story because when the food is ultimately thrown out—presumably after four hours if it happens to be cheese—precise records have to be kept of the rubbish collection.

The Environmental Protection Act 1990 requires the filling of forms and the monitoring of waste collected from a hotel and it must be individually itemised, dustbin by dustbin, bag by bag, together with an assessment of the credentials of those collecting the waste from the hotel. That imposes enormous additional paperwork on the poor hotel keeper and, of course, it is all rigorously, if not ruthlessly, supervised by the food gestapo.

Then there is the hotel that tries to help parents by providing some entertainment for children so that the parents can take a break and go off to do something on their own. We could include in that category people such as the Butlin redcoats and that frequent resident of the kiddies' corner in McDonald restaurants, Ronald McDonald. Those people appear to be caught by the provisions of the Children Act 1989 which states that persons who provide any form of activity supervised by a responsible person, whether or not on a regular basis on non-domestic premises, for children under the age of eight years, must be registered as child minders. Give him a group of seven-year-olds and poor old Ronald loses his sense of fun. The additional requirement is that to be a child minder the person must perform the act for reward and must do so for more than two hours each day. I assume that Ronald McDonald does not provide his services free. Even he gets paid, as do the redcoats.

Perhaps even Father Christmas gets caught. Imagine the scene in the weeks leading up to Christmas. Children are left by their parents with Father Christmas, perhaps while the parents go to buy the very Christmas presents that the children are whispering, or seeking to whisper, into Father Christmas's ear. To the child seated on his knee Father Christmas asks, "How old are you, young man?" The child answers, "Seven, Mister." Christmas spirit rapidly evaporates as Father Christmas says, "Well, I am afraid that pursuant to section 71 of the Children Act 1989 you will have to get off my knee." Those are all absurd examples, but they all add to the cost of running British tourist and leisure industries.

The Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations 1988 also impose great burdens on my constituents. We have also heard about the Electricity at Work Regulations 1989, which seem to impose the most bizarre, complex and expensive requirements on hotel owners in my constituency and those of other hon. Members. There is also the issue of notices. When one enters a hotel reception lobby, one wants to see a welcoming notice or two, possibly something about the fire regulations or where to park one's car.

The difficulty is that one is now met with a panoply of different notices. There is the Tourism (Sleeping Accommodation Price Display) Order 1977, the Price Marking (Food and Drink on Premises) Order 1979, the Price Indications (Method of Payment) Regulations 1991, the Price Indications (Bureau de Change) Regulations—I could go on and on. All that means a proliferation of notices, which almost blots out the welcome of the receptionist. On top of that, there are the bizarre requirements of the Food Labelling (Amendment) Regulations 1989, notifying the alcoholic strength of drinks sold. I do not know what others in the Chamber today think, but that is not the sort of notice that I immediately seek out when I am ordering a drink in my favourite pub.

I ask the Minister to review, as soon as possible, the requirement—placed on all hotels and guest houses offering services to tourists—to establish bonding arrangements. I am glad that that point has already been raised. As we have heard from more than one hon. Member, the new EC directive imposes a sharp increase in overheads if a hotel includes within its prices golf or tennis lessons or tournaments. Such additional services can mean that the hotel is said to be providing a package. At a time when the British tourist industry is developing leisure and entertainment packages as an answer to the sunseeker-type holiday abroad, the regulations distort the market. The situation with package holidays abroad is quite different. Going abroad means that the tourist is subject to the vagaries of airlines, ferries, foreign hotels and so on. In those cases, I accept the argument for bonding.

My hoteliers in Eastbourne, and others elsewhere, do not need to be told how to look after their guests, to make them comfortable, safe and happy. They will provide them with hygienic food properly prepared in pleasant surroundings. Eastbourne provides a warm and hospitable welcome all year round and we are looking forward to welcoming my hon. Friend the Minister there at some time.

The wind of deregulation is blowing strongly. It is encouraged by the Prime Minister, and my hon. Friend the Minister is already performing tremendous tasks. The post-Maastricht mood here and throughout the Community is in favour of deregulation and abolishing unnecessary bureaucracy. Regulations are fine as long as they benefit the consumer. The unnecessary regulation, whether in Britain or in mainland Europe, is nothing less than a curse to the consumer. This has been a timely debate and I have every confidence that my hon. Friend the Minister is the right man to be carrying the cause of deregulation forward.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I do not think that I am a pervert because I happen to prefer my Camembert and Brie cold out of the fridge. It is still a soft cheese in comparison with Cheddar and one can still get the taste of it—[HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] Well, it is obviously a matter of taste. Clearly we shall not agree, but I refuse to back off because I prefer my cheese cold rather than oozing towards me like a glutinous threatening blob. However, enough about Tory Members.

The significance of tourism to the economy of London is undisputed. It is estimated to have earned the capital city about £4·4 billion in 1991—£3·6 billion having been spent by overseas visitors and £720 million by British citizens. London receives enormous benefits from visitors, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) said, even with the slightly declining number of 16 million, a lot of people come into the capital city annually.

Although that volume of tourists is welcome, it exerts enormous pressure on the centre of London in particular. That may be fun if one is a young and fit student backpacker from Germany or France, milling about on Victoria or Westminster station, but not if one is frail or a commuter trying to get to work—if one is lucky enough to have a job in the capital after 14 years of Conservative government. There are continuing incidents of friction between large parties of tourists and commuters on inadequate concourses and in ticketing areas on the London Underground and at British Rail's main stations.

It is great that large numbers of people still want to visit London, but we must do more to make them welcome and to help them get as much from their visit as they can so that they will want to return again and again.

The Minister made great play of the question of regulations and offered a whole series of anecdotes. He said that they were not amusing, but he played them for all that he could and raised laughs from Conservative Members. As I pointed out before, many of those regulations, if not all, were passed or left on the statute book by previous Conservative Governments—but also, I accept, by other Governments.

New regulations from Brussels have been agreed by British Ministers, so it is no use their blaming the Commission. British Ministers connived in those regulations, so, although the Minister may not take personal responsibility for them, he cannot detach himself entirely from the Government's actions. When the Government have constructed or helped to construct regulations, they cannot seek to win cheap cheers from their own supporters by attacking those measures.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich said, the right balance must be struck. Total deregulation would be even worse than total regulation. Neither is desirable, but we want to stop tourists being ripped off in London and elsewhere. There must be sensible regulations on quality and standards.

It has been said that London hotels are among the most expensive in the world. The Minister spoke of the high cost of staying in a London hotel, as if that could all be blamed on regulation. That is nonsense. At worst, regulations impose inconvenience and a marginal cost element. If one asks hoteliers about the real reason for prices being forced up, they will cite value added tax, the business rate and all the other charges that licensing authorities, at the behest or connivance of Government, require hoteliers to make. It is nonsense for the Minister and Conservative Members to argue that high costs are all down to regulation and that abolishing all regulations will produce cheaper hotel stays in London and elsewhere. In London, a balance must be struck between the needs of tourists and those of residents and the desirability of protecting both categories.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) referred to the high cost of London's public transport. We have the highest urban fares in the world, but we do not have the best transport system. The service is poor, and bus deregulation is a nonsensical concept which ought to be scrapped. It has all to do with ideology, not with the needs of London's residents or visitors. A lousy transport system for London affects us all.

I do not approve of museum and art gallery charges; I view them as a charge on knowledge, especially in the case of museums. Other European capitals operate such charges, and I do not object to tourists being charged, but I do object to charges for residents. The science museum charges £4 for entry—unlike the Victoria and Albert, whose charge is optional—although it is perhaps the most important museum to which we can take our kids. I used to love going there; everything was free, and there was plenty to do and to learn about. There is much talk nowadays of single parents and social security. If you are a single parent on social security, just try to get the money to take your child to the science museum! We must try to find a way of getting around this nonsense.

A visit to the tower of London is a good trip, but it costs £6.70, including admission to the Crown jewels. I used to love going there, too. Londoners, however, do not visit such attractions as much as tourists. They tend to say to themselves, "It will always be there. I will go and see it tomorrow, or next week." Eventually, of course, they will die without visiting any of those places.

Admission to the tower of London used to be free, although there was a small charge for viewing the Crown jewels. I understand that Buckingham palace is about to impose a standard charge of £8—although some people may be stupid enough to pay 10 times that to a tout. Why should our citizens have to pay twice over? We already pay for the upkeep of the science museum, the tower of London and Buckingham palace through our taxes. During the consultation process, the Minister should consider introducing the differential charging system that operates in many other parts of the world. Those who can produce evidence of United Kingdom residency should be admitted free, or at a reduced rate: I consider it grotesquely unfair to charge tourists the same as residents.

Countries such as Greece have many western European visitors who can afford to pay reasonably high prices. Restaurants and food shops in such countries make a price distinction between tourists and residents, and I see no reason to object to such a system here. I want tourists to enjoy their time in the capital, but it is not just a question of saying that all regulations are nonsense and should be dispensed with; we should examine the products and the standards of service that tourists are offered. They should feel that they have got something out of their visit.

Souvenirs are a classic example. I did a bit of market research on the other side of Westminster bridge, by the station. I had a look at the trash that is on offer to tourists. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting cited red buses as one of the great features of London, along with red telephone boxes. It is regrettable that we are getting rid of such things. This may sound silly, but another London symbol is the copper's helmet. I pushed off quite a few of those in my day, during demonstrations, but it is possible to go out and buy one: they are all made in China. The same applies to dolls representing the royal family. I was told that there was a fairly well-upholstered Fergie doll —it was not on sale at the time—with a packet of pins that could be pushed into it, and a dazzling array of holiday clothes.

Looking around, I saw "Made in Taiwan", "Made in Bangladesh" and "Made in Hong Kong". I do not object to those economies selling us their products, but I feel that a souvenir from a capital city should be of local manufacture as well as local representation.

Looking on the brighter side, London Underground offers an excellent range of souvenirs, all of which are made in England. The London tourist centre in Victoria also has an excellent array of high-quality souvenirs which are made in this country. The work of the London tourist centre in Victoria has not been mentioned so far. It is helpful, friendly and informed, which is so important. It makes visitors feel welcome, and I hope that the Minister will consider the resources that it needs to extend the services and the personnel there who can greet visitors. We could assist visitors greatly by requiring quality standards for all souvenirs.

We could also help tourists far more by providing information booths around central London in which different languages are spoken. We are arrogant in this country. In other capital cities, one can speak English and always find someone who can give the required information. Try speaking a language other than English around London. People who speak another language in my area of London would probably get their faces kicked in. It is not noted for being a charming part. We need more bilingual notices on trains and buses and at stations to assist visitors. There are many signs in English in other European capitals. French and German should be far more in evidence at our stations and other places where people seek information. There should be more announcements in French and German at stations, rather than the language that many of us who were born here do not understand as it comes out of public address systems in London stations and elsewhere in Britain.

I move on to register my protest at the appalling public transport links between Heathrow and central London. To get on a train that is not a dedicated link is an atrocious introduction to visitors. I am glad to see that the British Airports Authority and British Rail have come to an agreement with regard to a dedicated link on that route, which will mean that communication from central London and Heathrow is more like the good connection between central London and Gatwick.

There are many wonderful places and many good tours in London for visitors to take, but a number of them are substandard. For example, try going on some of the river cruises and hearing the semi-literate, ill-informed and prejudiced commentaries given. Some of the comments, I might add, are about this place and may be justified. However, visitors hear those commentaries. The Circle line trip in New York provides a professional commentary of the sort that visitors should hear on a river tour here. Such services are obvious targets for quality regulation.

There are some excellent organised sight-seeing tours in London, put on by private and public sector organisers, but there are a number of distasteful tours that commemorate past incidents of violence and brutality. London is one of the safest cities for tourists in the world. Obviously, plenty more needs to be done because London residents are as concerned about their safety as we are about the safety of tourists, but the idea of having "the bus trip to murder", for example, does not seem desirable. Jack the Ripper walks and the Jack the Ripper exhibition at the London Dungeon are, at the very least, in poor taste, but could be seen by many—and certainly by myself—as insulting to women, especially as the women concerned in a number of those murders were prostitutes. Such women, to this day, are still regarded by some as people who do not deserve protection from violent or murderous assailants. London should not be seen, and Londoners do not want it to be seen, as a place where we are proud of the horrific events in our past.

In conclusion—those are words that Conservative Members love hearing; I shall roll them round my tongue once again—in conclusion, London needs to welcome tourists and honoured guests to our capital city, but sensible measures are required to ensure that our visitors are not cheated or ripped off and that Londoners are not inconvenienced or penalised by tourists so that we regard them as a curse rather than as welcome paying guests.

2.4 pm

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): It is a pleasure to say a few words in this long debate about the deregulation of tourism. As I live in London and in my constituency of Hastings, I have a great deal of sympathy with many of the points raised by Opposition Members. However, I fear that their underlying answer to the problem is to regulate rather than to deregulate. Deregulation is the key to this debate so that we can offer an infinitely better reception to people from abroad and to people from this country who wish to spend a holiday in some of our most attractive tourist areas.

I agree with practically everything that was said by my colleagues, so I shall not repeat what they have said. My hon. Friend the Minister began to list some of the activities of the men with briefcases which affect the tourism industry. Mr. Michael Ann of the Department of Trade and Industry retail and tourism group listed them recently in a local business newspaper. The list included

"environmental health, national insurance, VAT, weights and measures, building control, liquor licensing, swimming pool inspection, electrical safety, planning, trading standards, wages inspection, the English Tourist Board, the RAC and AA, insurance, performing rights and phonographic rights."

The list also included

"the Lotteries and Amusements Act, the Theatres Act and the Data Protection Act."

After dealing with all that, I cannot imagine that there is much time to run an hotel.

A hotelier in my constituency told me a tale, not of the ham and tomato sandwich, but of the beef and tomato sandwich. We have dealt with ham and tomato sandwiches at great length. However, to produce a beef and tomato sandwich, one would need four colour-coded chopping boards with their matching colour-coded knives. The ingredients would have to be taken from a fridge so cold that the tomato, beef and butter would be solid. If one took that freezing cold concoction, wrapped in shrink-wrap paper, as it would have to be, to a client sitting in the bar who then wanted it warmed up, one could not toast it behind the bar because the bar is not a catering kitchen. That sums up fairly succinctly some of the problems that our hoteliers face.

There has been agreement in the debate about what needs to be done, but we have not heard many answers. In the few minutes that remain, I want to consider some of the ways in which we can deal with the problems posed by regulation and over-regulation. No Conservative Member would say that we should abandon all regulation instantly. There is clearly a need for a degree of sensible regulation. However, as my hon. Friend the Minister suggested, we must consider the cost of compliance and the risk analysis involved.

It is easy to say that, but it is considerably more difficult to put it into practice. There are instances when we ask Departments to consider compliance costs. The problem is that the science of compliance costs is not as well understood as it could be and our systems are exceedingly weak. I should like to see the National Audit Office or the Audit Commission, or both working together, produce considerably better systems of cost compliance related to, and involving, those who will have to comply rather than how much it would cost Government Departments.

I was also encouraged by the fact that the Minister wants better relations with the industries involved, although I was slightly disheartened when he said that he wanted to talk to trade associations. So many businesses in tourism are small. If they are dealing with the men with briefcases, they will certainly not have time to join trade associations, let alone be vocal members of them. It would benefit the industry enormously if we could devise consultation that helped people and did not take yet more time out of the business.

We have castigated environmental health officers at great length. I have a certain sympathy—not a great deal—with them because the poor souls do not understand what they are doing. There is a need for training in business methods, in the science of hygiene and in various other disciplines, which would include science and technology as it applies to many companies. If we could institute better training for our environmental health officers, we might obtain a better understanding of what we are trying to achieve.

I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Minister instigated the debate. It has given hon. Members an opportunity to air some of the concerns of businesses in our constituencies. We wish the Minister all power to the elbow to try to get the industry deregulated so that it can continue profitably.

2.9 pm

Mr. Charles Hendry (High Peak): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the way in which he opened the debate. It was one of the most encouraging speeches that I have ever heard in the House. His robust presentation and understanding of the issues will comfort many of our constituents. They will know that the battle is being joined.

Tourism is vital to my constituency. The Peak district national park attracts 22 million visitors a year, which means that it attracts more visitors than Blackpool and Scarborough combined and more than any other national park in the world except Mount Fuji. In the Peak district national park, man has actually harnessed nature to create something even better. Natural facilities are used for sport and recreation, hang-gliding, caving and walking—as long as one is careful to avoid hang-gliders swooping down and catching one behind the neck. Man has improved the environment further by the introduction of reservoirs. People can sail, and there are trails such as the Longdendale trail, the Sett valley walk and the Pennine way, which starts in my constituency.

On top of that, community activities that have been introduced add another dimension which attracts tourists to our area. The Buxton festival, which starts next week, will attract many people, and this year's festival is expected to be better than ever. The Glossop Victorian weekend is due to be held in a couple of weeks. A host of small villages hold well-dressing festivals, country fairs, sheepdog shows, garland days and May queen festivals. That is what makes us one of the most attractive parts of the country and one of the reasons why so many people visit us.

I thank the Foundation for Sports and the Arts which has helped many organisations in my constituency to flourish by giving grants now in excess of £250,000.

I also thank the Department of National Heritage for the way in which it has already positively intervened in the case of the Buxton crescent. The Buxton crescent is one of the most spectacular and important buildings in the north of England. We have seen it decaying and falling apart, but, thanks to the actions of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, the former Minister and the current Minister, we are seeing it put right. We have reason to be optimistic that, this year, the builders will move in and start to restore the building. That owes more to the Department of National Heritage, backed by English Heritage and the national heritage memorial fund, than to anybody else. I welcome the fact that they are working so helpfully in conjunction with High Peak borough council.

But all is not well. There is a general problem facing businesses—too much red tape. Whereas we were once a nation of shopkeepers, many small businesses are being closed because we have become a nation of health inspectors. Partly, as we have heard, that is European Community-inspired, but all too often a three-page directive from the European Community is turned into a 30-page regulatory document by our own officials.

Over the past week, my office contacted many businesses to find out about the problems that they are facing. Many of those problems have been referred to. There has been massive investment in hygiene. As for the refrigeration of cheese, we have a delicatessen in Buxton, which The Times described as one of the best delicatessens in the north of England. But Pugsons of Buxton is facing a significant problem because of the need to keep quiches and cheeses at temperatures which destroy living enzymes. Cheese is a living food.

We have heard about sandwiches and the need for washing down. A new fear is creeping in about a European ruling that will require every hotel bedroom to have a bidet. Bidets are not part of the British culture and heritage, and I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to resist that ruling as well.

Bureaucrats have gone into the Buxton opera house and said that a window must be changed because Judith Christian, who runs the opera house and who was appointed because she is so sensible, can reach that window and open it by standing on a chair. They said that the window was dangerous because she might throw herself out. However, she is not that sort of person. We need people who will not make such regulations for our buildings. There are too many petty rules.

The signposting issue must be tackled. We must get rid of the wretched elephants that appear on signposts up and down the country. I have an otter sanctuary and an owl haven in my constituency which should not be signposted by elephants. I like elephants: my tie is covered in elephants. I am an adviser to an elephant charity. When a five-year-old says, "Mummy and Daddy, let us go and see the elephants", how does one explain that it is not an elephant but an otter or an owl?

The only thing like an elephant that we have in High Peak is the remains of a mammoth in Buxton museum. But if one puts up an elephant to say that the Buxton museum has remains of a mammoth, one will be told to take it down because a different symbol is used to indicate a museum. We have bureaucracy gone mad.

I welcome what the Government are doing. I welcome the approach taken by the Minister, and I congratulate him on his initiative.

2.15 pm

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I shall wind up a fruitful and useful morning by quoting a letter from the owner of the Manor hotel at Mundesley, Norfolk, which will be familiar to the Minister. At the end of a four-page fax, she says from the bottom of her heart:

"Help. We seem to be in the middle of the road with traffic coming at us from all angles with no way out. What do we do?"

She has been buried by regulation.

The law is an ass. This morning we heard such a catalogue of examples that it was almost impossible to cap each one with a better one. Unless we get this regulation under control, we shall never be able to manage the costs that have been raised by Labour Members—the price to the customer. It is not surprising that this country has become expensive for tourism.

There is no better place to see regulation at its worst than in Sutton. Sutton may not be the heart of everyone's touristic world, but in a sense we are a good example because we are perfect for business men wanting to go to Heathrow or Gatwick. We are in a light industrial area and we have good conference facilities.

The hotels that provide their facilities are drowning under paper work. Their greatest burden is overzealous town hall Hitlers driving them crazy. Those town hall Hitlers take European Community directives—which go via Whitehall and are meant to be guidelines—and then interpret them as fact and law and the poor miserable hotelier must comply with them. As a result, my leading hotel spent thousands of pounds complying with yet more fire regulations although it had been okayed only the year before. Every time another inspection officer comes to interview them, they duck—it costs money.

There are other examples of pettifogging. For example, my council insists that everyone in the catering trade—the chefs, stewards, stewardesses and even the chambermaids, because they must prepare a Teasmade—must attend an expensive two-day course of basic food hygiene. They get a certificate at the end. What do they learn? They are told not to chew gum while preparing food.

The law is an ass. I could go on for a long time about the examples of what we must tackle. The tourism industry in this country has been regarded as a second show. It is time that we put tourism ahead of football. We should make it our first priority, bearing in mind that it is one of our largest and most important income earners. I congratulate the Minister on tackling this jungle of bureaucracy. He is my Tarzan and the Tarzan for all people in the tourist industry. I wish him well in his endeavours.

2.18 pm

Mr. Pendry: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate. The Minister and I agreed to take just a few moments to conclude, because we wanted those who turned up for the debate and who have a real interest in the subject to speak.

It has been a good debate. I know that the Minister will not have time to reply to all the good points made today, but I hope that he will reflect on them. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) made a particularly important point, which was picked up by other hon. Members, about the importance of promoting areas outside the capital, Oxford and Stratford. I agree with him that Burnley should be promoted, but other areas in the north, such as that represented by my neighbour and almost namesake, the hon. Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) and my area of Tameside should also be promoted. I hope that the Minister will consider that request.

There is no doubt that London is the focus for overseas visitors and my hon. Friends who represent London made typically thoughtful speeches. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) made a good point when he pleaded that red London buses should remain, whatever deregulation may be introduced. Those hon. Members who cheered deregulation when my hon. Friend referred to it would think again if they saw some of the clapped-out buses that those of us whose bus services have been deregulated must now endure.

I hope that the Minister will also respond to the point that my hon. Friend made about the parking problems encountered by buses and tour buses in London.

My hon. Friends the Members for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) and for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) put to rest the bogus claim that the Labour party is not interested in the tourist industry. They made a balanced case for good regulation over bad regulation. They also referred to other problems such as that caused by ticket touting. The Government resisted an attempt to make that an offence under the Criminal Justice Bill, which is now in Committee. I was surprised by that because I have two letters on the subject from the Prime Minister, who said that, as soon as parliamentary time allows, he will introduce legislation to prevent ticket touting at football matches. That also follows the recommendation contained in Lord Justice Taylor's report. Today's debate, however, has highlighted that that problem transcends football.

In conclusion—my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West has stressed that they are the magical words in such debates—the tourist industry does not want us to indulge in petty party-political arguments when discussing its problems. The debate has, however, revealed genuine cross-party concerns. I hope that the debate will give the Minister the type of opportunity that he wants, new as he is to his post, to ensure that where regulation is necessary within the industry, it will be clarified and made relevant to those at the sharp end.

As has been pointed out today, much of the legislation that Conservative Members have complained about was voted for by them. Too many sloppy Acts have been passed since the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" was published in 1985.

I hope that we can have more debates on tourism. We have got to get the message through to that vital industry that the House cares about tourism. If there are some healthy punch ups between hon. Members on both sides of the House, I hope that the synthesis of such clashes will be good for the industry.

Although we have had two debates in four months on tourism, I hope that we will have many more.

2.22 pm

Mr. Sproat: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate and attempt to follow the wise advice given to me by the Whip, my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown).

I thank the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) for his welcome of the fact that this is the second debate on tourism in four months and for his call for many more.

Tourism is an extremely important industry and, although hon. Members on both sides of the House may place a different emphasis on what is the right balance to be struck between regulating and non-regulating, there is widespread agreement among hon. Members that the industry is subject to too much regulation overall. It is commonly held that too much of it is wrong and that where it is stupid, it should be repealed.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said that a lot of the regulation that we have discussed and castigated as stupid or absurd had been passed by Tory Governments. That is exactly so. I do not care tuppence who passed them—if they are stupid, they should be changed and if they are not, they should be kept. That goes not only for the House but for local authorities, whether they are run by Conservatives, Liberal Democrats or Labour.

We are trying to lift a burden from the tourist industry. As Minister responsible for tourism I want, first, to subtract the measures that damage the industry—we have been discussing those today—and, secondly, to find measures that increase the industry's competitiveness. The latter is not a subject for this debate. Those matters constitute a double punch.

I am acutely aware of all the questions about funding the British Tourist Authority—by the way, it is the English tourist board which has had it money cut—and the relationship between the regional tourist boards and the English tourist board. We must see whether we can involve the Scottish and Welsh tourist boards in a more co-ordinated way in dealing with visitors within this country. We all understand that the Scots and Welsh want to keep their own tourist boards. Scotland is a very sellable tourist commodity and it is right that Scotland should wish to sell it. However, while maintaining total control over its national tourist product, there may be room for more co-ordination between the English, Welsh and Northern Ireland tourist boards.

A sad aspect of this debate is that although the Department of National Heritage is responsible for tourism as a whole, it is not responsible for many of the problems that have been mentioned in this debate. I must work out how we can convince the Department of the Environment that use class orders should be changed. I have been convinced of that by hon. Members and representations that I have received from outside. I will send a powerful letter to the Department of the Environment setting out the arguments about why local councils should have a right to say whether buildings that were once hotels should be converted into hostels.

Similarly, I will write to the Department of Health on the Children Act 1989. One of my hon. Friends mentioned the anomaly that McDonald's wants to run children's parties but when more than eight children are in the party room, another so-called "qualified carer" must be present to ensure that the children do not misbehave themselves. That makes it uneconomical for McDonald's to run that helpful facility for parents.

Mrs. Lait: When my hon. Friend talks to the Department of Employment about the May day bank holiday, although I welcome a deregulation day bank holiday, will he bear in mind the fact that, in Hastings, May day is a valuable tourist day? It is one of our most successful weekends because we hold a Morris dancing festival.

Mr. Sproat: I am glad that my hon. Friend did not ask me to attend the Morris dancing festival, but I note what she said.

Hon. Members asked about hotel registers and the immigrations forms that must be filled in. Nobody has yet found an hotel that has been asked by the police or anybody else to return such a form. I shall probably now be flooded with letters from the Home Office saying that that is the most important measure that it has passed for a long time, but I look forward to hearing from it.

The Department of Transport is responsible for signs and I hope that we can get some movement on that. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) rightly asked about aviation and I hope that we can follow that up. Motorway service areas are part of the tourist product. We deregulated those last August; until a few months ago, one could land at Dover and try to reach Birmingham without seeing a single motorway station.

One hon. Member talked about pints of beer and whether it should be illegal to sell a pint of beer in a pint glass because the head constituted a tiny proportion of the beer at the top of the glass. The Department of Trade and Industry is considering whether to regulate that and place costs of £30 million on the pubs and clubs of the land, which would have to get rid of their old glasses and buy new glasses that can hold a pint plus the froth on top.

Those are all small issues in themselves, but they have clearly exercised the House today. I give a pledge that I will take up those matters with the appropriate Departments. I have been asked whether a statement will be made in the House, as I promised, about an interim report on the inquiry. I will certainly seek to provide one, probably by way of a written answer, which I will make as full as possible. The lengthy debate that we have had today shows the great interest that the House, as well as the industry, has in the subject.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Hong Kong (Ethnic Minorities)

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Michael Brown.]

2.30 pm

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise with the House and the Minister one relatively small issue relating to the transfer of Hong Kong to Chinese control. While it is a small problem in terms of the numbers of people involved, it is of great humanitarian and constitutional importance.

Like many people in the United Kingdom, I have felt somewhat guilty about the transfer of Hong Kong to Chinese control. Every other colony that has moved out of our control has been able to secure freedom, independence and national consciousness, but Hong Kong is the exception because we are transferring it to Chinese control on the basis of an outdated and irrelevant agreement made with the Manchu emperors.

The comparison with little Macau is unusual. Macau is only 20 miles from Hong Kong—less than half the distance from the House to Southend on Sea. The Portuguese, who control Macau, have agreed to transfer control to China by the end of the century, but everyone there is entitled to seek Portuguese citizenship. Some 100,000 passports have already been issued to the 400,000 people there—men, women and children—and another 100,000 passports are on the way.

Due to the iniquities of the Foreign Office and the EC, which appear to haunt us all the time now, a considerable number of those 400,000 delightful people will be entitled to come to settle in England, Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland. Most of the Macau people have lived there for generations, or at least have proof of having done so. Most of them speak English as that makes commercial sense and most of them speak Portuguese of a sort because they are aware of the rules of admission once the colony is transferred. I am sure that if the Minister telephones the Foreign Office he will receive a Euro-assurance that the numbers involved are small. However, on the basis of the time that those people have spent living there and their ability to speak Portuguese—actively spoken in Macau—the numbers will become considerable.

I cannot hold our delightful Under-Secretary of State responsible for the sins of the Foreign Office or Brussels, but I can ask him to bear in mind that loophole when he considers my request on behalf of a tiny group of people, who have the ethnic background of Asians, White Russians and Eurasians, have lived in Hong Kong and had British nationality for generations, and who have paid their taxes and given their obligations to the British Administration. They now seem likely to become stateless people. Their numbers are tiny—they amount to 7,000. But the real number will probably be about 5,000 because the balance will have qualified for citizenship as part of the 50,000 passport scheme.

We must consider the facts. First, will those people actually become stateless? The Government have insisted that they are currently British dependent territorial citizens and will be able to seek classification as British nationals overseas. We are told that that will ensure that they have the protection of the British consuls. However, the status of BN(O) will be handed down for only two generations. The great-grandchild of any one of those BNOs will have no nationality, no homeland and no security unless we do something.

Am I right in my belief about statelessness? Everyone else seems to think so. The International Commission of Jurists has determined that the ethnic minorities "will become effectively stateless in 1997".

That is clear and precise.

Article 10 of the 1961 convention, to which I understand we are a party, obliges any state involved in the transfer of territory

"to secure that no person shall become stateless as a result".

Will the Chinese sort things out for this small group of people when they take over? Sad to say, there is no sign of that. Chinese laws on nationality are essentially race based and the 5,000 have no right to Chinese citizenship even if they wanted to take it up. The Chinese Government have made their position clear. They have stated that the 5,000 will have to stay in Hong Kong as stateless persons or else seek some sort of special Chinese passports whose status has not been defined. The Chinese policy, stated openly and publicly, has been to advise the 5,000 to appeal to London to grant them United Kingdom passports.

What does the Legislative Council of Hong Kong think? Does it believe that the problem is insignificant? Far from it. It has passed a unanimous resolution appealing to the United Kingdom Government to make a concession. It took the trouble to send a delegation here a fortnight ago to seek help from the Foreign Office and from the friends of justice and humanity to get the problem solved.

Disregarding the democratic representations, what does the Governor think? Unprecedentedly—this says a great deal for him—he took the trouble to make a clear public statement as recently as Thursday 10 June. He stated unambiguously:

"I think that the case has been put not only by the delegation of legislative councillors, but also by me and others—and we will go on putting the case and I hope that we can get some movement on that."

Clearly the Governor, as well as LegCo, believes that this is a just cause requiring action.

It seems that everyone at every level accepts that this is a real problem, a grave injustice and a genuine personal crisis for the 5,000 forgotten United Kingdom citizens of Hong Kong. I understand that the Government have made the concession of stating that, should things get rough in Hong Kong after the changeover—which they might—they will look sympathetically at the plight of the 5,000. If that is to be regarded as a guarantee, what on earth would we lose by making the nationality concession? The 5,000 appear to wish to stay in Hong Kong—there is not the slightest evidence that they do not want to. So what difference would it make if we gave them nationality?

As the House of Commons has unfortunately tended to become an area of interest promotion, I should like to emphasise that I have no connection, direct or indirect, by the back door or the front door, with Hong Kong or with any business operating there, or with the 5,000 or any of their industrial or commercial ventures. Indeed, I have been to Hong Kong only once, for a short holiday with my wife. My principal memory is of paying more for a cup of coffee—£2·80—than I have paid anywhere else in the world. I did not enjoy that, the more so since we were joined at breakfast by five of my fellow Members of Parliament who were staying in the same lavish and costly hotel as participants in one of those mass of useless delegations paid for by some taxpayer somewhere.

I therefore have no interest in Hong Kong. My only possible interest lies in the fact that it owes me £2 for the coffee.

My real interest stems from my belief that Britain is in danger of flouting its inescapable duty to a group of citizens whose rights are being ignored and whose future will be unstable and constitutionally deprived unless we do something. It would be terrible if we told these 5,000 people that they belong nowhere—that they are nationals of nowhere—especially as they have served Britain so well in the past.

I believe that nothing would be lost by saying yes to these people. If the Government really mean what they say—that if the 5,000 get into trouble, they will help them—what is lost by giving them passports? Home Office Ministers, including the Minister answering this debate, are people of sincerity and judgment. I appreciate that the last thing that I can hope for is that the Minister will suddenly announce in an Adjournment debate that that policy is to be overturned. However, I hope that he can at least give an assurance that, on the basis of what appear to be facts and the real problems of real people, he will think about what I and others, including the Hong Kong Legislative Council, the Governor and the representatives of the Chinese Government, have said. I hope that the Minister will at least say, "I shall look at this again and think about what has been said."

2.39 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) on selecting this subject for debate and I welcome the opportunity that it provides for me to set out the Government's position on the Hong Kong ethnic minorities. There has been some misunderstanding on the subject over the years and I hope that I can put matters right.

My hon. Friend spoke about Macau. Portugal is not granting Portuguese citizenship to all residents of Macau; nor can people travel there from Hong Kong and acquire Portuguese citizenship. I do not think that my hon. Friend suggested that, but he may be as aware as I am that in a debate on Monday in another place it was suggested that the Portuguese Government had said that they would give Portuguese nationality to all those from Hong Kong who apply in Macau.

It is not true to say that residence in Macau leads to the acquisition of Portuguese citizenship. The Portuguese Nationality Act 1981 provides that only children born in Macau to existing Portuguese citizens will get Portuguese citizenship. Portugal is not operating any kind of assurance package after the fashion of our selection scheme under the terms of the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act 1990.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I accept everything that the Minister has said. Does he accept that 100,000 Portuguese passports have already been issued to adults? Therefore, we are not debating an insignificant problem. While I agree that what was said in the Lords was rubbish, there is a problem.

Mr. Wardle: My hon. Friend's estimate that 100,000 citizens of Macau have Portuguese citizenship is right as far as I know. That number may increase. As Portuguese citizens, those people who are not in Macau may travel to the EC and may visit this country. If they want to reside here they will have to make it clear that they are not dependent on social security. That applies to any EC national.

The issue raised by my hon. Friend is not new. Over the past six or seven years, it has been debated regularly in the House and, within the past six months, there have been two debates in the Hong Kong Legislative Council in which the Government's position has been explained. There is clearly a need for our position to be repeated because of questions asked in Hong Kong and in this country by my hon. Friend and by many others.

I should like to make plain which members of the Hong Kong community we are debating. We estimate that currently in Hong Kong about 28,000 people belong to the non-Chinese ethnic minorities. The great majority of them have another nationality besides British. For example, most of them hold citizenship of either India or Pakistan. Perhaps 7,000 of them have only British nationality in the form of British dependent territories citizenship—BDTC—or British nationality overseas.

The question at the heart of the debate is whether special measures should be taken for that section of the Hong Kong community, or whether they should compete, like everybody else, for the 50,000 British citizenship places that we have already made available under the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act.

Representations have been made on behalf of that group for a number of years and Parliament carefully considered their position when formulating its citizenship scheme for Hong Kong in 1990. It concluded that there was no case for making special citizenship provision for them and that remains our position.

Let us look at the arguments that have been advanced in favour of special treatment. First, it is said that after 1997, the ethnic minorities will not have a proper nationality and passport. That refers to the status of British national (overseas)—BN(O)—or British overseas citizen—BOC—and their related passports. The British Government do not accept that those nationality statuses are in any way inferior to BDTC status. There are more than 1 million people in the world with BOC status and the BOC passport is well established. There are more than 500,000 people in Hong Kong now with BN(O) status and the BN(O) passport is accepted throughout the world. Holders do not need entry clearance for visits to the United Kingdom, although, like everyone else, they require entry clearance if they wish to come here on a more permanent basis.

BN(O) and BOC passports give the holders an entitlement to registration as British citizens provided that they have completed five years' residence in the United Kingdom and have achieved settled status. Those passports also confer British consular protection worldwide and will do so in the Hong Kong special administrative region, as it will be known after 1997, if the holders are not Chinese nationals as well. The ethnic minorities will, therefore, be in no different position in those respects after 1997.

Secondly, the ethnic minorities have expressed fears that, unlike the ethnic Chinese, they will not have the right of abode in Hong Kong after 1997. In our view, those fears are quite groundless. The Joint Declaration and article 24(6) of the Basic Law guarantee the ethnic minorities the right of abode in Hong Kong if they do not have a right of abode elsewhere. The Peking authorities have said that people in Hong Kong who are not ethnically Chinese are welcome to remain and that it is open to them to apply for Chinese citizenship.

Thirdly, it is claimed that under existing arrangements, the ethnic minorities, their children or grandchildren will be left stateless. There is no question of that. Specific provision has been made in article 6 of the Hong Kong (British Nationality) Order 1986 to deal with that question. People with solely British nationality—that is, BDTC, BN(O) or BOC—before 1997 will retain British nationality after 1997, either as BN(O)s or BOCs. The children of those who become BOCs or BN(O)s under the 1986 order will automatically become BOCs if they would otherwise be stateless. Their grandchildren will have an entitlement to acquire BOC status by registration—again, if they would otherwise be stateless.

Fouthly, concern has been expressed on the limitations on the transmissibility of the ethnic minorities' British nationality status to future generations. They are, however, in no way unique in this. No form of British nationality will be transmissible indefinitely in Hong Kong. The British Government cannot give indefinite rights to transmit nationality from one generation to the next, expecially where the territory in question is not British. Those limitations in respect of future generations would apply even if they were to be given British citizenship, assuming that they remained in Hong Kong, as they have said they wish to do.

The Government therefore remain firmly of the view that it is neither necessary nor appropriate to introduce legislation to give the ethnic minorities British citizenship. They are, of course, free, along with all other BDTCs, to apply for British citizenship under the selection scheme that was set up under the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act 1990.

Records for the selection scheme are not kept on the basis of ethnic origin, but a check made on the basis of surnames indicated that the ethnic minorities who have applied have been successful in about the same proportion as other applicants. About 60 per cent. of those who applied have been successful. The scheme could not, however, be arranged to give preference to the ethnic minorities. It is designed on an impartial and objective basis under which points are awarded according to set objective criteria.

The Government do not see any case for taking further action on the matter of citizenship. We have been prepared to give an assurance relating to the admissibility of the ethnic minorities to the United Kingdom in the event of their coming under pressure to leave Hong Kong. My hon. Friend alluded to that in his speech.

We do not expect that any members of the non-Chinese ethnic minority will be forced to leave Hong Kong after 1997. Their right of abode in the special administrative region of Hong Kong is explicitly protected in the Sino-British Joint Declaration and the Basic Law, and we have no reason to think that the Chinese will not honour their commitments in that respect.

Over the years, however, we have regularly assured the non-Chinese ethnic minority in Hong Kong that if, against all expectations, members of that group came under pressure to leave Hong Kong and had nowhere else to go, the Government of the day would be expected to consider with considerable and particular sympathy their case for admission to the United Kingdom. I am glad, in view of my hon. Friend's remarks, to repeat that assurance today.

I hope that my comments today show that the Government are perfectly happy to see members of the ethnic minorities being offered British citizenship if they qualify for it. There has been some misunderstanding on that point. We see the ethnic minorities in the same way as all other British nationals in Hong Kong. If they meet the selection criteria under the selection scheme and secure the requisite number of points, they are entitled to British citizenship.

The scheme awards points according to age, education, experience, ability with the English language, British connections and so on. It is, however, competitive and there are bound to be those who are unable to gain the appropriate number of points. Nevertheless, we recognise that the ethnic minorities have made a substantial contribution to Hong Kong's economic prosperity and we have no wish to deny any of them British citizenship if they qualify under the scheme.

It would be wrong to pretend that the scheme could accommodate all 2,000 to 2,500 families in the ethnic minorities with only BDTC citizenship in the second tranche, which is planned to start in January 1994. Only about 12,000 places will be available for all groups in the second tranche. Many thousands of people will be competing for those places and it is unrealistic to expect that the ethnic minorities will be able to obtain more than a proportion of them.

Nor is it possible to grant British citizenship to ethnic minorities in Hong Kong under the British Nationality Act 1981, under which eligibility for British citizenship is, in general, tied closely to past and future residence in the United Kingdom. If special treatment were to be accorded to that group, new primary legislation would be necessary —and we were not persuaded that there is any case for fresh legislation.

We took the action that we considered necessary for Hong Kong in 1990, when we passed the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act. It was our view at the time that the immigration assurance that I have just repeated and the provision that we were making by means of the 1990 Act struck the right balance between maintaining confidence in Hong Kong and limiting potential immigration to the United Kingdom.

We believe that we got that balance right and that there are no new circumstances that would justify making different arrangements now. The ethnic minorities' ties are with Hong Kong rather than with the United Kingdom and our primary objective has been to ensure their security in Hong Kong. We believe that we have done that.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eight minutes to Three o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Arts Funding

1. Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for National heritage when he next plans to meet the Secretary General of the Arts Council to discuss Government funding for the arts.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Iain Sproat): My right hon. Friend meets the Secretary General of the Arts Council from time to time to discuss a range of issues.

Mr. Clapham: The Minister must be aware that there is a mounting crisis in arts funding. For example, the proposed budget for next year is to be 2 per cent., or £5 million, less. That proposal will have a devastating effect. The former Secretary of State for National Heritage said only a few days ago in The Guardian that the reduction in funding will not be spread evenly across the board, but will fall heavily on the smaller companies, which means that some of them are likely to be put out of business. How does the Minister intend to ensure that those smaller companies are protected and are able to continue to make their cultural contribution to the community?

Mr. Sproat: The hon. Member mentions an important point. This year there will be an increase in the Arts Council grant in aid of £5 million, or 2 per cent. Next year it will be cut by 2 per cent. At a time of economic difficulties, the Arts Council cannot remain immune to those difficulties but must shoulder its burden like everyone else. Much of the unease being expressed results from the Arts Council's deciding on new artistic priorities, not from the amount of funding that it has been given.

Mr. Renton: May I draw a comment from my hon. Friend on the reported decision of the Arts Council to ask three of the great orchestras to submit themselves, their musical standards and future programming to a judge for examination and for a decision on whether they should continue to receive public funding? If the musical experts at the Arts Council cannot reach a decision on that matter, what is the precise purpose of the Arts Council?

Mr. Sproat: It is a matter for the Arts Council to decide how to deal with its funding. We want London to have world-class orchestras and I am afraid—or perhaps I am not afraid—that it is a matter entirely for the Arts Council.

Mr. Sheldon: Surely the Minister cannot be immune from commenting on such important matters. He actually set up the Arts Council, which was established to advise on where the funding should go. If it makes a botch of it and relies on a judge to take over such responsibilities, surely he has something to say on the matter.

Mr. Sproat: I do indeed have something to say about it. There is a firm tradition of an arm's-length relationship between the Department and the Arts Council in these matters. If the Arts Council chooses to make its decision by taking outside advice, that is a matter for the Arts Council.

Mr. Jessell: What is the latest position on Arts Council support for the London City Ballet?

Mr. Sproat: My hon. Friend mentions an important subject. As I understand it, the Arts Council was perfectly prepared for the London City Ballet to go into liquidation. Now that a new company appears, possibly, to be rising from the ashes of the old, the Arts Council has said that it will not even pay the touring grant, which previously it was going to pay. I cannot openly give my views on the subject to the Arts Council because of the arm's-length principle, but I see no reason why my hon. Friend should not.

Mrs. Clwyd: The Minister obviously has a convenient memory. At the last general election, the Conservatives promised to maintain support for the arts, but they have ratted on that promise, just like everything else. Does the Minister feel any concern about the probability that one, and possibly two, of London's orchestras will be forced to close, and that several of our famous regional theatres are now under threat of closure because of Government cuts, or is the Minister totally apathetic about the wreckage being inflicted on the arts by the Government's policies?

Mr. Sproat: Perhaps I could remind the hon. Lady that funding for the arts has gone up by 45 per cent. under the Government. That certainly is doing our bit by the arts. It is true, as I said in answer to an earlier question, that next year there will be a cut of 2 per cent. only. The reason that so many provincial theatres are at risk is not the 2 per cent. cut but the fact that the Arts Council, in its wisdom, has decided that it does not want to concentrate as much on drama in the future. I hope that the Arts Council will read Hansard and see the strength of hon. Members' feelings about its decision.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Will my hon. Friend confirm that, over the past five years, the Arts Council grant from the Government has actually risen by 20 per cent. in real terms? Will he state, particularly in relation to London City Ballet, that the Arts Council should be far more flexible about the way in which it allocates funding? It is disgraceful that, out of a classical ballet budget of £15 million, the council cannot find even £250,000 a year to give a touring grant to an established ballet company.

Mr. Sproat: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point, and I hope that he will make it forcefully to the Arts Council. He is correct in pointing out that the Government spend a great deal on the arts. At a time of economic pressure, the Arts Council grant this year is £225·6 million, which is a great deal of money.

Independent Television

2. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps he proposes to take to protect the independence of the smaller independent television companies; and if he will make a statement.

7. Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what discussions he has had with the Independent Television Commission about the rules concerning the ownership of C3 franchises.

The Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Peter Brooke): I am reflecting on the discussions I have had with both the Independent Television Commission and the ITV companies about the ownership rules and other issues.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Secretary of State acknowledge the value of a genuinely produced and transmitted independent commercial television service to local areas such as my own in south-east Scotland? Will he say more about the discussions? Is he aware that the small independent companies are expressing great concern at the lack of protection that may exist for them after 1 January? Will he give an assurance that they will have a degree of protection similar to that afforded to the larger companies under the existing rules? Will he confirm that an article in today's Financial Times indicating that he will make an announcement in September is something like the truth?

Mr. Brooke: I am happy to join the hon. Gentleman in his commitment to, and endorsement of, the importance of regional quality. The Broadcasting Act 1990 was written in such a way as to ensure that the ITC made certain of that. As to protecting the small companies, the hon. Gentleman will know how the legislation is written. The meeting that I held on 14 June, on which I am still deliberating, obviously related to events after 1 January in a number of directions.

Mr. Etherington: No, 7, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Questions Nos. 2 and 7 are linked.

Mr. Etherington: Things are not always too good on a Monday, Madam Speaker.

When the Secretary of State speaks to the heads of ITV companies, will he make them aware that many people in the industry are deeply concerned about the prospect of an internal carve-up and a free-for-all? It is also widely felt by many in the industry that this is merely a self-propagating effort by those with a vested interest in the matter. Will the Secretary of State ensure that those who are stating that in the region of £100 million can be saved by doing away with duplication between various companies are made to explain fully to the Secretary of State's satisfaction that that is the case, and that it is not just another example of the companies advancing their own views to their own advantage?

Mr. Brooke: The rules relating to ownership are written into the 1990 Act. I acknowledge—as I did to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood)—that my meeting with ITV companies on 14 June related to that and to other matters. As to the £100 million savings, that issue was raised at the 14 June meeting and I have had subsequent correspondence with a number of those present pressing just the point that the hon. Gentleman made.

Mr. Simon Coombs: My right hon. Friend will be well aware that there is, to put it mildly, some dispute between the chairmen of the various ITV companies over whether the moratorium at the end of the year is likely to lead to a greater risk of a foreign takeover of some of the smaller ITV companies. Does he have a view on that dispute and if he has concluded that there is some likelihood of a foreign takeover, does he propose taking any action to prevent it?

Mr. Brooke: The issues that relate to what happens after 1 January came up at the meeting that I held on 14 June, so I was made fully aware of the views of individual Channel 3 companies about that proposition. We are of the view that our rules should be on all fours with those of the rest of the Community and we are taking an interest in those countries where we feel that the rules are not drawn up on the same basis as our own.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend accept that immunity from takeover and protectionism for existing management do nothing for the quality of programmes or for the efficiency of companies?

Mr. Brooke: I could not possibly disagree with my hon. Friend. On the other hand, if we were to proceed with the Broadcasting Act 1990 as currently written, companies in this country would be in a slightly different position from those in other Community countries after 1 January.

Mrs. Clwyd: As there is some dispute, will the Secretary of State tell us the net amount he expects the ITV companies to pay to the Government this year compared with the amount paid under the old levy system? Is he aware that Yorkshire Tyne Tees Television is to axe a further 188 jobs in yet another cost-cutting exercise? Does that not confirm what the Labour party has repeatedly said about the discredited Broadcasting Act 1990 and the damage being inflicted on ITV? When will the Secretary of State understand that staff loyalty, staff continuity and, above all, adequate staffing levels are critical to maintaining programme quality?

Mr. Brooke: I am, of course, aware of the commentary in one of today's newspapers about the specific amounts that ITV companies are paying in levy this year, although I have not yet done my own detailed cross-analysis of those figures. The hon. Lady knows that I share her views on the need to maintain the production base of television in Britain and that there are many aspects to that question beyond those that she has mentioned.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that strict enforcement of programme obligations, the current ownership structure and the regionality of ITV make it all the more important that the House should have regard to the funding of ITV? Does he accept that commercial pressure is being brought to bear on ITV at the present time? As a constructive way to resolve that problem, would he consider bringing forward the review of the ITV franchise arrangements to coincide with the review of the BBC charter?

Mr. Brooke: I understand my hon. Friend's proposition, but it would be premature to take a decision of that nature. On the other hand, I mentioned to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) a moment ago my concern that we maintain the production base in this country. That larger issue will certainly inform our thinking.

Broadcasting Act 1990

3. Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has to seek to amend the Broadcasting Act 1990.

Mr. Brooke: I have no present plans to amend the Act.

Mr. Sedgemore: As the stability of commercial television is now threatened by takeover mania, and as Granada has expressed an interest in taking over London Weekend Television, as has Carlton, and in taking over Central, Yorkshire and Tyne Tees, will the Secretary of State guarantee that there will be no change in the legislation to enable major regional companies to be taken over by national monopolistic conglomerates? Should not people like Jerry Robinson, the tea boy at Granada, concentrate on programme making rather than on pushing up Granada's share price for his personal benefit?

Mr. Brooke: In answer to an earlier question, I paid tribute to the issue of regional quality and to the fact that the legislation is written in such a way that the Independent Television Commission can ensure that that quality is maintained. On the rest of the question, I have made it clear that the issues that we discussed at the meeting with the heads of the Channel 3 companies on 14 June covered a wide agenda. It was a lively but good-natured debate. All aspects of the issue were discussed constructively by all parties.

Mr. Streeter: In any future amendments to the Broadcasting Act 1990, will my right hon. Friend consider introducing provisions to ensure that the Arts Council continues to fund excellent municipal theatres such as the Theatre Royal in Plymouth, which has attracted more people per £1 of grant——

Madam Speaker: Order. What has this to do with broadcasting? The hon. Gentleman is referring to an earlier question.

Mr. Streeter: In any amendment to the Broadcasting Act, is it possible to include a provision whereby the Arts Council can be made to ensure that it supports mainstream municipal theatres——

Madam Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm, but I think that we should now move on.

Mr. Bryan Davies: Does the Secretary of State accept that the fact that the heads of a number of major independent television companies seek to change the fundamental terms of their franchises and the fact that Richard Branson is seeking to alter the waveband on which he has received his franchise throw into question the whole operation of the Broadcasting Act? Is that not a comment on the fact that the legislation is so misguided that it is creating an absolute shambles in the broadcasting industry?

Mr. Brooke: Taking the second premise relating to Virgin Radio and the waveband first, in any negotiation for an exchange of the waveband, it would not be within the gift either of Mr. Branson or of anybody with whom he sought to effect such an exchange to make that exchange. Control over the wavebands remains with the Radio Authority, with which he should therefore treat. The purpose of the meeting on 14 June—at which, I hasten to say, the smaller companies were as interested in being present as the larger companies were—was to discuss a way forward, looking at the larger objective of maintaining the quality and the production base of British television.

London Hospitals

4. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what proportion of London hospital facilities are listed buildings.

Mr. Sproat: There are some 90 hospitals in the 12 central London health districts, of which 25 are subject to 80 statutory listings.

Mr. Cohen: Did not the 1987 report show that there were 770 listed hospitals in Britain, of which 11 were grade I—the equivalent to this place and Westminster abbey—a further 58 starred grade II and all the rest of historic significance? Has not Save Britain's Heritage been fiercely critical of the neglect of many hospitals, including the neglect emanating from the Government? Is not the position set to get a lot worse with the closure of hospitals in London? Will the Minister step in as part of his departmental responsibilities to save London's heritage hospitals such as St. Bartholomew's, or is the neglect part of a conspiracy with health Ministers, business-oriented health managers and developers, who see listed hospitals only as the source of a quick buck?

Mr. Sproat: The hon. Gentleman asks a very important question. The answer is that the Secretary of State for Health is responsible for ensuring that the heritage aspects of hospitals are maintained. Only last week, we issued general guidance to those who find that they are in charge of listed buildings, but who find that there is no longer a commercial use for those buildings. We are trying to reach an agreement whereby people understand that for the buildings to be preserved for commercial use one or two of the statutory listings may have to be changed. My Department has also set up a task force between the Department of Health and ourselves to ensure that the considerations that the hon. Gentleman mentioned are taken into account.

Mr. Ward: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of us appreciate the work being done by his Department in listing London hospitals and many other buildings? Will he proceed with extreme caution, however, before committing public money to buildings that clearly have no use or no useful life to come?

Mr. Sproat: We will certainly be careful. That is why I mentioned that where it is possible to maintain a building with a commercial use, we quite understand that there may have to be one or two changes in the statutory listings in order that the building as a whole may continue. As to my hon. Friend's question about hospitals, that is primarily a question for the Secretary of State for Health.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Under-Secretary of State seriously saying that those hospitals that have been maintained over centuries, such as St. Bartholomew's, will not be given any special concessions, and if it is in the commercial interests of the Secretary of State for Health to let that building go, presumably because it is a city centre site for which she can obtain a large amount of money, he will do nothing to ensure protection for existing buildings? If that is his implication, we shall begin to understand rather more clearly why the Secretary of State for Health is so anxious to get rid of that major centre of importance.

Mr. Sproat: I am absolutely not saying that. I am saying that the Secretary of State for Health has a duty to look after the heritage buildings within her remit. Her Department spends £500 million a year on the maintenance of a current estate. Within that, the listed aspects of the building will be protected. If the buildings are sold off, that is a matter for her. The heritage aspects will absolutely not be neglected either way.

Performing Arts

5. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations his Department has received about the impact on British performing arts of local authority discretionary grant policy.

Mr. Sproat: Since the establishment of the Department of National Heritage last year, we have received more than 300 letters about local authority discretionary grant policy and its impact on students of dance and drama.

Mr. Luff: Does my hon. Friend agree that the British performing arts make an enormous contribution not only to cultural life but to the economy? Is he aware that the local education authority discretionary grant policy in many counties, including my county of Hereford and Worcester, means that many talented young people are unable to play their full part in that success story? Does he share my concern at the damage that that is doing to the future success of the British performing arts?

Mr. Sproat: My hon. Friend has been a persistent and assiduous campaigner for this important subject. It is certainly true that most of the letters and representations that we have had have shown that an awful lot of students are not able to take up places because local authorities have declined, for whatever reasons, to fund them——

Mr. Tony Banks: Your lot did it.

Mr. Sproat: The hon. Gentleman should wait. I accept that there is a serious problem. It may well be that there is a genuine shortage of money, although local authorities were given sums that the Department of the Environment thought sufficient. To settle the matter, the National Foundation for Educational Research will examine precisely what the facts are. Depending on what those facts are, the Secretary of State and I will speak to the Department for Education, which has a lead in the matter, to see what needs to be done to sort it out.

Ms Glenda Jackson: I welcome the Minister's response to the previous question—that there could indeed be a financial shortfall, which is having a deleterious effect on those young people who manage to gain the very few and highly contested places in drama schools—but does he agree that there is little or no point in any young person taking a place in a drama school if the Arts Council is allowed to pursue its stated policy of closing 10 regional theatres? Is there any aspect of the cultural life of this country for which the Government take responsibility?

Mr. Sproat: We certainly take responsibility and the £225·6 million that we shall give to the Arts Council this financial year is proof of that. That sum will be spent at the decision of the Arts Council. It has taken decisions that are nothing to do with me. Indeed, I am prevented by the arm's-length principle from lavishing so much as a breath of praise or dispraise upon it. It is up to the Arts Council. If the hon. Lady disagrees with the Arts Council's policy of moving away from drama and music towards contemporary dance, she should lose no opportunity of telling it so.

Mr. Dickens: Is the Minister aware that in the borough of Oldham, we have a theatre workshop, the Oldham Coliseum theatre and one of the best repertory companies in the United Kingdom? Does he agree that it is important not only that funding reaches those worthy causes but that all hon. Members who purport to support the arts should help the National Lottery, etc. Bill complete its passage through Parliament before the summer recess?

Mr. Sproat: I hope that the Bill will get its Royal Assent before the recess. Otherwise, I agree, as so often, with my hon. Friend's words of wisdom.

Mr. Corbett: Does the Minister care that 23 theatre in education companies in England and Wales, including the Collar and Tie in the constituency of the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff), have lost around £1 million in grants this year, mainly because of cuts in what the Government will allow local authorities to spend, and that they face further cuts because of money being taken from the Arts Council grant? Does he understand that this may see the end of the unique blend of theatre and educational drama, mainly for children in areas where no other theatre exists? Will he set up an independent inquiry into how theatre in education companies can be funded from next April or is he content simply to see another slice of our theatre wither away?

Mr. Sproat: The issue arises on a later question and if the hon. Member will contain himself in patience, he will get a powerful answer at that point. However, I fear that I would be trespassing on your patience, Madam Speaker, if I gave a longer answer on that now.

National Lottery

6. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he expects the first moneys to be paid out by the National Lottery Charities Board.

Mr. Brooke: We hope that money will be available to be paid out by late 1994 or early 1995 for charities and the other good causes.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does he know that I am being pressed by the local Liberal Democrats in my constituency to get that money through as quickly as possible? Can he ensure that all parties in the House understand that all my constituents, from whichever party they come, are keen to see that money come through as quickly as possible so that it can go to all the excellent sports and arts projects that they wish it to support?

Mr. Brooke: I am delighted to hear that the Liberal Democrats of South Dorset are pressing to get the Bill through as early as possible, as their party in the House voted against Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Enright: Will the Secretary of State kindly tell us whether there is any particular significance in the archaic use of the word "monies" in the question as originally tabled, and more particularly in the archaic use of that form of the plural, or is it merely a dry run for the Government's English test for 14-year-olds?

Mr. Brooke: As the hon. Gentleman may know, in terms of such textual criticism, his question should be addressed to my hon. Friend and not to me.

Tourism, West Yorkshire

12. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the promotion of tourism in West Yorkshire.

Mr. Sproat: That is a matter for the English tourist board through its strategy for support to the regions, and for the Yorkshire and Humberside tourist board through its strategy for meeting local needs and priorities.

Mr. O'Brien: I accept the Minister's reply, but does he accept that there are problems with the Yorkshire and Humberside tourist board and the English tourist board over financing? West Yorkshire, with its loss of jobs both in traditional industries such as mining, textiles and engineering and in other sectors, is looking for Government help towards tourism. Is the Minister prepared to meet the leaders of West Yorkshire council to discuss tourism and allow them to put to him their concerns over lack of resources to promote tourism throughout West Yorkshire?

Mr. Sproat: Yes, I will glady meet a delegation if the hon. Gentleman wishes to bring it along. Let me take this opportunity to congratulate his region on the fact that the latest figures show 7·2 million overnight visitors in his area. Other areas in the United Kingdom have been more badly hit during the recession, but the excellence of the tourist facilities in his area ensured that the number of visitors there were kept up.

Mr. Robert Banks: Does my hon. Friend agree that the project to house the royal armouries in a brand new museum in Leeds will be, when completed, one of the largest and most important international tourist attractions in this country? Does he also agree that all political parties should come together to get the project built as soon as possible?

Mr. Sproat: I agree with my hon. Friend. The armouries in Leeds would be a tremendous addition to the city's tourist attractions. I hope that the project will go ahead as my hon. Friend said.

Mr. Pendry: The Minister is to receive a copy of the Coopers and Lybrand report that has been commissioned by the English tourist board steering committee, on which sits one of his representatives. If that report condemns the cuts in funding to the English tourist board that were made by the Minister's predecessor, will he take the best initiative to encourage tourists to Normanton, Bradford, Halifax and elsewhere in West Yorkshire by being bold, brave and sensible enough to restore the funding?

Mr. Sproat: So far as West Yorkshire is concerned, I note that two applications for tourism renewal grants have been received from Wakefield and Dewsbury. No doubt both those applications will be considered properly by the tourist boards.

Although it is true that overall funding to the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board has been cut, the British Tourist Authority's grant will be maintained. We believe that, within the cuts that have been made necessary by the economic climate, there should be a slight shift away from centralised English tourist boards to those run by the regions.

Lady Olga Maitland: While continuing to promote tourism in West Yorkshire, will my hon. Friend also continue the campaign against deregulation? Does he agree that unnecessary regulation in the hotel and entertainment industries has been crippling, and has resulted in increased costs to the customer?

Mr. Sproat: My hon. Friend makes a good point. In West Yorkshire, and elsewhere in the country, there is no doubt that the competitive edge of our tourist industry —when compared with other countries—has been worsened by the heavy regulatory burden. I am determined to remove as much of that unnecessary burden as possible and to make our industry more competitive when compared with other countries.

Theatre in Education

13. Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has to meet representatives of theatre in education to discuss funding.

Mr. Sproat: theatre in education companies have traditionally been funded by local education authorities together with the Arts Councils and regional arts boards. Any discussions on funding are most appropriately undertaken with those agencies.

Mr. Hall: The Minister will be aware, from the question put some moments ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett), that theatre in education companies are under threat. Some theatres have closed and others are facing closure because they have lost revenue, because of council tax capping placed by the Government on local authority spending, because of the lack of money that is available through the local management of schools and because of the threatened cuts in Arts Council grants.

The Minister should recognise that theatre in education provides a unique dimension to education in many thousands of schools throughout the country. Does he agree that the shortfalls—amounting to £1 million—should be met by the Government? Will he instigate a full public inquiry into the funding of theatre in education for the years to come?

Mr. Sproat: No to the hon. Gentleman's last question, no to his second last and yes to his third. I agree that theatre in education can make an important contribution to schools, but those involved now must realise that they must sell themselves to individual schools because of the local management of schools process. If they do that, and if individual schools want to have theatre in education, the projects will continue.

Independent Television

14. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations he has received concerning the operation of the Independent Television Commission.

Mr. Brooke: This year, I have received five representations from four hon. Members about various aspects of the ITC's activities.

Mr. Barnes: I do not know whether any of those representations backed the ITC's position on "News at Ten". I hope that the Minister will support that position and that adopted by the National Heritage Select Committee, which wants the programme to remain at 10 o'clock, so that political news—including 10 o'clock votes from this House—sports news, news from America and hard-hitting news generally can be properly dealt with. We need news at ten, not nudes at ten.

Mr. Brooke: The obligation of the Channel 3 companies is "simultaneously to broadcast high quality news programmes dealing with national and international matters at peak viewing times".

The hon. Gentleman has drawn the attention of the House to the action of the chairman of the ITC, who will be awaiting a response from the Channel 3 companies.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Magistrates Courts

27. Mr. Booth: To ask the Attorney-General what proportion of cases pursued by the Crown Prosecution Service in magistrates courts in the last 12 months have resulted in a conviction.

The Attorney-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): For the year ending 31 March 1993, 97·6 per cent. of cases that proceeded to a hearing in the magistrates court resulted in either a guilty plea or a conviction.

Mr. Booth: Is my right hon. and learned Friend satisfied that those excellent figures have been achieved by the Crown Prosecution Service adopting the test of a reasonable prospect of conviction, not some higher esoteric standard?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend raises an important point. I am satisfied of that. It is extremely important to make it clear that when the CPS reviews the evidence to determine whether there is a sufficiency of admissible, substantial and reliable evidence, it applies the test of a realistic prospect of conviction—not, as is sometimes suggested, a higher test.

Mr. John Morris: Is the Attorney-General aware that, despite a 50 per cent. increase in recorded crime since 1987, the number of cases that the police are instructed by the CPS to drop has nearly doubled? What role has the Treasury had in creating a situation in which arrested people are allowed to walk free because of the cost of bringing them to trial? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that 32 per cent. of cases are dropped on public interest grounds? Has he agreed to that? Will he define it in the context of decisions taken by CPS officers? Will he publish the instructions given to them; and what is the lowest grade of officer allowed to take such a decision on public interest grounds?

The Attorney-General: I am not aware of any case that has been dropped on the ground of cost. The shadow Home Secretary has visited the Crown Prosecution Service this morning, I am glad to say, and has been able to hold discussions and form his own views on these very matters. Meanwhile, I am glad to have been able to answer the right hon. and learned Gentleman clearly in this regard.

When cases are discontinued on public interest grounds, cost is not the reason. It will be well understood by the House that it is not in the public interest to prosecute every elderly person or every frail person or everyone suffering from some injury or every case for which there is sufficient evidence.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that our magistrates courts are capable of dealing with a great many more cases, especially those that go to the Crown court? Does he agree that the recommendation by the royal commission to end the right to trial by jury would end the scandal of 83 per cent. of those electing trial by jury pleading guilty? Is not the reason for that the fact that policemen are spending too much time writing up reports and preparing cases for court, which keeps them off the streets?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend rightly draws attention to the 83 per cent. of defendants who choose to go to the Crown court and then to plead guilty once they get there. That imposes what the royal commission has suggested are unreasonable costs and a waste of resources on the system.

London Borough of Bromley

28. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Attorney-General when the Crown Prosecution Service received reports from the Metropolitan police into two separate allegations of fraud within the social services and environmental health departments of the London borough of Bromley; and whether the Crown Prosecution Service now intends to prosecute.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Derek Spencer): An initial report concerning the social services Department was received on 17 October 1991. Following further police investigations, an additional lengthy report was submitted on 20 May 1993. Meanwhile a report concerning the environmental health department was received in February this year. Police inquiries continue and decisions on prosecution will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. Dowd: Is the Solicitor-General aware that it is now almost two years since this matter was first reported to the Metropolitan police, and almost a year since it was first reported to the chief executive and monitoring officer of the London borough of Bromley? Is not it a disgrace that it has taken so long for a decision to be reached on a matter of such importance and significance, and that we are still told today that decisions are awaited? Will the Solicitor-General give an assurance that incompetence and corruption in local government will be pursued as vigorously as possible, wherever they arise, and not soft-pedalled in areas that the Government and the Conservative party regard as particularly sensitive?

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Gentleman is quite right that all cases ought to proceed with expedition. Where there are allegations of fraud and corruption, as in this case, it is doubly important that they are investigated rigorously. It is not unusual for such fraud to be carried out in a secretive way by those involved, and, for that reason, the police sometimes find that it takes a considerable time to investigate. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that it is not in the interests of justice for defendants to be tried on half-baked inquiries, which are then found to be without substance when fully tested at trial.

As to political considerations, I remind Opposition Members of the words of Mr. Peter Archer, when he was Solicitor-General, which were contained in a Fabian pamphlet. I do not suppose many Opposition Members read Fabian pamphlets nowadays. Mr. Archer said that no Law Officer takes into account party considerations.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. and learned Friend accept that there is widespread concern about corruption in local government? Does he further accept that many hon. Members would like to see an inquiry into the corruption in local government, in view of the deplorable events in Lambeth?

The Solicitor-General: A number of inquiries are being held up and down the country into local government dishonesty and fraud. There are two cases of alleged fraud in the Bolsover district council, in which one defendant has already been convicted and the other has been tried and a retrial of his case is awaited.

Asil Nadir

29. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General what representations he has received in the last two years over the Nadir case.

The Attorney-General: I have explained to the hon. Member in a written answer this afternoon, of which I have given him notice, that a total of eight Members have written or spoken to me or my predecessor about this case. Of these, four have made representations during the past two years.

Mr. Winnick: It is now eight hon. Members and not seven. Although the Attorney-General is reluctant to reveal their names, can he explain why the majority of hon. Members who made representations are very reluctant for their identities to be known? What were their reasons for making those representations in the first place? Is not there a particular responsibility on those who championed the cause of Mr. Nadir in the House of Commons, strongly to urge him to return so that he can put his case in open court? Does the Attorney-General accept that the money given by Mr. Nadir to the Conservative party should be returned promptly because it comes from a very dubious source?

The Attorney-General: I do not accept the factual premise of the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question. Most people, I think, have made it clear whether they wrote—[HON. MEMBERS: "No, they have not. Name them."] However, as to contributions to any particular political party, the hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a matter for me. This case makes it abundantly clear that it does not produce any favour or affection either way, whatever party may be involved.

Mr. Dykes: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, while not condoning melodramatic practices by any of its operatives, hon. Members should not, in general, attack the Serious Fraud Office? Should we not all support it and give it greater resources in the fight against fraud?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend may have seen the remarks in the royal commission's report about the importance of the work of the Serious Fraud Office, both in maintaining high standards of financial probity in the financial services industry and in making it possible for anyone who abuses the privileges that apply to that industry, thereby damaging investors—often small investors—to be brought to justice more effectively.

Lenient Sentences

30. Mr. Garnier: To ask the Attorney-General how many cases have been referred to the Court of Appeal on grounds of leniency of sentences in the past 12 months.

The Solicitor-General: In the 12 months to 30 June 1993, the Attorney-General applied to the Court of Appeal for leave to refer 33 sentences for review, including five in Northern Ireland. Of the 19 references so far determined by the court, 16 have resulted in an increased sentence.

Mr. Garnier: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the Court of Appeal's judgments in those referred cases have already been of considerable assistance to sentencers at first instance? In the spirit of open government, will he publish the letters that he received from Opposition Members who voted against the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which included that power, so that we may know that those who voted against it now seek to make use of it?

The Solicitor-General: That power is now widely accepted as important and necessary and we often see it referred to by judges in their sentencing remarks. I shall resist the temptation that my hon. Friend has extended to me but, on Second Reading in 1988, an Opposition Member described that power as "sheer cruelty". He appears to have a poor memory because, only a short time ago, he wrote to my right hon. and learned Friend asking him to refer the sentence in the Newport case to the Court of Appeal and invite it to pass a severe sentence. However, following our usual custom of confidentiality, I shall spare his blushes and shall not publish his letter.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Elephants

35. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what resources he will make available for elephant conservation projects during the current financial year.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): We estimate that conservation projects supported by the aid programme, which may include benefits to elephant conservation, will amount to £2·85 million in the current financial year.

Mr. Banks: I noticed that the Minister said only "may". We need to know precisely how much money is being paid out to protect, wherever possible, the welfare of elephants. Is he aware that, because of drought, civil war and the continued activities of illegal ivory poachers in sub-Saharan Africa, enormous pressures are being put on herds of African elephants, a noble and magnificent beast which is close to extinction in some places? Will he please consider earmarking far more money for elephant conservation schemes? The people of this country would support that wholeheartedly.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We all know what the hon. Gentleman has done to save the elephant and he is to be commended. He must agree that the British Government have done very well. We did exceptionally well in 1992, when there was a further £600,000 specifically for helping elephant populations.

Mr. Heald: Does my hon. Friend agree that the key to protecting endangered species is effective action on bio-diversity to protect their habitats? In that context, what has his Department done to help elephants?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We do a lot for bio-diversity conservation generally, including the protection of habitats. At present, there are 78 projects wholly or partly concerned with bio-diversity and those cost some £37 million a year.

Kenya

36. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit Kenya to discuss bilateral issues.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will visit east and southern Africa later in the year. Her detailed programme is not yet available.

Mr. Cox: When the Minister's right hon. and noble Friend visits eastern and southern Africa, will she note the fundamental changes in monetary and economic policy that the Kenyan Government are now following, adding to their increased problems with refugees from Somalia? Will the Government be sympathetic to requests for aid, should they be made, and for releasing funds earmarked for Kenya?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Kenyan Government have had difficulty with the International Monetary Fund, but reached a new agreement in May of this year called the shadow programme, which we and the IMF will monitor. If the shadow programme is successful over a period, the IMF and the British Government will consider their position on new balance of payments support and other such matters.

Sir David Steel: Will the Minister take this opportunity to reinforce the concern that has already been expressed by Her Majesty's Government about the official sabotage of the printing presses of Fotoform Ltd, whose managing director is a British citizen? Will he make it clear that enforced continued non-publication of various magazines by that press constitutes unwarranted interference with the freedom of the press?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have repeatedly stressed the importance of a free press as one of the cornerstones of a healthy democracy and strongly condemn the police action against Fotoform printers. We are pressing for the court case to be concluded urgently.

European Development Fund

37. Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the effectiveness and economy of administration of the European development fund; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): The European Commission is responsible for administering the European development fund. We are in constant touch with the Commission and with other member states to improve its effectiveness.

Mr. Wells: Is it not true that Britain, under the leadership of my right hon. Friend, takes the lead in insisting on a more efficient and focused European development fund, and the co-ordination of its policies with member states' aid policies?

Mr. Hurd: I hope so. We should certainly like to see in the European development fund greater concentration on countries in real need with a record of good government. Making multilateral programmes more effective is increasingly important, as they make up a steadily increasing part of the total aid programme.

Mr. Meacher: The Prime Minister decided at Edinburgh last December to double the United Kingdom's contribution to the European development fund and the EC aid programme by the year 2000, while freezing the British aid programme for the next two years. In view of that, has the Foreign Office told him that such policies are throwing Britain's bilateral aid programme into turmoil? Is he aware that his own Department has released a statement declaring that the next two-year freeze will reduce Britain's aid programme by £150 million and that, in terms of value for money, after black Wednesday's devaluation, that figure will be nearer to £250 million? Will he confirm that his own Department is preparing contingency plans for major cuts in aid? When will the Foreign Secretary start standing up for the aid budget and stop being such a soft touch?

Mr. Hurd: We are beginning, not ending, this year's public expenditure round and we all know the problems affecting that round. There will be pressures on the aid programme, as on other public expenditure programmes. As I said in answer to the first question, I believe that multilateral contributions, whether to the EC or the United Nations, are a steadily increasing part of the total aid programme. I believe that our bilateral programme is second to none in its quality and I intend to maintain an effective programme.

Population and Development Conference

38. Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on preparations for the international conference on population and development to be held in Cairo in 1994.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I understand that the United Nations preparations are proceeding well. The Overseas Development Administration will continue to work closely with everyone involved to help ensure the success of this important event.

Mr. Ottaway: I thank my hon. Friend for that positive statement. I congratulate him and the Prime Minister on persuading the G7 summit to agree to encourage the success of the United Nations conference, which reflects the growing concern over the population issue. Does my hon. Friend accept that there is growing concern that what is meant to be a conference on population and development is rapidly turning into a conference on development and a bit of population?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I very much agree with my hon. Friend that the conference must be about population, not development generally—it is essential to get that message across. My hon. Friend and the all-party group on population and development are to be congratulated on drawing attention to what is a great problem. There is no purpose in having aid programmes if they do not, in considerable measure, address the problems of population growth for the future of the world in the next century.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that, as we prepare to go to some of these conferences, some countries find it odd that this country and Europe still pay farmers to reduce production through set-aside programmes? Should not we try to use that food to help with the problems of population and development in other parts of the world?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: All those questions can be considered at the conference. The important point is to understand the principles that are at stake.

Russian Federation

40. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to meet European colleagues to discuss continuing aid to the Russian Federation.

Mr. Hurd: Aid from the European Community and member states makes up 70 per cent. of all western support to Russia and the rest of the former Soviet Union. I meet my European colleagues regularly, and support for Russia is often discussed.

Mr. Fabricant: Following the success of my right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister at the G7 summit, we are all aware that £3 billion will be given to assist the Russian Federation. Will my right hon. Friend expand on this and state the sort of aid that we give to Russia, especially for expertise on privatisation?

Mr. Hurd: I think that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister may touch on that in a few minutes. It was certainly an important result of his expedition to Tokyo. Through our British know-how fund and the schemes that were confirmed and extended at Tokyo, it is important to give special assistance to Russian privatisation and to small and medium enterprises in Russia. I think that my right hon. Friend will give details of the extra commitments that were made.

Economic Summit (Tokyo)

3.30 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): Madam Speaker, with permission, I should like to make a statement on the economic summit in Tokyo and the Group of Seven meeting with President Yeltsin.

I attended the summit with my right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. During the three days I also had bilateral meetings with our host, Prime Minister Miyazawa, and with the Presidents of the United States and Russia and the Prime Minister of Canada. The summit produced significant achievements. These are set out in the economic and political declarations which I have placed in the Library of the House.

Before the Tokyo summit, the GATT talks had been stalled for several months. The summit acted as a catalyst. The United States, Japan and the European Community negotiated a report on access to each others' markets which has led to a resumption of GATT negotiations in Geneva this morning.

The report offers large benefits to British industry. In six of the eight categories where tariffs are to be abolished entirely, Britain is a net exporter. These include pharmaceuticals and construction equipment. Japan's agreement to abolish all the import duty on whisky will give a welcome boost to sales in a market which is already worth over £170 million a year to Scotland. Many other particularly high tariffs faced by British exporters will be cut by 50 per cent. or more. These include punitive United States tariffs on ceramics, glassware and high quality textiles. In other categories of manufactured goods, there was agreement to cut as many tariffs as possible by a third, or to harmonise them at low levels.

The Uruguay round is far wider in scope than previous multilateral trade negotiations. It still has a long way to go, but the Tokyo meetings have injected much-needed momentum and real progress on substantive issues—action as well as words—and the world-wide prospect of more trade and more jobs, especially for a trading nation like the British. With low interest rates and firm control of costs, British industry is exceptionally well placed to benefit from a successful GATT round.

Each summit country, except Japan, is facing a serious fiscal problem. With the exception of the United Kingdom, the European participants are not expecting economic growth this year. Against this background, the summit identified barriers to growth which have developed in much of the industrialised world.

As at the European Community's Copenhagen Council, I found a new willingness among our partners to address some of the hard lessons that we learnt in the United Kingdom during the recent recession. Three points in particular were generally accepted. The first is that there is a long-term upward structural trend in unemployment in addition to the cyclical effect of the recession. Secondly, on present forecasts, the cost of social provisions is likely to exceed the capacity to meet them in all the main industrial economies and, thirdly, that deregulation and labour market flexibility are vital to get unemployment down.

It was agreed that Europe should implement the firm budgetary and other measures needed to facilitate the rapid reductions in interest rates that are now required in many countries on the continent. In north America, strong action was being taken to bring down fiscal deficits over the medium term with the objective of securing higher saving and investment. Japan, meanwhile, will implement fiscal and monetary measures to ensure sustained growth led by strong domestic demand. That will help to reduce Japan's large current account surplus.

Each of those measures is intended to help growth around the world. The summit's accent on jobs was reflected in agreement to send high-level representatives to a special meeting that President Clinton is convening in the autumn. That will study the causes of unemployment and pool experience in seeking solutions.

In April, the Group of Seven put together an unprecedented set of measures to help Russia through its deep transformation. At Tokyo, the Heads of Government confirmed that approach and noted that some large financial flows were already being made available, including $1½ billion in a new IMF facility. We set out a programme worth some $3 billion to help privatisation and restructuring. There are now some encouraging signs of a spreading enterprise culture in Russia. The summit leaders told President Yeltsin that they were determined to sustain the huge support that they had given reform in his country.

Of equal importance, we have reinforced our political partnership with Russia. As an innovation this year, our agenda included a joint review with President Yeltsin of international problems. At my suggestion, the meeting concluded with an invitation to the Russian President to join us again next year in Italy.

The political declaration touches on many of the problems we discussed with President Yeltsin, or beforehand among the Seven. We supported a negotiated settlement for Bosnia. but only on the basis that it would be acceptable to the Muslim people and not imposed on them. We highlighted the importance of the non-proliferation treaty, supported the constitutional talks in South Africa and expressed concern about the behaviour of Iraq, Iran and Libya.

The summit paid close attention to problems of the developing world and of the environment. I secured agreement that improved debt reduction terms should be considered for the poorest and most indebted countries. I hope that that will carry implementation of the Trinidad terms further. On the environment, the summit reaffirmed its commitment to sustainable development and implementation of the Rio decisions.

Finally, a word about the summit process itself. Over 19 meetings, the summits have evolved from an informal discussion between Heads of Government into an enormously expensive and, in my view, over-structured international event. I believe that radical change is necessary if we are to get the best out of the summit process. I proposed innovations last year and I made further proposals in Tokyo. These were widely supported. I hope that, as a result, future summits will be more informal, less pre-prepared and will provide even more opportunities for spontaneous discussion between the summit Heads.

Despite the procedural weaknesses I have mentioned, the Tokyo summit produced results of particular benefit to the United Kingdom as an exporting nation and a leading advocate of free trade. It concentrated on problems that are causing deep concern not just in this country, but around the world. It helped to bring leaders who are addressing those problems in common closer together. It laid the groundwork, I believe, for productive work at future summits.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I thank the Prime Minister for making this report to the House.

We welcome the recognition by the Group of Seven that there is insufficient growth and too much unemployment in their economies. In particular, we welcome President Clinton's proposal for a special employment summit this autumn.

Can the right hon. Gentleman explain why, when similar issues were raised at the summit last year by the then French Government, he was, as was noted in Saturday's issue of The Independent, brusquely dismissive of the idea of unemployment being discussed, apparently saying:

"What for, if we can't do anything about it?"

Does the right hon. Gentleman now accept the need for closely co-ordinated international action to promote growth and employment, and that such action must be taken at the European level? Would not it be a good lead to others for Britain now to cut interest rates? Would not that also be very much in Britain's interests, given last week's warnings by Midland Montagu, among others, that recovery in our economy will flag unless there is a further cut in base rates? I welcome what the Prime Minister said about the progress that has been made on the GATT. Will he explain, however, why two of the critical issues—agriculture and trade and services—were ignored at the summit? Although valuable progress has been made in the quad talks to which he referred, all the agreements depend on a successful outcome on the difficult fronts. Why was agriculture ignored when the main protagonists in the dispute—France, the United States and Japan—were all around the same table?

Does not the Prime Minister recall that the G7 countries have promised to settle the issue in every summit since Houston four years ago, and that two years ago, at the London summit, the right hon. Gentleman himself pledged to remain personally involved in the process,

"ready to intervene if differences can only be resolved at the highest level"?

Why was the subject dodged at Tokyo?

Opposition Members also welcome the continued economic assistance for Russia; but is it not strange that the $4 billion package agreed by the G7 in April has now shrunk to $3 billion? Why has that happened, and what message is meant to be conveyed by such a startling reduction in such a short time?

Was any consideration given to assistance for the Ukraine, especially in the light of its genuine economic difficulties and the vital importance of its accepting the arms reductions agreed under the strategic arms reduction treaties?

Does the Prime Minister appreciate that there will be disappointment—in many parts of the House, I hope—that full agreement on the Trinidad terms of official debt reduction has still to be reached by all the G7 countries, and in particular by Japan? Should not consideration now be given to extending the principle of debt relief from bilateral to multilateral official loans, especially those of the International Monetary Fund and the World bank? Can that be put firmly on the G7 agenda?

We welcome the recognition in the declaration of the danger of nuclear proliferation and the vital importance of the non-proliferation treaty. Would not the process be assisted, however, if a comprehensive test ban treaty could be agreed? Will the Prime Minister join me in strongly welcoming the United States' decision to extend its own ban on tests by a further year?

Does the Prime Minister understand the depth of feeling, in this country and throughout the world, about the disastrous turn of events in the former Yugoslavia—which, I believe, merited only one sentence in his statement? Does he appreciate the incomprehension at the complete failure of the international community to address its responsibilities in Bosnia? As we speak, the Serbian siege threatens to overwhelm Sarajevo. How does the Prime Minister think the inhabitants of that city feel about the evasive platitudes of the G7 declaration? Have they not heard it all before? Meanwhile, Serb and Croat aggression continues unchecked.

Are we not in a parlous state when the whole United Nations effort—both humanitarian relief and peacekeeping—is stalling because of inadequate resources and support from the international community? Instead of vague threats such as which the Foreign Secretary got into such a mess trying to explain—should we not hear a commitment to action, such as the use of air strikes, to make the aggressors understand that the international community will no longer tolerate the defiance of United Nations authority and the dismembering of Bosnia?

Why are not sanctions against Serbia being toughened, and why are not sanctions being imposed on Croatia? Why are extra troops and greater resources denied to the United Nations in the field? Why is there no resolve to make safe areas the haven that they should be for the innocent sufferers in this bloody conflict?

Has not the summit generally failed to fulfil its exaggerated promises of success, and, in the case of Bosnia, completely avoided its fundamental responsibilities?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman was uncharacteristically negative, but I shall endeavour to deal with the points that he made. I am grateful for the welcome that he gave to parts of the agreement that have been reached. Whatever cross-party support is available is always helpful on these occasions internationally.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the report in The Independent. As is so often the case with newspaper reports, I am a little baffled by what the right hon. and learned Gentleman was quoting from, or what he might mean by it. [Interruption.] Well, he probably quoted something that was inaccurately reported.

As for the right hon. and learned Gentleman's question regarding co-ordinated action on unemployment at the European level, I refer him to the report that I gave on the Copenhagen summit some time ago, to which I believe he responded.

I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that there is a long way to go on the Uruguay round. I specifically made that point. It was necessary to get the access agreement settled so that we could return to everybody negotiating, yet again, for both services and agriculture, where there are extremely difficult problems to be solved. What is vital is that, as a result of the agreement reached in Tokyo, the multilateral negotiations have started again this morning.

[The Prime Minister]

Whatever agreements may be reached by the quad, they are only a part of all the countries which finally have to reach agreement in terms of the Uruguay round. I have made the point on many occasions that each G7 summit since Houston has sought an agreement on the Uruguay round. It was for that reason that on a number of occasions in the last six months I approached other Heads of Government to try to push the negotiations along further, including a meeting that I had with the President of the Commission in the autumn of last year.

I have therefore, as I said I would, remained personally involved in this matter, and I propose to do so for one reason above all others. I believe that there is nothing more important internationally at the moment than a satisfactory outcome to the Uruguay discussions, for such an outcome will increase growth and create jobs in this country and around the world. I believe that that is vital. I know that the right hon. and learned Gentleman shares that view.

On the right hon. and learned Gentleman's questions about Russia, the $4 billion to which he referred that had been spoken of in April was an aim suggested by one member. It was not an agreement. We have agreed on $3 billion. No one is forthcoming with resources beyond that. When I met President Yeltsin at breakfast, and subsequently, he seemed to regard that as a very substantial contribution, and one for which he was extremely grateful. He did not have the reservations expressed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman about it.

As for the Ukraine, we are helping the Ukraine bilaterally. The reason for the inability to help the Ukraine multilaterally is that it has not reached an IMF agreement. If it is able to reach an IMF agreement, the prospect of further multilateral assistance is certainly necessary. The point made about arms reduction in the Ukraine is important. It was a point that we discussed, and it was discussed on previous occasions. It is a problem of immense complexity that we shall need to continue to address.

As for the Trinidad terms, Japan has always had a rooted objection to writing off debt. Japan is prepared to extend debt, but for its own internal accounting reasons it is deeply reluctant to write it off. The United States has often had the same difficulty. However, it has now established the principle of debt relief and will be meeting the Trinidad terms. That is a distinct move forward.

We agreed, as a result of discussions, that we would ask the Paris Club to look afresh at further help for the poorest countries. That will involve the Trinidad terms countries in particular. I expressed the view that I hoped that it would look at going well beyond the Trinidad terms and writing off a large proportion of the total stock of debt, not just the stock of debt that becomes due for repayment during the period of an IME agreement. That would be a substantial addition to write-off for the poorest countries in the world. We shall continue to push for that in the Paris Club.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to a comprehensive test ban treaty. That does remain a long-term aim. I hope that in due course we shall be able to achieve it.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman raised a series of points on Bosnia, points that he has raised on previous occasions. I am not sure that there is anything fresh in what he has said today. Although he was quite long on questions, he seemed to me to be a little short on solutions. It may be that he has lost touch with some of the events that are occurring on the ground. In respect of humanitarian aid, he will perhaps have noticed that even this morning my right hon. and noble Friend Lady Chalker announced a further £18·5 million worth of humanitarian aid from the United Kingdom to help people in Bosnia.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): Did my right hon. Friend impress on the other European Community Heads of State and, in particular, on the President of the Commission, Mr. Delors, that if they are at all serious about reducing unemployment and improving employment prospects they should immediately abandon the social chapter and all similar policies, which would impose unnecessary costs on industry and commerce?

The Prime Minister: I am extremely sorry to say that Mr. Delors was unwell and was not therefore at the summit. He was represented by Mr. Christophersen, the Vice-President of the Commission, who is aware of the United Kingdom's views on the social chapter. We did not specificallly discuss it, but he is in no doubt whatsoever that we believe that the social chapter would cost jobs, not create them.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I thank the Prime Minister for having met an all-party group to discuss the Trinidad terms before he left for the Tokyo summit. How soon does he expect some results from the initiatives that he took at the summit?

Secondly, am I correct in understanding that none of the announced tariff cuts will take effect until the Uruguay round of the GATT talks has been completed, and should we not keep that in perspective?

Thirdly, on Bosnia, will the Prime Minister accept that neither the strong words of the G7 nor the humanitarian package announced this morning will do anything to help the potentially murderous siege of Sarajevo unless the United Nations troops on the ground are authorised and reinforced with resources by their Governments to enable them to break that siege?

The Prime Minister: On the three points that the right hon. Gentleman made, I hope that the Paris Club will begin soon to discuss the question of further debt relief. How rapidly it will reach a conclusion I am afraid I cannot anticipate. The United Kingdom will push for a comprehensive solution as speedily as possible, but we have run into difficulties. People believe that we have been a little ahead of them in seeking debt reduction in Toronto terms three or four years ago, in Trinidad terms a couple of years ago and now. There are distinct difficulties in other countries. It is possible for some countries to move ahead unilaterally, as we ourselves have done from time to time in the past, but that then diminishes the capacity of those countries to seek what the debtor countries most need, which is a comprehensive write-off of debt by the Paris Club and, where appropriate, by the London Club as well in terms of commercial debt.

One of the points that I hope all our partners will recognise is that there is no incentive whatsoever for many of the poorer countries to continue to try to lift themselves out of their present difficulties if every element of their increased prosperity is then utilised to pay off an increasing level of debt interest on an increasing capital sum. I hope that it will be possible to have a substantial write-off.

On tariff reductions, the right hon. Gentleman is entirely right: nothing, in the famous terms, is agreed until everything is agreed. The hope and expectation is that the deadline will be in the middle of December——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Again.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman says, "Again", and he is right to be sceptical about it. We have done it, but we now have movement that we have not seen in the past with the fast track renewal in the United States and the breakthrough on access talks. I hope that we will get it concluded in December of this year.

On the question of Sarajevo, the right hon. Gentleman knows the Government's position. I am not in a position to offer fresh troops.

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): The Prime Minister has clearly had a most excellent Tokyo summit, but may I congratulate him in particular on the work that he intends to undertake to make such gatherings much less structured and, hopefully, much less frequent? Is he aware that in certain circumstances travel narrows the mind and that there is nothing more absurd in the current circumstances than a gathering of the world's elite, discussing the nobility of its aims, at a time when right across north America and Europe there is an all-time record gap between the perceptions of Government and governed?

The Prime Minister: I strongly share the views expressed by my right hon. Friend. It may be that one of the reasons for that gap between the public and the politicians is an excess of summit fatigue, where people meet together without a realistic expectation of actually achieving what may have been expected from a summit of that sort.

I am delighted that colleagues have accepted many of the ideas for simplifying the summit process. I must confess that I did not achieve all the ideas that I wanted. I say with some trepidation, with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary sitting beside me, that I had hoped to restrict the summit to Heads of Government only and not Foreign Ministers and Finance Ministers. However, those of our colleagues with coalition Governments felt that they should continue to attend.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Is the Prime Minister aware that one of the advantages of these summits is revisiting, again and again, the continuing problems that face the world? Will he accept that what is needed now is the necessary pressure on Japan to reduce its balance of payments surplus and the essential requirement to move the GATT forward? The excessive trumpeting of success does not suggest that we have the GATT problem fully in mind.

The Prime Minister: We are well aware of the importance of the GATT round and no one in this House has been in any doubt about that for the past two years. Well over 100 nations are engaged in the Uruguay round talks. That makes it extremely difficult to reach agreement. As I indicated earlier, the talks are much wider and much more comprehensive than any previous trade talks. They include services and agriculture, and that has not been the case in the past. Those extensions are very welcome.

One point which deserves to be made is that many of the Cairns group of countries—in industrial terms, rather smaller countries—reached their GATT agreements three, four or five years ago and they have held to them. Their frustration at the difficulty of the United States and Europe in sticking to agreements that they reached months ago is entirely justified. I very much hope that we will be able to do that and also reach an agreement.

The point about revisiting problems is entirely right. However, it is not desirable to revisit them on occasions when there seems to be no practical opportunity of doing anything about them unless the revisiting is on the basis that I have proposed for the future—much more informal discussions.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, while the agreements in Tokyo are to be welcomed, there is no question but that a general reduction in tariffs is to be preferred to a series of bilateral agreements reached between different countries such as the United States and Japan? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the main purpose must be to achieve a reduction and success in the Uruguay round in agriculture? Will he confirm that no single country has the right of veto in such negotiations?

The Prime Minister: I would certainly confirm that. In terms of the European Community, an agriculture agreement is available by qualified majority vote. One hopes that that would not be necessary and I hope that, at the end of the negotiations, the advantages there for every western European country in industrial matters will ensure that no one would seek to block it on the grounds of agriculture. We need an agreement on agriculture. It will be a novelty to have one and it would be a very remarkable breakthrough if it were achieved.

With regard to my right hon. Friend's earlier point, a general agreement is infinitely to be preferred to bilateral agreements. Bilateral agreements are of little help to many of the developing countries.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): In his bilateral talks with President Clinton, did the Prime Minister discuss the United States ban on British nuclear tests in Nevada? Did he remind President Clinton that a year and a quarter ago this Government told the country that nuclear tests were indispensable to British security? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether British nuclear tests are still indispensable to British security, and will he give a clear yes or no?

The Prime Minister: In fact, I discussed that with President Clinton a few days before we went to Tokyo and we spent some time discussing it. The ban has been extended for a further year. We will wait and see whether other people outside the United States sphere of influence continue testing, in which case I think that the United States and we would as well. In that year, we are seeing whether we can find alternative ways of managing without the necessity for the tests. Some think that we can do that and we are still examining that. The scientists are as yet uncertain. I hope that it will be possible.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Although I congratulate my right hon. Friend on a very successful summit, may I press him again on Bosnia? Does he accept that, since the Washington declaration, events have deteriorated markedly, that no extra protection has been given to those in safe havens, and in Sarajevo in particular, and that that great European city stands on the brink of total collapse in the most atrocious conditions seen anywhere in Europe since the end of the second world war? There were some tough words in the declaration on Bosnia. Is my right hon. Friend prepared to say that they will be followed by action to try to save Sarajevo?

The Prime Minister: The Secretary-General, as my hon. Friend will know, is actually mustering troops at the moment in terms of the resolution, the number of which escapes me for the moment, on safe areas which was passed some time ago. We ourselves have provided troops; we have had troops in Bosnia for some time. We look forward to other people doing so as well so that that resolution can be carried out.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Given the importance of the level of world trade to British prosperity, may I welcome the small but important movements in the GATT negotiations that the Prime Minister announced this afternoon? May I remind the Prime Minister of the answer that he gave recently to the House, that one of the Government's objectives was to establish full employment? Is he aware that it is a long time since the House has heard that as an objective of Her Majesty's Government? Does the Prime Minister accept that, although many people have very useful ideas on how we could marginally increase the number in employment, nobody but nobody in the western world has any idea how to achieve his objective?

When Britain faced exactly the same situation in the 1930s, the then Prime Minister sounded a note of urgency by initiating a national debate and having that debate reporting directly to him. Will he consider a similar initiative so that when the British delegates go to Camp David they can go armed with new ideas, bringing hope to our constituents, some of whom have waited 10 years or more in the dole queues, rather than acting as mere intellectual bag carriers of other nations?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he had to say in his opening remarks about GATT. It was, of course, this country that raised at Copenhagen the significant question of employment across Europe and the long-term trend.

What is of increasing concern when one strips away the effect even of the recession is that right the way across Europe—not just in this country but right the way across Europe—from about 1970, under Governments of both parties, and at one stage two parties at once, there has been a general increase in unemployment. Worse than that, there has been a corresponding increase in long-term unemployment that is centred particularly upon low-skilled or unskilled males. That is not a British phenomenon; it is a phenomenon that one can see to a greater or lesser degree across the whole of the industrialised world, with the exception of Japan, where different circumstances apply.

We did raise the issue in Copenhagen. I raised it again in Japan. We will most certainly contribute forcefully both to the White Paper in Europe and President Clinton's discussions later on this year. Some jobs will certainly be created by supply side reform, some by growth, but there is not an automatic equalisation between growth and jobs, as hon. Members will realise. On any rational expectation, a satisfactory GATT agreement will also create a significant number of jobs. There is a series of events in train that can help to put people back to work. That is certainly our objective.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As the substantial and exciting tariff reductions that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister fought so hard to achieve can be frustrated if the GATT round breaks down, what on earth can we do if the European Community is unwilling to reduce its agricultural expenditure which is currently beating every previous record, with the mountains of food breaking every previous record? Would it not greatly help the GATT discussions that the Prime Minister has worked so splendidly on if some member state within the EC would propose that either the CAP should be scrapped or that individual nations should be entitled to disengage from it? Would not that help my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in the fantastically good job that he did at Tokyo?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his helpful contribution. The Government agree with him on the need for CAP reform, and there has been some reform of the common agricultural policy. No doubt more will be necessary, but we will certainly endeavour to persuade all our European partners not to stand in the way of a comprehensive trade agreement.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): In his opening statement, the Prime Minister referred to discussions on the behaviour of Iraq. What hard evidence did either the Americans or President Clinton give about the involvement of the Iraqi state in the so-called attempted assassination of President Bush in Kuwait? Is it likely, if it was Saddam Hussein's handiwork, that the would-be assassins would run out of petrol and not know where the university of Kuwait was? Will he be very careful before endorsing further military action and the launching of missiles on Baghdad?

The Prime Minister: I will send the hon. Gentleman a copy of the remarks concerning the behaviour of Iraq that were made recently by Ms Albright at the Security Council of the United Nations, which I think he will find of some interest. In the past couple of days, we have also seen obstruction of the United Nations weapons inspectors. I think that is a provocation. It stands in stark contrast to Iraq's obligations under Security Council resolutions and, clearly, that matter will now have to go back to the Security Council.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): May I ask my right hon. Friend—who always represents Britain at meetings of Heads of Government with distinction—a similar question to that which I asked him when he returned recently from the European summit in Copenhagen? What is the point of repeated high-flown communiqués drawing attention to the urgent need to reduce unemployment, when its principal creator, the central bank of Germany, is outside democratic control? Has my right hon. Friend, with his usual tact, reminded his German colleagues of the fact that it was not inflation but unemployment that brought down the Weimar Republic and put Adolf Hitler into power?

The Prime Minister: I cannot say that I made that particular point in that fashion at the summit discussions, but we indicated the importance that we attach to unemployment when we were in Copenhagen, bilaterally with other European and other Heads of Government, and again in Japan. I think there is a level of understanding about the concern that people feel about the problem that did not exist even a few months ago. I know that my hon. Friend's remarks will be read carefully in other places.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is not there an air of unreality about the fact that the Prime Minister had to go all the way to Tokyo to tell us that they have discovered unemployment in Britain? If he had asked in any region of the British Isles, he would have found out that everyone knows that there is a lot of unemployment in Britain. Instead of swapping advice with other Heads of State about how to fiddle the figures in different countries, and talking about level economic playing fields when there cannot be such a thing in the world, why does not he do something here at home, and save the pits, stop shutting the shipyards, save the engineering base, reintroduce exchange controls and introduce import controls? That is the way to save jobs in Britain.

The Prime Minister: I am sure that someone would have made a similar speech following the invention of the wheel.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Did my right hon. Friend make it clear at the summit that there will be no deeper involvement of our limited forces in Bosnia, or any mad adventure there, notwithstanding the blandishments of the armchair television warriors on the other side of the House? Will he suggest to them that, if they want a deeper involvement, they had better go out there and serve themselves?

The Prime Minister: I have said on a number of occasions that we have made a contribution in terms of troops to humanitarian aid. There has been a call by the United Nations for more troops. I think that that call should be met by those countries that have not yet contributed.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): While I recognise that every Member of the House will welcome the fact that the GATT round of talks seems to be under way again, will the Prime Minister say whether he believes in his heart of hearts that a conclusion can be reached by mid December?

As to the agreement on Scotch whisky reached by the quadrilateral partners, does the Prime Minister accept that throwaway remarks suggesting that it will be to the benefit of Scotland really mean that it will be to the benefit of the Exchequer? While the agreement may help to retain jobs in the whisky industry in Scotland, it will not create them. The issue underpinning that industry, which is a major exporter, is the need to eradicate the internal excise duty levied by Japan, which disadvantages Scotch whisky and other spirits produced in this country by £4 to £6.

The Prime Minister: As to the hon. Lady's first point, I think that a settlement can be reached. I cannot be certain because many complex matters have yet to be determined. I am in no doubt now that one can be reached, and I am delighted that the talks in Geneva recommenced this morning.

As the hon. Lady said, there are two elements in the difficulties faced by Scotch whisky in the Japanese market. One is the external tariff. When a settlement is reached, it will disappear entirely—100 per cent. of the external tariff will go. The other is the internal taxation level. We have been pursuing with the Japanese—and I did so again with Prime Minister Miyazawa—the high level of taxation on Scotch whisky. We will continue to do that in the hope of having it reduced. There has already been a significant reduction, or there will be, with the removal of the external tariff.

As I said in my statement, £170 million of exports go to Japan. As Scotch whisky will in future be cheaper, it is likely that exports will increase. That will certainly safeguard jobs, and I am not sure why the hon. Lady is so certain that it will not create them as well.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Is my right hon. Friend aware that perhaps the most popular policy being pursued by his Government at the moment is that of deregulation? It would be even more popular if it were more widely known. Can my right hon. Friend assure the House that he was able to persuade his G7 partners that that is a popular and necessary part of a world policy, which will make the lives of small businesses in particular rather more fruitful in future?

The Prime Minister: They seemed persuaded. We shall see whether action follows the gentle response when I made that point in discussions. I believe that there is an understanding that there need to be supply side changes to create employment. One important change, as my hon. Friend said, is deregulation.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): On the question of Bosnia, the Prime Minister has sometimes given the impression that all the expert advice that he receives is that the west should not get involved in using military force to deter territorial aggression, first in Croatia and then in Bosnia. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm whether that is the uniform advice that he is receiving, or do senior diplomatic and military figures say that we could and should use military force to stop the slaughter in the former Yugoslavia?

The Prime Minister: I have received no advice either from senior diplomats or from military figures that a solution could be imposed by military force.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Will my right hon. Friend accept the congratulations of my constituents, who are heavily involved in the textile and agriculture industries, on the results of the Tokyo summit? We are pleased at the 50 per cent. reduction in textile tariffs as against the United States. However, if that agreement cannot be put in place by December, does he understand that there will be a need for further reductions in the 50 per cent. tariff ratio so that we may achieve far better exports of British textile goods to the United States.

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. I hope that we will achieve the settlement by December. In any event, that is not the end of the matter. Although a 50 per cent. reduction in tariffs is certainly welcome, we would have preferred a larger reduction—but that was what was negotiable on that particular occasion. I hope that we will return to that matter and seek an even larger reduction in the tariff, up to its complete elimination.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): Perhaps I may pursue the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), in response to which the Prime Minister seemed to be well intentioned and sincere in his desire to reduce unemployment but vague as to what he would do. Will the right hon. Gentleman share with the House a little more what new specific policy and initiatives the Government are currently examining which they may take to any new employment summit in the autumn?

The Prime Minister: As I said earlier, there was a range of matters to deal with unemployment. One is deregulation, which has just been mentioned. Not to impose extra costs on employers, as the social chapter would, is a second illustration of what needs to be done. Other measures include policies that will enable the economy to grow—as we have been seeking to do—and to protect capital investment, as we did in the previous public expenditure round. There are also the international macro points that I mentioned earlier: the United States is tackling its budget deficit, Japan will continue to support domestic demand as necessary, and in continental Europe there will be a move towards a reduction in interest rates. The necessity and attraction of closing the fiscal deficit in this country, as in other countries, is that it will be easier to make further interest rate reductions.

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the positive and warm support he receives from Conservative Members for the achievements of the summit, especially the progress towards freer world trade and the greater advantage that that will have for our manufacturing industry? Will he now renew his efforts among our European partners to ensure that they all share our enthusiasm for free world trade?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I will certainly do that. A number of our European partners are also firm advocates of free trade. There are one or two who are slightly less firm in their advocacy and we shall endeavour to encourage them. We are not the only advocates of free trade in Europe; a number of other nations wholly share our views.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): How much of the money that has been allocated to Russia will go towards helping to dismantle its nuclear weapons? Would not it impress the other G7 countries if, instead of talking about the nuclear non-proliferation treaty in glowing terms, the Prime Minister did something about it by introducing a programme in the United Kingdom to shift our manufacturing base away from producing weapons of war to manufacturing for peace and getting rid of Trident nuclear weapons? On the basis of his argument, our jobs will depend on either the manufacture or maintenance of weapons of mass extermination for the next 20 years. Is that his policy?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman refers to weapons of mass extermination, when nuclear weapons act as a deterrent to protect the nation. That is their purpose. If the hon. Gentleman is so keen for us not to manufacture them, I hope that he will make that point equally clearly in Barrow and Devonport and that he has previously made it in Rosyth. His point rings with a rather curious air against representations made by many of his hon. Friends during recent months.

Mr. Cryer: What about diversification?

The Prime Minister: On the question of Russia, to which I was just coming, we are already helping the Russians with the transport of nuclear weapons and with technical help on their destruction. That is of importance to Russia, and, as his right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition mentioned earlier, it is important to Ukraine, where further progress needs to be made.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): As my constituency is not far from that of the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) and as it produces pharmaceuticals, chemicals, engineering products and other products that fall into the eight areas on which, it has been agreed, tariffs will not be imposed in the future, may I warmly congratulate the Prime Minister on negotiating away those tariffs? I hope that he will bring as much pressure to bear as he can to end the GATT round as soon as possible.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I certainly undertake to do that, and I am grateful for his earlier remarks.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I noted with interest the Prime Minister's reference to the Rio accord, which is intended to underpin all economic and trade policies henceforth. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is aware that a recent United States district court ruling meant that the north American free trade agreement could not be ratified because it did not include an environmental impact statement. Is not it possible that a similar fate might await the GATT agreement and that that could unravel the whole round? In that case, will the Prime Minister give some detail about the nature of the environmental discussion in Tokyo and the effect on the agreement there?

The Prime Minister: One of the significant points made in the discussion on the environment at Tokyo was that President Clinton pledged himself wholeheartedly to the Rio accords. That was a shift of policy for the United States and one that was very welcome. As the hon. Gentleman may know, much work has been going on following Rio to produce national plans for sustainable development, for dealing with climate change, for biodiversity and for forests by the end of 1993. There have been meetings of the United Nations commission on sustainable development; the most recent was in New York last month. Developed and developing countries are now working together actively to put the Rio commitments into practice. Rio is becoming a reality.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): Does my right hon. Friend agree that many of the issues that figured most prominently at Tokyo, such as cutting deficits, deregulation and improving the flexibility of the labour market, were issues of British concern? Just as at Copenhagen, the agenda reflected Britain's concerns. Does my right hon. Friend further agree that there is growing evidence that Britain's case is prevailing, both in Europe and in the rest of the world?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right about that point. It was very striking in the Copenhagen discussions just a few weeks ago and it was equally evident in our discussions in Tokyo last week. One of the reasons for that is that we went into the recession earlier than many other countries did. There is nothing like a recession to concentrate people's minds on the reality of what needs to be done. Many countries, now that they are entering recession, are having to look, just as we have done, at some very hard decisions to help people and to recreate jobs.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): The Prime Minister conceded earlier that Japan was not experiencing high levels of unemployment. While he was in Tokyo, did he take the opportunity to look at what is happening in Japan? Did he notice, for example, that the Japanese are spending $70 billion in public works programmes to expand the economy? Did he notice that Japanese employers are trying to hold on to their workers and are not taking every opportunity to cut the work force? Did he notice that they are not as obsessed with the flexible labour market ideology? In fact, the Japanese Government and Japanese employers cannot understand all the fuss about the social market. Did the Prime Minister notice that, in spite of all that, it is the Japanese who have the substantial balance of payments surplus and that it is we who have the balance of payments deficit? When will he abandon the outdated Thatcherite philosophy and look at what really works in this world?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman may care to study Japan a little more closely before he entirely advocates that. He might, for example, not be entirely happy if we reduced our public spending share of gross domestic product to the Japanese level. That would make a significant difference and one that would be pretty unwelcome to the hon. Gentleman. If he looked at the social costs in Japan, he might also be just a little less enthusiastic. If he looked at some of the wage levels in parts of Japan, he might be a good deal less enthusiastic. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman spends his holiday in Japan.

Points of Order

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. This is a genuine point of order on which I have had discussions with my right hon. and learned Friend the shadow Attorney-General and a number of colleagues.

You will recollect and have had it brought to your attention, Madam Speaker, that in 1941 one of your predecessors, Mr. Speaker Clifton Brown, took exception to the various efforts made to raise under the emergency procedure the fall of Singapore before it actually happened. Are we to understand that your advice is that if there is a serious threat of military action whose importance is not challenged and whose urgency is not challenged, but which may not meet the third criterion, which is that it is definite, you cannot hear a Standing Order No. 20 application?

Bluntly, it is appalling that the House of Commons should face the situation where, apparently, there is British endorsement of a United Nations plan to launch missiles on a foreign city, Baghdad, which the House cannot discuss before it has actually happened. Will you, Madam Speaker, reflect over the next 24 hours and come up with a ruling on the conditions in which you will hear an application under Standing Order No. 20 in the case of possible military action?

Madam Speaker: I cannot anticipate what may or may not happen in an emergency. I must look at every application on its merits and I do precisely that. But as the hon. Gentleman knows, there have to be new developments. This is a continuing situation and there must be a new immediate development before I can grant an application. I look at each application to me entirely on its merits and will continue to do so.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I ask that you give a ruling debarring hon. Members who are Lloyd's names from voting on Report this evening or tomorrow on Third Reading. If hon. Members who are Lloyd's names vote themselves tax privileges which are worth perhaps thousands—or even tens of thousands—of pounds, that is tantamount to them putting their hands on taxpayers' money and putting it straight into their wallets.

Lloyd's names have a direct pecuniary interest and "Erskine May" cites a whole series of precedents in which hon. Members are debarred from voting. I realise that they mostly concern private Bills and that the Finance (No. 2) Bill is a public Bill. Nevertheless, the 14 clauses and two schedules in the Bill that apply exclusively to Lloyd's affect uniquely and personally those 44 Members who are shown on the Register of Members' Interests as having an interest in Lloyd's. Therefore, I feel that they should be debarred from voting, and I ask you to give that ruling.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) raised an important distinction between a private Bill and a public Bill. The Finance (No. 2) Bill is a public Bill.

I draw specific attention to amendment No. 21, which you have selected for debate this afternoon. It renders the special reserve funds liable to tax. My submission is that that represents an immediate and personal interest on the part of those hon. Members who are Lloyd's names.

No doubt, Madam Speaker, you will refer me to the ruling that your predecessor made on 14 January 1986 at column 1013 when the issue before the House was whether hon. Members who were Lloyd's names could vote for an amendment that widened the scope of the Finance Bill. Your predecessor quite rightly held that, on a matter extending the scope of the Bill, the House was dealing with a public matter.

In my submission, there is a difference. We are not talking about the scope of a public Bill. We are talking about an amendment, which, if pressed to a vote, would result in tax privileges being available to a number of hon. Members, all of whom are Conservative. It would be useful if you would give a ruling at to what exactly is meant by an "immediate and personal" interest, which is referred to on page 354 of the current edition of "Erskine May".

Finally, Madam Speaker, you will be aware that the matter was raised on 24 March 1981 by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) in relation to the Lloyd's Bill. Mr. Speaker advised Members that if there was any doubt on the matter, they should not vote.

It would be helpful if you would let us have a ruling as the matter is of interest not just to Members of the House. Members of the public would like to be assured that the House would not let a situation arise where Members who had a vested interest in their own benefit were allowed to vote in a way that other members of the public were precluded from doing.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I think that I can now deal with those points of order if I may be allowed to do so.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Shame.

Madam Speaker: Yes, it is a shame but we ought to make some progress and I am quite prepared to deal with those points of order.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) for giving me notice that he would raise this matter. The rule against voting on a matter in which a Member has a personal pecuniary interest does not apply on a public Bill so long as other similarly situated persons will benefit in the same way.

The provisions of the Finance (No. 2) Bill are not confined to those members of Lloyd's who are also Members of the House. There is no prohibition on such Members voting on this matter of public policy.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have not finished. Hon. Members should not be so impatient, but should listen to my entire ruling. The House will expect members of Lloyd's affected by the Bill who speak in the debates on the relevant clauses to declare their interest.

Mr. Darling: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I should like to be clear about the matter. Do I understand that the effect of your ruling is that, because there are members of Lloyd's who are not Members of Parliament, Conservative Members of Parliament can vote for the measure, notwithstanding the fact that they gain direct benefit? I understand that a further procedure has to be invoked. However, the House must look at such circumstances because many people regard that as rather unfair.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. Let me take the matter a stage further because I want it to be clear to the House. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) is quite right. The measure affects other individuals outside the House and, for the sake of completeness, I shall leave the House with this thought. If I ruled that no hon. Member could ever vote on a measure that would allow him or her to enjoy benefits available to others, the House would never be able to vote for a reduction in income tax. I hope that that clarifies the point. I have given my ruling and I will accept no further points of order on that matter.

Mr. Jonathan Evans (Brecon and Radnor): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is it a different one?

Mr. Evans: It is an entirely fresh point of order, Madam Speaker. May I have your guidance on clarification of the position under Standing Order No. 31, which, as you know, deals with the selection of amendments, so as to assist Back Benchers in future over the submission of amendments at this stage of consideration of a Bill? I am referring specifically to the Finance Bill.

The point is covered on page 502 of "Erskine May", which says that the power is exercised by the Speaker as "a check upon excessive repetition of debates which have already taken place in committee."

I have in mind that, on 10 May, the House, in Committee, spent a full day debating issues that appear to be grouped together under amendment No. 7 and other amendments on the provisional selection list.

I do not question your selection in any way, Madam Speaker, but I should like to know whether there has been any change in the guidelines or in Standing Orders, given that "Erskine May" says that that is a power that Speakers tend to exercise "rigorously".

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman will find that "Erskine May" also says that the Speaker has total discretion over the selection of amendments. Irrespective of whether a matter has been debated earlier, it is at the discretion of the Speaker to decide whether to select such amendments for debate during our consideration of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I did not get involved in the points of order raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and for Neath (Mr. Hain) because they dealt adequately with those points, which you then answered. However, in your answer——

Mr. Dickens: Ah, the hon. Gentleman will get involved now.

Mr. Skinner: No, this is straight and above board. In your answer, Madam Speaker, you said that if the rule were applied in the way that we wanted, hon. Members could not vote on a reduction in income tax because we would all benefit, as well as those outside. The clear distinction is that, while all Members of Parliament would benefit from a reduction in income tax from 25 to 20 per cent., or even to 15 per cent., in the Lloyd's case, only 44 Tory Members will benefit.

Madam Speaker: Clause 123 relates to Members of Parliament, but not all Members will benefit from it. That is quite distinct from the taxation point. I have given my ruling on the matter, and we should not now return to it.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On an entirely separate point of order, Madam Speaker. One of the developments that has taken place since I was elected in 1974 is that the House has adopted a much more tightly controlled attitude towards Members' financial interests. In the circumstances, would not it be helpful if you asked either the Select Committee on Members' Interests or the Select Committee on Procedure to look at the position of those who have financial interests and their voting abilities? I am not challenging your ruling because, unfortunately, I do not have the power to do that, but it might seem outside that it is inconsistent with the development of tighter scrutiny in the House.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman can make such references himself. I am certain that my ruling will be seen to be accurate and logical when it has been printed and reflected on.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have listened carefully to what you have said. You commented that if hon. Members who are also members of Lloyd's speak during the debate, they should declare an interest. Will you reflect and make a ruling before tonight's vote on whether those hon. Members should also declare an interest before they vote?

Madam Speaker: The interests are contained in the Register of Members' Interests. I am advising Members who wish to speak that they must declare an interest when they do so. Hon. Members have never been called upon to declare an interest before they enter the Division Lobby.

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Are there any matters of public policy that are decided in the House that do not affect people outside the House?

Madam Speaker: I think that I require notice of that question.

Mr. Boyce: I am sure that you will get that for tomorrow.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wish to raise a point that concerns the general principle of declaration of hon. Members' interests. I am not a Lloyd's name. Does an hon. Member have to declare an interest at the onset of his speech, or can he simply allude to it during that speech? The 44 Lloyd's members on the Conservative Benches should, if they catch your eye, declare an interest at the beginning of any intervention that they make.

Madam Speaker: The procedures of the House on this matter are clear and direct. An hon. Member must declare an interest immediately on standing to speak.

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans). I seek your guidance, Madam Speaker, on the group of amendments starting with amendment No. 7. Many of the amendments deal with the same point and could be described as repetitive and overlapping. Have the guidelines for those matters changed?

Madam Speaker: No. We never allow repetition or overlapping to occur in the House. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not challenging my selection of amendments.

Mr. Dickens: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wish to make a point about fair play. I rose following your response to the first point of order, and you would not allow me to continue because you said that you had given an answer. You have since called four Opposition Members to speak on the same subject. I shall not detain the House by pressing you on this, Madam Speaker, but I like to see fair play.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman often rises to say that I have been particularly fair. If he reflects on Hansard tomorrow, he may see that the points to which he refers which were raised by hon. Members were separate from my ruling.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek advice from you for the future.

Madam Speaker: Is it on the group of amendments starting with No. 7?

Mr. Butterfill: My point relates to petroleum revenue tax, and the concerns of hon. Members on that subject. We know that the matter was debated extensively on Second Reading and that some amendments that were tabled by members of the Committee were ruled out of order for various reasons.

The issue is complex and hon. Members have taken counsel's opinion on the amendments that have been tabled today to ensure that they are in order. Although I appreciate that the matter was explored at some length in Committee, the concept of transitional arrangements was not so explored. Is there a way in which, in the future, hon. Members can frame amendments so that we can be sure that they will be in order and available for consideration?

Madam Speaker: I am sure that the Public Bill Office, which is open all hours, will be extremely helpful.

Ways and Means

Scottish Trusts

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to trusts having effect under the law of Scotland where the trustees are resident in the United Kingdom.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Not amended (in the Committee) and as amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New clause 17

SCOTTISH TRUSTS

'.—(1) Where—

(a) any of the income of a trust having effect under the law of Scotland is income to which a beneficiary of the trust would have an equitable right in possession if that trust had effect under the law of England and Wales, and

(b) the trustees of that trust are resident in the United Kingdom, the rights of that beneficiary shall be deemed for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts to include such a right to that income notwithstanding that no such right is conferred according to the law of Scotland.

(2) This section shall have effect in relation to the income of any trust for the year 1993-94 or any subsequent year of assessment.'.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.39 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The purpose of the new clause is to apply the same income tax treatment to beneficiaries with an interest in possession in the income of a trust governed by Scots law as applies to beneficiaries with an interest in possession in the income of a trust governed by English law. At present, beneficiaries of English and Scottish trusts are treated differently because of the differences in the underlying legal position.

We discussed this point in Committee, and the new clause responds to the undertaking that I gave there to bring the two systems into line. Scottish lawyers who are present may recognise that we have done this by aligning Scottish legal practice with the practice in England. That may not be the best solution in the context of Scottish nationalism, but in the time available it seemed the most practical way of responding to the concerns expressed in Committee.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): We welcome the new clause, which we pressed for in Committee. I am glad that, in a comparatively short time, the Government have met our objections. There remain one or two matters that might be dealt with in the Finance Bill to be introduced at the end of this year. I understand that one or two parts of the new clause might be better phrased—according to some of my colleagues who regularly practise in Scotland.

First, it is suggested that the phrase,

"having effect under the law of Scotland"

might be better expressed as

"a trust, the proper law of which is the law of Scotland".

Such matters of definition are important. Without the change, the measure would also affect an English trust that happened to have land in Scotland.

As the House is anxious to make progress on other matters I will write to the Minister with my other suggestions. Meanwhile, we welcome the new clause, without which Scottish beneficiaries of a trust would have been treated less favourably than English ones.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The Minister said that there are reasons why this form of new clause might not be so welcome as its purpose. When the issue was first raised in Committee, the effect of the Bill as it then stood being to treat dividends received through trusts in Scotland differently from those in England, the Minister was at first unpersuaded. He said that as the payment received in the Scottish case is not a dividend it would be wrong to treat it as though it were. He then listened to our arguments and was eventually persuaded that something had to be done.

Meanwhile, my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) wrote to the Lord Advocate pointing out that in his view a breach of article 4 of the treaty of union might be involved because that treaty provides that "all rights, privileges and advantages which do or may belong to a subject of either kingdom should be communicated to the subjects of the other".

The combined considerations of the Lord Advocate and the Minister resulted in a Government willingness to table a new clause to sort out the matter.

The Minister must not be surprised to learn that Members who have a concern for Scots law are unhappy that a form of words should have been chosen which treats the matter as an extension of English law instead of changing the Scottish legal basis. The new clause uses the words:

"notwithstanding that no such right is conferred according to the law of Scotland".

My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland tabled an amendment—probably in order, but not chosen—which dealt with the matter via the law of Scotland. Although the Minister seemed to hint that considerations of time had driven him to this desperate expedient, I cannot believe that any technical failing in my hon. Friend's amendment could not have been improved by the efforts of the Lord Advocate's Department, assisted by the Treasury. That could have produced an amendment framed within Scots law.

Treasury Ministers may not be aware of the strong feeling in Scotland that a sort of legal imperialism prevails under which the Scots legal framework, the Scots statute book and Scots common law are all gradually eroded by United Kingdom legislation being tacked on to Scottish law. Law Bills relating to England and Wales often have clauses relating to Scotland added to them, with the result that the law of Scotland is not contained in a distinctive statute book or in Scots common law.

The Minister was thus right to anticipate that there would be some criticism on this score, and right to expect some lamentation over the fact that the practice of bolting bits of English law on to Scots law continues. It was not really necessary to go about the matter in this way.

Mr. Dorrell: My original remarks were not intended to cast a slur on the Scottish National party—I can cast slights in its direction on other occasions, but I was not trying to do so this time. I merely recognised that the drafting of the new clause involves an infelicity from the point of view of Scots law. I do not accept that it could have been easily reconciled, as the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) suggested. He said that we should have spoken to the Lord Advocate. I can assure him that the Treasury has access to his advice. We did not, in the time available, find a better way of achieving the objective.

4.45 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Is the Minister perfectly relaxed about the compatibility of this measure with European Community law? The European Court of Justice is a court superior to both English and Scottish legal systems.

Mr. Dorrell: I am satisfied that the measure does not cause a problem with the ECJ.

We have sought to respond to the practical concern expressed in Committee——

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Will the Minister answer the point about a possible breach of the treaty of union being involved? Has he consulted the Lord Advocate on that aspect? Has the latter yet replied to the leader of the Liberal party in Scotland, the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), on that point? The Minister seems to be treating the matter very lightly indeed.

Mr. Dorrell: Not at all. I recognise that this is a matter of some concern in the Scottish legal fraternity and among those who follow Scottish legal affairs. In the limited time available between the Committee and Report stages, it seemed to the Government more important to respond to the practical concern expressed in Committee than to perfect the drafting in such a way as to meet all concerns. I commend the new clause to the House. '

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

COMMENCEMENT OF SECTION 174

'Section 174 of this Act shall not come into force until such time as the Board have by regulations provided that no payments shall be made from a special reserve fund except as provided for under Schedule 20 to this Act.'.—[Mr. Darling.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Darling: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: new clause 2—Payment under section 174—

'No payment shall be made from a special reserve fund established under section 174 of this Act except for the purposes expressly provided for in Schedule 20 to this Act.'.

Amendment No. 29, in clause 183, page 142, line 26, leave out from the beginning to end of line 28 and insert—

'(3) The provisions of this Chapter shall come into force on such date as a Minister of the Crown may by order made by statutory instrument appoint; and different days may be so appointed for different provisions or for different purposes.

(4) No order shall be made under this section unless a draft thereof has been laid before and approved by the Commons House of Parliament.'.

Amendment No. 6, in schedule 20, page 291 line 42, at end insert—

'(3) The arrangements must be such as to secure that, except as required or permitted (whether expressly or by necessary implication) by this Part or Part II of this Schedule, no payments shall be made into or out of the member's special reserve fund.'.

Amendment No. 21, in schedule 20, page 294, leave out lines 27 to 29.

Mr. Darling: We come now to a debate on Lloyd's and the special reserve fund, the subject of an extensive discussion in Committee. We touched on some of the issues during points of order to Madam Speaker, mentioning the difficulties in which some Conservative Members might find themselves because they are Lloyd's names. Looking around, it is clear to me that many of them have absented themselves from the debate because of the difficulties, but I am sure that when the bell sounds they will come back to vote.

This group of clauses and schedule 20 create a special reserve fund to enable Lloyd's names to put money aside to meet insurance losses. We are not against the principle of making provision by means of such reserves—they are a thoroughly good thing—but our objection throughout has been that we should not allow Lloyd's names to benefit from a device that will enable them to shelter large sums from tax.

One of our principal objections was that under the Bill as drafted it would be possible for a Lloyd's name to put aside sums into the special reserve fund, to shelter them tax free, to see them accumulate and then to withdraw them at will to gain maximum tax advantage. In Committee, we pressed a series of amendments to prevent that happening. To our great surprise, the Government tabled an amendment last week in which they effectively climbed down from the position that they had adopted in Committee, and accepted that the Opposition amendments had a substantial point. The Government's amendment and our new clauses 1 and 2 seek to do the same thing: they would stop the special reserve funds from being used as a tax shelter by Lloyd's names.

I welcome Government amendment No. 6, because it will prevent Lloyd's names from using the special reserve fund for anything other than meeting insurance losses. I am sure that that was the intention of the legislation and that will be its effect. I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for reconsidering the matter. He has certainly departed from the suggestion made in Committee by some of his hon. Friends that the Opposition were raising a matter that had no basis. The Government now admit that it has a substantial basis, and I am sure that they agree that it would be wrong to allow Lloyd's names to use the special reserve fund as a tax shelter. For that reason, we welcome the Government amendment.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the welcome he has given to the amendment. I hope that he will accept that it is hardly a climbdown for the Government to table an amendment that has the effect of ensuring that the result sought by both sides of the Committee is delivered by the legislation. Our policy objective has been unchanged throughout consideration of the Bill.

Mr. Darling: I understand that the Financial Secretary must preserve his position. If tackled by his hon. Friends, ministerial colleagues or the Prime Minister, he can point to this passage in Hansard and say that he has put on record the fact that the Government were not climbing down. If that is not the case, why did so many of his hon. Friends accuse us of scaremongering and raising falsely-based fears?

I am sure that the Minister will accept that, had we not pressed the matter and drawn attention to the fact that a tax shelter would be created, no amendment would have been tabled and Lloyd's names would have been able to use the special reserve fund as a tax shelter. It is important to recognise that the Government have now accepted our position, and that the possibility of using the special reserve fund as a tax shelter has been virtually shut off.

Mr. Dorrell: I do not accept that in the absence of this amendment it would have been possible to use the special reserve fund as a tax shelter. I made it clear in Committee that the safeguards against that eventuality were contained in the deed establishing the trust fund. I said to the Committee:

"We are debating now into which piece of paper the principle should be written."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 17 June 1993; c. 495.]

In response to the views expressed in Committee, we have written it into both pieces of paper.

Mr. Darling: The Minister is being tenacious. I remember that he said that it did not matter in which piece of paper it was contained. Our preference is to have that tax loophole shut off by this particular piece of paper because this is the statute and the law. We do not want to leave it to the discretion of those who draft the trust fund documents. Nevertheless, we give the Government amendment a fulsome welcome.

Amendment No. 21 deserves attention. We will seek a Division on it at an appropriate time, although that may be some hours, if not days, away. Amendment No. 21 would have the effect of rendering the special reserve fund liable for tax on an annual basis. At the moment, paragraph 9, schedule 20 provides:

"Profits or losses arising from assets forming part of a special reserve fund shall be excluded for the purposes of income tax . . . and for the purposes of capital gains tax".

This matter was discussed briefly in Committee because the main part of the debate was taken up by our principal objection. We were not entirely convinced by the Minister's argument.

It is important that we should accept that, while Lloyd's names should not be discriminated against under the tax system, neither should they be unduly favoured in a way that most members of the public would find intolerable.

I think it is important to put on record the importance of Lloyd's. That point is usually raised by Conservative Members, although not many are here today. Lloyd's is crucial to the United Kingdom, not only because of its reputation—which remains formidable, despite its recent well-publicised difficulties—but for its contributions to the country's earnings. Although Lloyd's has recorded record losses in recent years, the fact that it has significant potential for earnings in the future is important.

Subject to its unique structure, Lloyd's should, in principle and in general, be treated in the same way as any other taxpayer. It should be encouraged but not favoured, and should stand on its own feet. There should be no question of the Government being allowed or encouraged to bail out names who are in financial difficulties. Reports of certain names—particularly those who are Members of the House—being in severe financial difficulties and in danger of eventual bankruptcy are somewhat exaggerated. I notice that the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) agrees.

No matter the difficulties faced by those hon. Members, even if in extremis, I am sure that the good and the great who bankroll the Tory party will step in and ensure that they are not disbarred from being Members of the House.

As to names who are not Members of the House, when they went into Lloyd's they were, by any standard, sufficiently well off to take advice; they knew, or should have known, the risks that they were taking. They were well placed to take the advice which most people would take before joining and becoming names.

As I have said, I do not believe that Lloyd's names should be given preferential treatment or more favourable treatment and opportunity than those who take risks in other industries. As I understand it, it is not possible for people in similar positions to make a general provision against future losses. Lloyd's names are being treated in a slightly different way from people in other industries. For example, it is not possible for someone running a small business to accumulate money, tax free, against future losses—I am sure that many wish that they could. We should look long and hard before we give a particular privilege to Lloyd's when there is no justification for doing so.

Amendment No. 21 would subject the funds in the special reserve fund to taxation, which is entirely reasonable. No doubt the Minister will argue that the money can only be used, for the most part, to meet insurance losses. We agree with that. However, on cessation of business, when a Lloyd's name ceases to underwrite and winds up his or her special trust fund, there is a pay-out. I am concerned that, although there is a ceiling of 50 per cent. of profits on the fund, the money could accumulate, tax free—over the years the sum could be quite substantial—and the Lloyd's name could then choose when to cease underwriting to achieve the maximum tax advantage. That is why we raised the matter in Committee and, now, on Report.

The Minister will no doubt talk about the importance of Lloyd's names being able to make provisions against future losses. He will also make the point, with some force, that many of the difficulties in which Lloyd's names currently find themselves would not have arisen had they made provisions against future losses. All of that is true up to a point. As I said in Committee, we are not against special reserve funds; indeed, as the Minister reminded me in Committee, it was a Labour Chancellor, Sir Stafford Cripps, as he then was, who made that provision.

Currently, the maximum contribution limit is £7,000. We are proposing a much higher ceiling and it is therefore important to look again at the taxation provisions. That is why we attach so much importance to stopping the special reserve fund from being used as a tax shelter. I believe that to complete the process the assets in the fund should be subject to income tax or capital gains tax, as the case may be, to prevent accumulation.

Lest anybody feels that we are being unfair to Lloyd's, or discriminating against it, the House should note that the management of Lloyd's has taken substantial steps to put the organisation on a proper footing.

It is all but publicly admitted that self-regulation has failed and it can be strongly argued that the Lloyd's Act 1982 needs to be repealed and replaced. We know why that will not happen. Notwithstanding Madam Speaker's ruling a short time ago, the whole question of the conflict of interest of some hon. Members, as Lloyd's names, would arise were the 1982 Act revisited.

It highlights the fact that many Tory Members cannot consider the City, in particular Lloyd's, objectively because the wealth of so many of them is tied up in it. That is intolerable and should not be allowed to happen. Lloyd's must be considered in the same way as other companies. Its future should not be influenced by the fact that so many Tory Members have a vested personal interest in it. The fact that the Government have a small majority in the House means that their judgment is impaired because so many Tory Members—not just Back Benchers but at least four members of the Cabinet—are Lloyd's names. We should all pause to consider the fact that the Government would be prevented from looking at the Lloyd's Act again because so many Tory Members cannot make an impartial judgment on the matter.

Lloyd's management anticipates that profits will return by the 1995 year of account. Together with the measures that it is taking to deal with the pre-1985 losses, that shows that Lloyd's can be put back on a proper footing. Those steps and the taxation measures that we are asked to approve tonight lead us to suppose that, even with the taxation that we propose, Lloyd's names will be treated fairly and need have nothing to complain about.

The importance of Lloyd's and the fact that its management is trying to put the business on a proper footing must be emphasised. We do not want to discriminate against Lloyd's but to ensure that it will be treated in the same way as other taxpayers, whether corporate or individual.

The United Kingdom insurance industry must be able to make provision for losses. That is one of its problems in competing against other EC countries. The fiscal regime, particularly in France and Germany, allows companies to make provision against future claims. In this country, it is impossible to do that on the same scale. Although the Government are now consulting on the matter, they have yet to decide what to do. However, it is important that we accept the provision against future claims.

We must remember that Lloyd's is not a corporation or normal insurance company. The difference is that individual taxation is at stake. I am in favour of allowing provision against future losses but we must be careful when dealing with individual taxation to ensure that, as far as possible, we treat individual names in the same way as other taxpayers engaged in investing their money. It is important not to discriminate against others who try to invest their money in industry, for example.

Mr. Dorrell: I agree with the hon. Gentleman but seek further precise clarification. If we were to introduce reserving for catastrophe insurance for the corporate insurance industry, does he think that that would validate similar reserving arrangements in Lloyd's?

Mr. Darling: As I was about to say, a distinction must be made. In general, we would support the principle of reserving for corporations but in Lloyd's there is a difficulty. By the time the Government introduce those measures there may be more corporate members of Lloyd's, in which case their taxation will be akin to that of other insurance companies. The difficulty with Lloyd's is that in future there will be two classes of names: first, incorporated capital, with which I have dealt, and, secondly, individual names who will be taxed broadly like individual taxpayers. Naturally, special provisions are made for Lloyd's. That is where the difficulty arises.

As I said in Committee, I am prepared to allow individual names to make provisions against further losses provided, first, that they cannot use the device to shelter earnings against tax—that matter has already been dealt with—and, secondly, that they cannot accumulate money tax free within the special reserve fund and therefore secure an advantage that is not available to other individual taxpayers. That is what amendment No. 21 strikes at.

Mr. Beith: In Committee we seemed to agree on the principle that any relief allowed to Lloyd's names should be on a basis comparable to that available in the rest of the insurance industry. The hon. Gentleman has argued that that comparability will not apply under the Bill and that, if it did, he would still not be in favour of names having tax relief on provisioning. I do not understand that.

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Gentleman is unnecessarily confused. There is a distinction between the taxation of corporations, to use a general term, and the taxation of individual taxpayers. Both sides of the Committee broadly welcomed the principle of reserving and we hope that the Government will make proposals for the United Kingdom insurance industry. The difficulty in Lloyd's is that, at present, all its names are individual taxpayers. I suspect that in future an increasing number of its names will be corporate taxpayers. But, so long as they are individual taxpayers, we should accept the principle of reserving, which we do by allowing the creation of a special reserve fund. I am simply concerned that it should not confer an additional benefit over and above what is necessary to encourage reserving. That is why we wanted to close the tax loophole. The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) was against that.

We also want to prevent the accumulation of large sums of capital tax free, which is a concession that is not available to others engaged in industrial enterprise. So long as individual taxpayers are Lloyd's names, there will always be a problem. I suspect that, given the sums at risk, incorporated capital will make up most of Lloyd's base in the future. We must wait and see what happens.

We must not allow individual Lloyd's names to be given tax benefits that are not available to others engaged in a similar enterprise, other than insurance. I trust that that makes the matter clear.

Mr. Beith: May I pursue the point a little further? The same difference would apply within the corporate sector. If concessions of the kind that the hon. Gentleman and I support are made to the corporate sector, it will make a difference to corporations that put capital into insurance and those that do not. The same will apply to individuals. What they have in common is the peculiar nature of insurance risk and markets. Surely that is an argument in favour of comparable treatment.

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Gentleman carries his argument a little far. Clearly, depending on the business that a company carries out, certain tax provisions are available to one group of companies and not to another. Were we discussing petroleum revenue taxation, which we are not——

Mr. Salmond: Unfortunately.

Mr. Darling: I agree with the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond). However, oil companies are taxed differently from companies that make rivets, for example. We must accept that insurance companies are taxed on a different basis from oil and other companies.

A clear distinction can be drawn between the taxation of corporations and the taxation of individuals. I do not wish to labour the point, but I am sure that the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed accepts the distinction. I assume that, being a Liberal Democrat, he favours the principle of fairness between individual taxpayers. The House must think long and hard before giving individual taxpayers who are Lloyd's names benefits that are not available to other individual taxpayers, while accepting that insurance differs from certain other enterprises.

I am worried that, if the special trust funds are not taxed, Lloyd's names will be able to accumulate large sums. That will not be necessary to meet insurance losses because the sums would be paid out on cessation.

Some substantial tax benefit may arise, but that device cannot be used by other taxpayers. I do not want to labour the point, but we should think long and hard before giving such concessions. That was precisely the thrust of my argument in Committee. I am sorry that the Liberal party did not accept the Labour party's argument because the Tories have accepted it. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed will reflect that he might have got it wrong. If it is good enough for me, the Financial Secretary and the Labour party, it should be good enough for the Liberal party—perhaps the fact that it is not tells us something about the Liberal party.

There was an exchange on the subject in Committee. I did not entirely follow what the Financial Secretary said on a similar amendment. He seemed to set some store on the fact that only 50 per cent. of the profits could be put into the special reserve fund—I accept that. However, I am concerned that if up to 50 per cent. of substantial profits were placed in the fund, which remained untouched for a period of years, after 20 years underwriting, a substantial sum might have accumulated. I fully accept that that is secondary to the main issue which I raised in Committee and which has now been addressed. But we cannot leave the matter there because it is important.

Mr. Dorrell: The argument that I advanced in response to the debate in Committee was the same argument that I shall make in a few moments. I shall be interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's response. The key factor is not that there is limitation of 50 per cent. on profit earned on insurance in any one year. As I said in Committee, the key limitation is the separate limit of 50 per cent. of premium income—the amount up to which the reserve can be built to protect the interests, not primarily of the Lloyd's names but of the policyholders. That is a key test of the liquidity of an insurance business run by a Lloyd's name.

Mr. Darling: I accept that there are two tests, but that does not seem to detract from the argument that the funds should be subject to tax—I said that the Minister set some store on precisely that. The debate between us is whether those funds should be taxed. I believe that they should. That does not lessen the importance of the argument that we advanced in Committee about plugging the loophole. I hope that the Government will be vigilant and alert to the possibility of a Lloyd's name or another party finding a way to circumvent new clauses 1 and 2, or Government amendment No. 6. I hope that the Government will plug any future loopholes that come to light as a result of the operation of the special reserve funds.

As I said, the Opposition want to see Lloyd's thrive and prosper. We want it to put its problems behind it, but we want to ensure that Lloyd's names are taxed on a fair basis. We do not believe that is happening at present, and it is for that reason that I want to press amendment No. 21 to a vote.

5.15 pm

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): I do not wish to—and could not—reopen the ruling that Madam Speaker made earlier this afternoon, but I appeal to those hon. Members who are Lloyd's names not to vote on the new clause—a vote which will probably be taken tomorrow evening. I urge them to follow the precedent set on 24 March 1981 when we were discussing the Bill relating to Lloyd's when—I think—53 names abstained. Although the Government's majority was much greater then and hon. Members could afford to abstain in those numbers, I do not think that they can be excused for failing to do so tomorrow.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling), I accept that there is a strong case for tax reform of the Lloyd's insurance market. The establishment of a new reserve fund would put Lloyd's on a level playing field with some of our strongest competitors in France, Switzerland and, above all, Germany—Munich Re is Lloyd's biggest competitor. It would also encourage the prudent management of outstanding liabilities.

The Bill is a recipe for tax avoidance. Any income arising from assets in the reserve fund is exempt from income tax while it remains there. Amendment No. 21 seeks to address that issue, but any capital gains arising from the disposal of assets held in the fund are exempt from capital gains tax. The amount paid into the fund will be treated as a fully deductible businesss expense although, admittedly, withdrawals will be taxed as profits.

It is said that, as a sort of balance against those provisions, there is a new basis of tax assessment which treats capital appreciation on invested premiums as income rather than capital gains. That is said to be a disadvantage to Lloyd's names which just about balances the advantages that they receive from the tax privileges they gain from the new reserve fund. I asked the tax department at Lloyd's to justify the Chancellor's assurance that those two changes, running parallel with each other, were, as he said, broadly tax neutral. The department officials were able only to assert that that was the case and were unable to provide figures or costings to prove it. That makes me suspicious that the overall package is a nice little earner for Lloyd's names.

It is also important to ask why the changes are being made now. It is partly because of the huge losses in the year of accounts over the past three years—1988, 1989 and 1990. But the crisis is not simply about the problems of hurricane Hugo but about City fraud. The crisis is not just about asbestosis problems, but the yuppyitis which produced a "money-for-nothing" era in the City—with my apologies to Dire Straits. It seems that the chickens from that era have come home to roost and the Government are seeking to clear up the mess.

We have had a sad, sorry and sordid tale of working names indulging in insider dealing by dumping loss-making activity and underwriting on external names while maintaining a profitable business for themselves. As a result, many ordinary names became victims of malpractice and corruption. Some victims are numbered among the 44 Conservative Members of Parliament who are Lloyd's names. I am not sure whether the number includes the Attorney-General, the three Cabinet Ministers who are Lloyd's names or the Tory party chairman—all of whom are named in my early-day motion 2299. That is why there is pressure on the Government to bail out Lloyd's. It is tantamount to an abuse of Parliament that a certain restricted and privileged group of Members of Parliament are being bailed out in that manner.

Mr. Beith: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify for the record whether he would regard as an abuse of Parliament the passing by the House of the new clause and the amendment about which the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) spoke or the inclusion of any part of that new clause, amended or not, in the Bill?

Mr. Hain: The amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central improves the Bill and I hope that it is accepted. But my basic argument about the abuse of Parliament is that hon. Members who are names should not be able to vote themselves tax privileges which they will receive from the changes. I am not denying that there is a case for modernising the tax regime.

It seems that, although it is said that the tax changes are not fully retrospective, they go back to the 1992 year of account for reserving and also to the 1992-93 year of account for tax assessments. There is a sense in which the new regime will enable those hard-pressed names at least to reassure those who are making claims on their resources that they will have better years to come. I wish that the same fairness and equality was applied to the bankrupt individuals and small businesses who are going to the wall in the current recession—indeed, they have been doing so in accelerating numbers during the past few years. Why should they be treated differently and on a less privileged basis than Conservative Members of Parliament who are Lloyd's names?

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Would my hon. Friend like to comment on the double standards in this area? The House lays down rules by which local councillors have to declare their interests. A councillor with an interest of any kind, not merely a financial one, not only has to declare it but is prohibited from speaking or voting when the subject of his interest is being discussed at a council meeting. Should not the House follow its own rules?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes his point well.

My amendment No. 29 would require an annual vote to allow Parliament to keep a check on Lloyd's, which is otherwise a law unto itself as it is not subject to any statutory regulation. It is in a unique position and an annual vote on the application of the tax regime would allow us to monitor the progress of Lloyd's as it modernises its structure.

Lloyd's should be subject to statutory regulation, and if it were, many Opposition Members would be more willing to grant the new tax regime proposed, even in a modified way, by the Government. Although the recent reforms by Peter Middleton and David Rowland to restructure and modernise Lloyd's, to separate the market from regulation and to introduce corporate capital were welcome, Lloyd's remains an anachronism and it needs to be modernised and updated.

In the past two decades Lloyd's has been hit by one scandal after another and each has been followed by an internal inquiry. There was an inquiry by Cromer in 1970 and that was followed by inquiries by Fisher in 1980, by Neill in 1987 and by Sir David Walker last year. Although those inquiries led to reforms that were welcomed at the time, further scandals emerged. The latest reforms are welcome, but why should they provide any more of a guarantee than the others? Those reforms did not provide any guarantee whatever as there were further scandals in their wake.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South-East): In view of recent events, the Government's proposals, and the question mark over how the company has been managed in the past two or three years, does my hon. Friend agree that there should be a public inquiry? After all, the Government are to give to Lloyd's benefits that they will not give to other insurance companies.

Mr. Hain: The case for a public inquiry was strong over a year ago when news of the crisis broke. My hon. Friend makes his point well.

It is fundamentally wrong to give tax privileges to Lloyd's names without the quid pro quo of statutory regulation. If we modernise Lloyd's tax regime and encourage the company to move into the 21st century—I almost said the 20th century—we should require from all the markets a willingness to accept the regulation that only statute can bring. If there were such regulation many people outside and probably many Lloyd's names would have much more confidence in the company's future.

Mr. Beith: When the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) speaks about this matter I often think of the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) and his assertion in Committee two years ago when we first debated the matter at length, that the attitude that Lloyd's was a place in which the seriously rich dabble was not at all to be found in the Labour party. He may have had cause to modify that opinion.

The case for making any kind of special provision for Lloyd's names is certainly not that some people who were very rich are no longer rich, or at least will not be when their accounts are finally cleared. It is certainly not that the Government should respond with tax concessions to the appalling happenings in some of Lloyd's syndicates. Such arguments provide no basis whatever for tax concessions. They do not weigh in this case and they have not persuaded Opposition Members that there is a case for some measures. I intervened in the speech by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling), but it is still not clear whether he is in favour of any measures.

The case for some provision is so that this country may have a continuing involvement in the insurance market to the extent to which Lloyd's has been involved, and so that we may continue to have the earnings that that produces. No other argument would weigh with me because Lloyd's names were aware of the risks. Their money was used not only as a guarantee to Lloyd's but to earn money in other ways in the meantime. They ought to have foreseen what has happened to them, although the catastrophes were not really foreseen by anybody. However, when taking on an insurance risk one must assume the worst case.

Those names might have been justified in supposing that their affairs would be handled properly and honestly and without insider dealing. However, the fact that that did not happen is not the Government's fault because things went wrong within Lloyd's. The case for making a provision on which there seems to be some consensus within the parties is to ensure future earnings from insurance of the kind that Lloyd's can provide. The principle that seemed to weigh with a number of us was that any provision should be appropriate in the context of the insurance industry and should be available to other participants in that industry. There cannot be strict comparability between all forms of risk because there is not a quite comparable form of risk. Capital may not be put up for insurance if we cannot set out a sensible basis.

The Government are legislating to deal with the Lloyd's problem but are still consulting and forming their opinion about what should be done for the rest of the insurance industry. That is less than satisfactory. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central expressed the surprising view that a strictly comparable treatment of Lloyd's names and of people who were corporately involved in insurance, whether at Lloyd's or anywhere else, would not meet with his approval. He rested his case on the difference between individual and corporate tax affairs. There are indeed differences, but the hon. Gentleman did not suggest that any of them should be systematically offset to an appropriate figure in some arrangement that combined the two. He seemed to rest a great deal of weight on a structure that would not bear it. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman's real reason is to have something to vote on so that the Lloyd's names can be flushed out.

I had some sympathy with the hon. Member for Neath who said that it was unsatisfactory, certainly in the view of the outside world and certainly by comparison with local government, for people with a direct personal interest to be able to vote on their own affairs in a way that can make a large difference to them. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that those people should abstain and throw themselves upon the mercy of the House, in which case they would depend on Labour votes. Up to a point that might be thought resonable because Labour's Front-Bench spokesmen have said that they are in favour of the broad, main elements of the package in the Bill, especially as all doubt has now been removed by the Government's amendment, which ties up the loose ends from Committee, on the first of the two points about which the Opposition were concerned.

Labour Front-Bench spokesmen are taking a perfectly reasonable attitude in seeking to get matters right. What worries some of the Lloyd's names is the belief that the hon. Member for Neath and a few other hon. Members are not in favour of having any such measures in the Bill. The reason for a vote on the amendment at some time is not because one can logically defend it but because there has to be some sort of vote to show up those Lloyd's names who will vote in their own interests. I shall watch the vote with the same interest as Labour Members, but I am still not satisfied that the position is right.

One reason for voting against the amendment is that the process has not been completed. We are doing something for Lloyd's names that we have not yet done for the rest of the insurance industry. That is a reasonable ground and I should like the Minister to address it. Throughout I have sought to argue the principle that we are recognising the special character of insurance risk and the need to ensure that it will still be possible for risks to be taken so that we can continue to obtain the substantial invisible earnings that an experienced insurance industry stands to earn for us. Over the years, Lloyd's has played a particular part in that risk operation—a part quite different from the rest of the commmercial insurance industry.

5.30 pm

The events of recent years have placed a large question mark over Lloyd's future. We must all hope that the current reforms within Lloyd's will change not only the way that it is run but the way that it is perceived, because a very great deal of damage has been done. My judgment, for what it is worth, is that further damage will be done if there is not some reasonable tax framework, but I want to be sure that that framework is comparable throughout the insurance industry. If the Government cannot say that they are moving towards that, they will cast doubt on their case against Labour's amendment. However, if they can say that they are seeking to achieve comparability, I cannot understand why the Labour Front Bench should not welcome that with open arms.

Mr. Salmond: I want to pick up the point made by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) about public perception and how the debate will be viewed outside the confines of the Chamber. The rush to provide assistance for Lloyd's names and the fact that so many of them are Conservative Members of Parliament will be widely understood outside the House.

I well recall that when we have debates on Members' salaries and secretarial allowances, Conservative Members —almost unanimously, although there are some exceptions—tell us to be very careful when voting on matters that affect our own finances. Today, they are silent about the care that should be taken in this debate and in the vote on the amendment.

People outside the House will be appalled by the proposed assistance for Lloyd's names because the Budget will impose severe hardship on whole categories of people. The hardship that those people experience daily is far greater than the hardship that any of the Lloyd's names have yet experienced. Those who will be greatly disadvantaged by the Budget will not welcome the rush to assist a fairly privileged group of people.

I can think of another comparison—those employed in the North sea drilling industry. Parliament is not providing the time and opportunity to discuss whether their jobs will be lost, but is providing the time and opportunity to discuss the rush to assist Lloyd's names. That brings the House of Commons into disrepute. I am not complaining about that because part of my role in politics is to ensure that the House is brought into disrepute. The activities and the self-interest that are so clearly displayed in the debate will considerably extend that process. Whether or not the Conservative Members who are Lloyd's names decide to abstain in the vote tomorrow, they may come to rue the day politically when the whole process was embarked upon with such unseemly haste.

Mr. Dorrell: To hear the hon. Members for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) and for Neath (Mr. Hain) talk, no one would believe that the proposal is a revenue-neutral package that will deliver neither benefit nor cost to Lloyd's names in the aggregate.

The hon. Member for Neath asked me how the proposed figure was arrived at. Of course, it is an estimate. The change arising from the introduction of a special reserve fund will, when it is up and running, have a revenue cost of about £50 million a year, while the extra tax gathered as a result of treating profits on the premium trust fund assets as income will produce a revenue yield of about £50 million a year. Therefore, to talk about the package as a great tax break for Lloyd's names simply does not accord with the facts.

I want to deal with the points raised by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling). In the first part of his speech at least, he tried to be constructive and to respond to the issues of tax principle that we discussed in Committee. I welcome the fact that he has accepted that amendment No. 6 covers the concern that he expressed then. Grudging though that acceptance was, I hope that we can take it that that represents the Opposition's endorsement of our proposals to deal with that aspect.

In Committee, we agreed that two issues of tax principle underlie the treatment of the Lloyd's insurance market. First—and there is no disagreement on this in any part of the House—we cannot approach a policy for the taxation of Lloyd's names on any basis other than the principles of fiscal neutrality, which the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central clearly espoused in Committee and repeated this afternoon. As has been recognised by several hon. Members who have spoken this afternoon, we are not introducing the proposals in response to short-term considerations at Lloyd's and we are certainly not introducing them out of a desire to create a tax shelter. As I have said, it would be strange if we were to do so as there is no revenue cost associated with the proposals. I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of fiscal neutrality.

I also agree with the hon. Gentleman that the issue that underlies the Government's proposals for the Lloyd's insurance market is the general acceptability of reserving in the context of all insurance business. The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that he found the argument for reserving persuasive, especially in the context of the comparison between this country's tax system and that which prevails in other countries, notably France and Germany. That is one of the issues that the House will want to take into account when it considers the general issue of reserving for insurance business.

However, I suggest that the House take particular account not of that argument, important though it may be, but of the argument based on tax policy and tax equity as between one taxpayer and another. The Government have undertaken to publish a consultative document during the summer on the general question of reserving for insurance business. In that document we shall make it clear that the issue of tax equity is whether it is sensible to continue to tax insurance business on the basis of an annually declared profit, when some insurance businesses specialise in covering catastrophe risks where it is in the nature of that business that catastrophe claims will not necessarily crystallise in the year in which the premiums are gathered to pay for them. Indeed, it is part of a catastrophe-based insurance business that several years' premiums may be necessary to cover the risk of a catastrophe. Annuality, in the context of such a business, may not be a sensible way of taxing that business. That is the principal argument for introducing reserving for insurance businesses.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed that the argument applies equally whether the insurer is a company or an individual. I cannot understand the point made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central about the distinction between an individual and a corporation as the insurer. If reserving is right to cover catastrophe when the insurer is a corporation, it is self-evident that the same must apply when the insurer is an individual. It is because the Government are receptive to that idea, and are proposing to consult on the detail and principle in the corporate context, that we propose the introduction of a catastrophe reserve in the Lloyd's market, where the limiting factor on the right of a name to commit resources to that reserve will be 50 per cent. of the pre-reserving profit and 50 per cent. of the premium limit of the name, the latter clearly being the restraining influence on the total size of reserve that can be built.

Mr. Salmond: Regardless of whether the Minister is right about the essence of the argument, if he were a Lloyd's name—which he is not—would he consider it appropriate, and in accordance with his conscience, to vote on the issue?

Mr. Dorrell: In such circumstances, I would accept the advice of the Chair on what was and was not in order.

The right to reserve is limited by both the provisions that I mentioned, as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central recognised. Furthermore, the right to withdraw from the reserve is limited, as the hon. Gentleman has now recognised. The quid pro quo is the commitment to build up a reserve limited by the size of the insurance business that is being done—that is the effect of the 50 per cent. of premium income limit—along with tax-free build-up of the assets within the reserve.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central asked why the reserve should be allowed that tax-free build-up. There are two answers. The first arises from the reason for the creation of the reserve. It is being created to give extra security to the policy holder, assuring him that the claim he may need to make at some future date will be backed by adequate resources. It ensures that the insurer need not be driven to, and perhaps over, the limit of bankruptcy. That is the key consideration. It arises from the need for a test of liquidity within the insurance business, and the Government's desire not to require insurance businesses to declare profits that later prove nugatory, because when the claims bills come in the profit is found not to have existed.

We are limiting the right of a name to build up a reserve and limiting the size of the total reserve. We are introducing the reserve because we expect it to provide the policy holder with extra security. I therefore consider it sensible to reach the limit determined by premium income as quickly as possible in order to provide the insured party of the insurance business with better security. That is the first tax-principle reason for allowing the reserve to build up without charging tax on the investment return.

There is a second argument, based on practicality. What would be the practical consequence of taxing the investment return on the build-up of assets in the reserve? Hon. Members on both sides of the House have agreed that payments into the reserve will be made before tax and that there will be a tax deduction for them—they will be tax free. Surely all hon. Members would want payments out of the reserve to be taxable income.

It is difficult to see how, in practice, tax-free payments into the reserve could be subject to tax as the reserve built up and then subject to tax again as payments out of the reserve were made to the names. That would mean taxing twice the investment return secured on the assets in the reserve. Surely it is much more simple and straightforward to recognise that the assets going into the fund should be tax free—that it is in the public interest to allow the fund to build up reasonably quickly to provide better liquidity for the insurance business and better protection for the policy holder, and then to tax withdrawals from the fund in their entirety at the time of withdrawal, recognising that the terms on which assets can be withdrawn are strictly controlled. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central has now recognised that.

I cannot commend the new clause to the House. It strikes me as being wrong in principle, because it counters the purpose of providing the reserve in the first place, and wrong in practice, because it would lead to an administrative nightmare in trying to distinguish between payments out of the reserve that had already borne tax, the investment return, and those that had not, the original capital payments into the fund. There are arguments of both principle and practice against the new clause, and I suggest that the House reject it.

Mr. Darling: I am sure the House will accept that there is a substantial difference between the taxation of individuals and company taxation. If we had the choice, we would all love to be taxed as companies: if we all had the option of setting expenditure against pre-tax income, no doubt we should take the opportunity to do so. Anyone who has ever been a schedule D taxpayer—as I have in my time—will know that it is far more advantageous than being a schedule E taxpayer, because of the various allowances. I am sure that both the Minister and the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) will accept that we already treat individual and corporate taxpayers differently. That is why I believe that we must be careful to put Lloyd's names on an equal footing with other taxpayers.

I have some sympathy for the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed: having backed the Government in Committee, he must feel badly let down on discovering that they are now backing Labour on Report. I was pleased to note that Government amendment No. 6 is phrased in almost identical terms as new clauses 1 and 2, which I drafted in about 40 seconds. I wonder whether the parliamentary draftsman is being paid at the same rate as I am to draft Opposition new clauses. I was surprised that the Government met the aims of our new clause as they did, but I am pleased nevertheless.

My hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) and the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) were right to stress the position of Lloyd's names who are also Tory Members of Parliament. The rules of the House allow them to vote, but if they speak they must declare an interest. The fact is that most will not speak and will declare no interest; but, when the Division Bell sounds, they will walk into the Lobby along with other Conservative Members to vote themselves a tax concession. It is all very well to say, within the rules of the House, "It is not just them; it is others outside." I am sure, however, that many taxpayers would like their representatives to secure for them the same benefits that Lloyd's names in the House are able to secure for others outside.

The situation is unsatisfactory, and I consider that Opposition Members are right to draw attention to it. The Government's judgment is tainted by the fact that so many Conservative Members—double the party's majority—are Lloyd's names. Four members of the Cabinet are Lloyd's names: of course their judgment is called into question. When members of the public consider the funding of the Tory party, they are bound to ask whether the Government are fit to run the country when they cannot exercise unfettered, untainted judgment in this regard.

Mr. Dorrell: Where is the tax break in a series of proposals that are revenue neutral?

Mr. Darling: I was coming to that.

The Minister was plainly uncomfortable when I drew attention to the general issue—the difficulty in which he and his right hon. and hon. Friends now find themselves. It is no wonder that, over the past few weeks, the country has been preoccupied with the question of who funds the Tory party, and that so many Tory Members of Parliament have substantial interests outside the House. It is astonishing that some of them find time to be Members of Parliament, given the interests that they have to declare. I think that legitimate and important points have been raised in this short debate—not just about the reserve provisions available to Lloyd's, although it was right to draw attention to that, but about the fact that the Government have and represent so many vested interests that they cannot exercise the objectivity that most people expect of a Government.

As I have said, we broadly welcome this part of the Bill. It is important to establish matters on a proper footing. That is why we were very selective about the amendments that we tabled. If the Minister had been right, it would have been very tempting for some people to vote against the entire provision, but we did not do that—we wanted to focus criticism where it deserved to be focused. Before the acceptance of our proposal today, a tax shelter was being created. The Government have accepted that that has happened. They have therefore tabled an amendment that closes that tax shelter loophole.

One remaining matter must now be dealt with, and——

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: No, I am just about to finish. The hon. Gentleman has not been here for the entire debate. He cannot expect to walk into the Chamber when it suits him in order to raise a matter. If he wants to speak on Report, he can do so when we debate the many other matters that are before us.

Amendment No. 21 deals specifically with unfinished business. We are not persuaded by what the Government have said; therefore, we shall seek to press the amendment to a Division. I understand that, for technical reasons, the amendment will not come before the House until tomorrow afternoon, so we shall vote on it when we reach it. In the meantime, as the aims of our new clauses 1 and 2 have been fully met by Government amendment No. 6, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 3

HOME INCOME PLANS (INVESTMENT BOND SCHEMES)

'.—(1) Where a person has sold since 6th April 1986, more than ten investment bond related home income plans to individuals, the provisions of this section shall apply to them.

(2) A person falling within the provisions of this section shall be entitled to a reduction in their tax liability for 1993-94 of the amount specified in subsection (3) below if the condition of subsection (4) below is met.

(3) The reduction in tax liability referred to in subsection (2) above shall be £1.

(4) The condition referred to in subsection (2) above is that no more than 10 per cent. of the investment bond related home income plans they have sold since 6th April 1986 have subsequently been terminated.

(5) The Board is empowered by this subsection to issue regulations defining the term "investment bond related home income plans".'.—[Mr. Darling.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Darling: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

This is a different matter which, as the House will recall, was debated almost exactly a year ago. Indeed, the terms of new clause 3 are almost identical to those of the new clause that was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) on 8 July 1992. We make no apology for raising the matter again. The position has not changed substantially since the House last debated it.

We want to draw attention to the plight of between 10,000 and 15,000 people, some of whom lost substantial sums of money by purchasing home income plans in the 1980s. The plight of those people is yet another nail in the coffin of the faltering system of self-regulation that was set up by the Government in the 1980s. Those people, most of them elderly, did not want to be such a nail, but their plight highlights the failure of the self-regulatory system and its inability to prevent the sale of manifestly unsuitable products and to provide an effective and efficient compensation scheme.

This matter concerns Members on both sides of the House. Sales of home income plans were eventually stopped in 1991. The question that must be asked is, why not before? I believe that a proper system of regulation would have done so long before then.

Let us examine first the poor advice that was offered to these people. No regulatory system can ever make it impossible to sell unsuitable products; what it can do is to make it less likely to happen. Of course, the buyer must beware. He or she should take advice. If, however, the Government set up a regulatory system, members of the public are entitled to rely on it and to assume that it works. The problem is that the present self-regulatory system does not work. In the case of home income plans, most people took advice but were given deliberately false advice by some very unscrupulous salesmen.

It is likely that in future more and more people will have reason to buy financial products, as a means either of saving or of providing a pension for themselves. If we intend to ask people to make such provision for themselves, it is essential that Parliament puts in place a regulatory system that is worthy of respect by the public and the industry. An efficient and effective regulatory system is good for the industry and for the public, but that is not what happens at present.

The problem is that the self-regulatory system is falling into disrepute, not just in the eyes of the public but in the eyes of the industry and the City. Hon. Members will no doubt have seen the remarks of the chief executive of the Prudential Assurance company, Mr. Mick Newmarch, and others. More and more people are calling for an end to the fiction of self-regulation and for the setting up of an effective, statute-based regulatory system in an area that is playing an increasingly important part in people's lives. That is why we have called repeatedly for a complete overhaul of the regulatory system.

I believe that we could draw on the experience of the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States. I do not advocate its importation, but we need a single, powerful, regulatory body—perhaps building on the Securities and Investments Board that we have at the moment—that commands respect and strikes an acceptable degree of apprehension in the minds of all those whom it regulates. It should be free to set up regulatory bodies, as it sees fit. It should ensure, among other things, that there is a compensation scheme that works quickly and effectively. We do not have such a scheme at present. A review of the City's regulatory system, together with the enforcement of the criminal law for market-related offences, is long overdue. The Government should accept that, rather than sit back and wait for something to happen.

Investment-linked home income schemes were sold in the late 1980s to mostly elderly investors. Many of them have lost everything that they had. The idea was to unlock the capital in their homes, in the hope of earning a large enough return to make the repayments, as well as to provide extra income. Some of the people who bought those plans have told me that they were encouraged to do so by the remarks of Lady Thatcher when she was Prime Minister. She urged people to unlock their savings in that way. They feel especially bitter and let down because the Government's self-regulatory system has left them high and dry, following the failure of those plans.

Many investors were never told of the difficulties attendant on such schemes. Furthermore, it was not brought to their attention that those schemes were fundamentally flawed because, before any money was invested, the salesmen's fees and commissions were deducted. To illustrate the point, in one case a couple were to invest about £20,000, but subsequently found that over £2,000 had been deducted for the salesman's commission and fees, leaving insufficient capital to generate the required income.

Some of the schemes were sold by sharks—that is the proper word for them—who should never have been allowed to conduct business under the Financial Services

[Mr. Darling]

Act 1986. To its credit, the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Organisation has made valiant efforts to remove those people who should not have been allowed to trade, but it is a long haul. When the system was set up, more or less anybody who was trading previously was allowed to carry on business, although those people should never have been allowed to do so.

At stake is not just the character of individuals but the suitability of these people. The role of the regulator in ensuring that mainfestly unsuitable products are not sold must also be considered. A function of proper regulation is, I believe, to ensure, first, that the sales force is properly equipped and regulated and, secondly, that where manifestly unsuitable products are put on the market they are not allowed to be sold or, if they are sold, the circumstances in which they are sold are strictly regulated.

In this case, following the sale of home income plans in the late 1980s, the SIB received more than 1,500 complaints. I understand that more than £23 million has been paid to just under 2,000 investors. Others, however, are still waiting for compensation.

It is important to deal briefly with compensation. That is where some of the problems inherent in the present system are now becoming apparent. It should be remembered that, even where compensation has been paid, many people have lost heavily. One pensioner told me that it cost him £7,000 to get out of the scheme.

One of the difficulties is that the plight of these people depends to a large extent on who sold them their plan. If they were able to go to the insurance ombudsman, until fairly recently they received an extremely efficient service. The ombudsman took a broad view. If we look at his most recent report, we see that he took the view that "the elements of such Plans can only sensibly be regarded as parts of the same transaction. I therefore ask insurers to deal with the loss on the mortgage as well as that on the bond."

The ombudsman was prepared

"to compensate policy holders in respect of any sums withheld from the mortgage funds, or withdrawn from the bond."

The ombudsman was also willing to make payments in respect of distress. He also, quite rightly, took the view that those who had sought advice were entitled to seek advice and that the cost of their advice ought to be recoverable from the insurer.

Unfortunately, because of a recent ruling, the scope of the insurance ombudsman's remit has been curtailed. I am not sure that he wanted it to be curtailed, but in a recent finding it was said that, due to technical reasons which I do not want to go into, it is not possible now for the insurance ombudsman to take as wide a view as he previously took about the scope of his powers. The fact remains, however, that we might want to examine the role of the insurance ombudsman. The victims of these schemes who until now were able to go to the insurance ombudsman found that most of, if not all, their claim was met.

That is not the case with other bodies. If individuals who lost out were able to go to the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation, the chances are that they would have received full compensation because there is no ceiling. Indeed, I have received few complaints from such people. If, however, people attempted to attach a building society, many would have encountered substantial difficulties.

Some building societies eventually proved to be co-operative—I emphasise the word "eventually" because even some household names have proved reluctant to become involved. They were happy to take the profits that would have accrued had the policy worked out, but they seemed reluctant to become involved in compensation. Others refused to co-operate—for example, the Alliance and Leicester, the Bristol and West, the Chelsea, the Leeds, the National Counties, the Newcastle, Northern Rock, the Staffordshire and the West Bromwich building societies. They trade on their reputation, but the public should be aware that, where those building societies have been found wanting or where people have lost out, they have been reluctant to become involved, or have refused to become involved, in the ombudsman's scheme.

Unfortunately, the building society scheme is such that it needs the building societies to volunteer to co-operate. When the Government eventually embark on a review of the regulatory system, they should look long and hard at the compensation scheme which depends on the voluntary effort of building societies to co-operate. That seems absolutely intolerable.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Anthony Nelson): I shall deal with this issue later, but I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that the Leeds proceeds on a case-by-case basis. I know that it was listed as one of the societies that had refused to become involved, but it has, in fact, been helpful. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would welcome the opportunity to set the record straight for that particular society.

Mr. Darling: I am all in favour of forestalling correspondence that may ensue. The information that I received, which was given in good faith, was that the Leeds had not agreed to co-operate. The Minister tells me that it has agreed, and I am very pleased; perhaps the other building societies will take a leaf out of its book.

In any event, building societies should not be reluctant in the first place. Everyone agrees that the people whom we are discussing, who are mainly the elderly, have lost substantial sums of money though no fault of their own. I fully accept that a building society might take the view that it is not the prime mover—the real villain of the piece may be the independent financial adviser. However, the building societies became involved. I should have thought that, as a matter of good will, if nothing else, some would be willing to be a little more co-operative than they apparently have been prepared to be until now.

I repeat that it should not be a question of volunteering to co-operate. A proper compensation scheme should ensure that when people are in difficulties, having relied on advice and been completely innocent victims, they should not have to spend weeks, if not months or years, worrying and becoming involved in considerable expense to get reluctant volunteers to come to their rescue. The Minister will find that that is not the view of the Labour party alone.

If an investor found that he had to go to the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Association, which regulates independent financial advisers, and then on to the investor compensation scheme, I am afraid that the chances are that he would have experienced substantial difficulty because the maximum payout under the investor compensation scheme is £48,000. It will not pay compensation for any sums withdrawn, unlike the insurance ombudsman. It does not compensate for stress or illness, and those who operate it do not believe that the people involved should have taken legal advice; if they had not done so, the chances are that many would not have received a penny. Of course, the scheme will not pay compensation for those who bought plans before 28 August 1988; nor will it pay if the independent financial adviser did not receive full authorisation. The difficulty in some cases is that the independent financial advisers held themselves up as being full FIMBRA members when they were not. A decent compensation scheme worthy of the name would not have left the victims high and dry.

I know that the ICS has had its difficulties. It is mindful of the fact that its payouts are an increasing drain on the industry as a whole. Indeed, it is the cost of compensation, among other things, that is holding up the formation of the new personal investment authority because, understandably, those who are to be members are worried about compensation. It is in the interests of the industry to ensure that we have an effective and efficient compensation scheme which does not cause further trouble to people who are in difficulties through no fault of their own but which accepts that, where mistakes have been made, investors should be compensated without making them jump through hoops to satisfy criteria that, in many cases, are unjustifiably stringent.

I should welcome an effective one-stop shop. Efforts to set it up have been fraught with difficulties. Initially, the Securities and Investments Board, albeit under slightly different management, was reluctant to set up a system. It did when pressurised to do so, but the SIB should reflect on the interests of the industry, let alone those of the public, and ensure that any scheme works and that it does not put investors to undue trouble in the exercise of remedies to which they are entitled.

Under Andrew Large, the new chairman, the SIB is attempting to clear up the matter, but the House should not be under any illusion: we are by no means anywhere near the end of the road. The fact is that people bought products that should not have been sold to them. Institutions such as some building societies want nothing to do with people who have lost out. Unlike Lloyd's names, who have also been the victims of difficulties, elderly people do not have a Lady Archer to stand behind them. They understandably feel very bitter at the fact that the Government are apparently indifferent to their suffering. That is a further illustration, if one were required, of the need for the Government to establish an effective regulatory system.

The House will know that there is a plan to set up a personal investment authority, if it ever gets off the ground. There have, however, been two years of horse trading between the vested interests. If trade unions had been left to put their affairs in order, the Government would have passed dozens of pieces of legislation in the intervening period; but, because of vested interests, one suspects, the Government have done absolutely nothing to ensure that an effective regulatory body is put in place to deal with this end of the market.

I suspect that we shall be told by the Minister that the SIB and others are making valiant attempts to deal with a difficult situation; that the Government intend to do nothing to amend the present law but hope that the industry will set its house in order; and that the industry has another last chance. The Government are very keen on giving people last chances when it suits them. Members of the public, and especially the victims of the home income plan disaster, want action from the Government; they do not want platitudes or to be told that it may not happen in the future. They want a firm sign of government.

The Government have abdicated their role. They are paralysed and transfixed in the glare of growing criticism of the system and of calls for action. We have been calling for change, and the chairman of the London stock exchange has called for a new body to examine the criminal law and the prosecution of market-related offences. As I said, the chief executive of Prudential Assurance has called for an end to self-regulation, and others are doing the same. In today's Financial Times, the Lex column calls for an end to the present system. The 10,000 to 15,000 people who suffered because of the failure also demand action. In the face of those calls, surely we deserve better than another tepid, uncertain response from the Government.

In an interview with the Financial Times last November, the Financial Secretary threw in the towel and said that there was to be no new legislation. He told the SIB that the Government would not legislate, and I suspect that Lloyd's has been told the same thing. The Government have a role to play in putting the present system to rights. We need a proper system of regulation to deal with such a crucial part of the economy and to protect members of the public. I hope that tonight the Government will at least say that, for a change, they are prepared to change from their present tack of doing absolutely nothing.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I warmly welcome many of the remarks made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling), but when he went into rhetorical flights of fancy about the Government I parted company from him. Nevertheless, his general analysis of the problems faced by those who purchased home income plans was accurate. He is right to say that the unfortunate scandal—and it has been a scandal—has revealed gaps in our regulatory system. I congratulate him on giving valuable time to raising the matter this year, as he did last year.

I also pay tribute to many of my colleagues on both sides of the House who have devoted a great deal of time over the past year to fighting on behalf of their constituents who have suffered grievously as a result of this scandal. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin), who has raised the matter in Adjournment debates on more than one occasion. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who has acted as chairman of the all-party committee on home income plans which set up so many important meetings with the various bodies concerned.

I pay tribute to all my colleagues on both sides of the House who, in relation to the West Bromwich building society, have contacted me as a result of the way in which their constituents have been afflicted and affected by the extraordinary way in which that building society has behaved in connection with this matter.

I shall devote my short remarks to the way in which the West Bromwich building society has tried to wiggle and wriggle to avoid its responsibilities in a very serious matter. Many of my comments will come as a shock to those in the west midlands who have trusted in the good name of the West Bromwich building society. I will refer to individuals and to conduct which is criminal in its nature.

[Mr. William Powell]

About 800 people took out home income plans which were ultimately backed by cash from the West Bromwich building society. There was always an intermediary and that intermediary was usually an organisation known as Frew Fisher Smith. In effect, it introduced clients to the West Bromwich building society which advanced money. Those of us in this House who have tried to seek some small measure of justice for our constituents have met a brick wall. It would appear that everything was down to the intermediary and had nothing to do with the building society.

The way in which the West Bromwich building society has behaved and has tried to avoid its responsibilities has been utterly scandalous, deeply shocking and would certainly merit much closer investigation, particularly by the police. I choose my words carefully. I believe that a great deal of criminal activity has been taking place involving forgery and fraud.

In respect of forgery, I have seen and am quite aware of documents, which have been signed by constituents of mine and of other hon. Members, which have undoubtedly been changed after they were signed by the person who was seeking to borrow money. Incomes have been falsified. There have been greatly enlarged falsifications to justify the pushing out of much larger sums of money than our constituents wished to borrow in the first place. Documents were altered after the event without the knowledge of our constituents. That forgery led to fraud and no doubt very high commissions for those involved in that activity. The result has been misery across the country.

So far as I am aware, every one of my constituents who took out a home income plan took one out which was backed ultimately by the West Bromwich building society. As I have said, about 800 people are affected across the country. Literally hundreds of hon. Members have drawn to my attention the fact that constituents of theirs have been involved through the West Bromwich building society. Everyone who has lost money and has faced considerable difficulty owes a debt to hon. Members who have pursued the matter, often in circumstances of great difficulty and in the face of the utmost indifference on the part of that particular building society.

I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to those who took out home income plans and have grouped together to campaign on behalf of those who have been losers. A dedicated group of people across the country has devoted many hours to fight for those losers.

The matter has been so serious that, in one case, an elderly constituent of mine committed suicide. There is absolutely no question but that the behaviour of the West Bromwich building society triggered that. As one would expect, that has led to enormous problems for the family.

As this matter has been going on for so long, we find that elderly people are becoming more and more worried. They see their debts growing and they are extremely worried about how they can meet those debts. They are terrified that the building society will move against their estates and that the modest inheritance, which they hoped to pass on to their children and members of the family, is likely to go to the building society and all those involved.

Whenever I tried to approach the West Bromwich building society, I met with indifference and a total refusal, on the building society's part, to face up to the gravity of the situation. That refusal was exhibited by the chairman, Mr. Baker, and by the chief executive, Mr. Elliott. From my experience of those two gentlemen, I believe that they should not be holding the kind of posts that they hold. Neither of them has shown the slightest interest in coming to grips with what has happened. It is a serious scandal that people who hold positions of trust, as they do, should seek to brush aside what has happened and pretend that it has absolutely nothing to do with them.

I concentrate my remarks on the West Bromwich building society. I have had almost no dealings with any other body. I am aware that, where people have borrowed from other societies, some have had satisfactory outcomes and conclusions, and others less so. However, I know about the West Bromwich building society.

When my constituents and the constituents of other right hon. and hon. Members asked for a holiday on the interest payments while the matter was sorted out, the West Bromwich building society absolutely refused even to contemplate the idea of freezing the interest at the point of the problem and trying to resolve the matter thereafter. As a result, compound interest is being added to the debt and that debt is growing larger and larger. As nearly all the people—if not all—who borrowed through the home income plans had modest levels of savings, they increasingly find that their debts are at least as big as, if not in excess of, the asset that they currently hold. That is obviously desperately worrying for those people.

That is not the only point which is so scandalous and which makes it necessary for changes in the regulations and the regulatory framework to ensure that that kind of thing can never happen in future. We must also consider the fact that our constituents were told that if they simply signed the document put before them everything would be taken care of. No adequate explanation was ever given about what those people were signing up to in the first place.

It is worth bearing in mind that many of the people who signed up were exactly the kind of people who needed an explanation of what was contained therein. Responsible lenders, responsible banks and responsible solicitors would have ensured that a copy of the documents which our constituents signed would have been available to them and that the contents were carefully explained, clause by clause, so that the borrowers were aware of what they were signing up to.

In the case of nearly every one of the West Bromwich building society borrowers, through the intermediary, that did not happen. That is a very serious state of affairs. By lending money on the basis of home income plans and not ensuring that that happened, that is a flagrant breach of the duty of trust which the West Bromwich building society owed to its own depositors. It lent depositors' money in risky circumstances without taking the most elementary steps to ensure that the borrower was aware of the obligation being entered into. I indict the West Bromwich building society for that as well.

One has to say that there is precious little evidence that the financial status of those people who were buying home income plans was carefully and properly investigated. Indeed, I have already asserted, and believe it to be true and am aware of documents where this has happened, that the financial status was subsequently altered, by forgery, after the income had been declared in order to justify the kind of advance which the intermediary wished to obtain with, of course, the commission that went with the much larger loan than might otherwise have been the case.

It is an absolutely scandalous state of affairs. If anything required police action, it is that each and every one of the mortgage applications to the West Bromwich building society now needs to be examined by the police. There are cases in which there was subsequent forgery of the financial declaration. Those matters need to be investigated and persons need to be brought to trial. If they are found in the intermediary or found in the building society, there should be no hiding place for those who have done this.

Mr. Darling: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. He has pursued these matters vociferously and vigorously on behalf of his constituents. Has he reported any of them to any authority, whether the police, a supervisory body or the Government? The hon. Gentleman's allegations are extremely serious and should normally be reported.

Mr. Powell: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. All those matters are available; they have been reported, and they need to be further reported. I have not reported them to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, but I have made others aware. They are matters for the police. There are West Bromwich borrowers—if I may refer to them as that, although the West Bromwich would always hide behind the intermediary, as the hon. Gentleman identified in his own speech—who have been in touch with the police about these matters.

I hope that, as a result of what is said tonight, there will be a much more determined investigation than has currently been the case. That is precisely why I am taking advantage of the opportunity to ensure that matters which have been clear just below the surface for some time are now brought out in the open. Those who have responsibility for them have to face their responsibilities.

Although the new clause may not be exactly the right way of proceeding—I am open to argument about that—it paves the way for an important discussion about this matter which has concerned many of our constituents. We have always been faced with the fact that the West Bromwich building society relies upon the existing methods of regulation. Those methods have been shown to be wrong. It would be absolutely unacceptable to hon. Members if we discovered that people are selling home income plans. I am not aware of it, although there is the suggestion that some intermediaries might be trying to market such plans now, but, in view of experience from the mid to late 1980s, if any financial agent was seeking to market such plans, it would be a matter of the greatest scandal.

We cannot shut the stable door after the horse has bolted in relation to those who have already purchased, but for new purchases to be taking place, with people not being advised of all the difficulties that there are in law and so on, would be truly scandalous.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will the hon. Gentleman join me and other hon. Members in calling for the Securities and Investments Board to deregister the West Bromwich building society from being able to practise investment business, as that organisation has clearly proved itself to be incapable of looking after the interests of people who lend to it or borrow from it?

Mr. Powell: The hon. Lady raises a very important point. She has been most assiduous on behalf of her constituents who have been affected by the West Bromwich building society. Therefore, she makes her request to me from a position of personal and close knowledge of the way in which that building society has been operating. I very much agree with the sentiments behind what the hon. Lady has said.

I hope that the building societies' authorities will look extremely closely at this matter. If I had any deposits in the West Bromwich building society, I would be extremely anxious and concerned about the competence of the people who are presently entrusted with looking after those deposits. I hope that the authorities that have overall responsibility for building societies will take close note of what the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) has said.

I do not want to go on very much longer; I think that I have said enough to show how deeply unhappy I am at the way in which my constituents have been treated. I know that constituents of my right hon. and hon. Friends and others have been affected. Unfortunately, that disgraceful pattern of events has already taken place. It is obvious that the existing pattern of regulatory law has proved to be too insubstantial to deal with it.

My experiences of the West Bromwich building society have been so serious that I have felt it necessary to take advantage of this opportunity to try to bring out into the open what I regard as some of the most disgraceful behaviour by people who are entrusted with looking after other people's money that it has been my misfortune to learn about.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), who has amply demonstrated the fiasco behind home income plans. He has made several serious allegations, and I am pleased that he has brought them to the attention of the House. I hope that the Economic Secretary to the Treasury not only listened to what the hon. Gentleman said but will say what action he intends to take as a result of those allegations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) dealt comprehensively with the failures of the self-regulatory system and the need to change that system and learn the lessons of the disaster of home income plans. As he said, up to 15,000 people were caught as a result of the sale of those plans in the mid to late 1980s. The trap that they are now in is certainly not of their making. Some of them have lost their homes, many of them have lost their life's savings, and many of them presumed that the home income plans that they purchased would not only pay off their mortgages but guarantee them a substantial slice of additional income for many years to come. When they were sold those plans, they were told that they were as safe as houses. Home income plans have not only turned out to be unsafe in respect of their mortgages but have cost them a pretty penny.

As the hon. Member for Corby said, when they were sold, none of the home income plans was issued with a health warning. Many people who bought home income plans are among the most vulnerable members of society. Many were elderly people, looking to pay off their outstanding mortgages and for some additional income. The Financial Services Act 1986 has obviously failed to stop the sale of those plans, and it did not ensure that they carried a health warning.

The chief executive of the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Association, Godfrey Jillings, has called home income plans inherently flawed. He made that statement after the event, because it was not until 1990 that FIMBRA and its counterpart, the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation, wrote to their members reminding them of their duty to recommend only policies geared to an individual's specific needs. The lack of public health warnings meant that many unauthorised firms, as my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central said, were able to continue selling to unwitting victims even when it started to become clear that a home income plan scandal was brewing. It was not until a year later that the regulatory organisations effectively banned home income plans.

The mess was the making of the regulatory organisations and their failure to make clear to the public the inherent dangers of investing in those plans. Clearing up the mess has been as inadequate as the system that created it in the first place. My hon. Friend alluded to the rather different treatment available to the victims of home income plans, depending on whether they bought through an independent financial adviser or from elsewhere. He went into that in some detail.

The miserly conduct of the investors compensation scheme was thrown into sharp relief recently in a court case when it became clear that the ICS was refusing to pay any compensation on behalf of a victim who had died before the rogue firm was declared in default. That meant that a widow or widower might get only half the compensation that she or he had hoped for, which would not be enough to keep them in their home. According to the solicitor who was dealing with many of the victims, in the two and a half months since the ICS took that decision, it had halved the compensation paid to a surviving spouse in at least 12 cases. He warned that many more people would be affected unless that practice was reversed.

6.30 pm

There are a number of lessons to be learnt from the mess. The hon. Member for Corby has called for police investigations. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central alluded to the need to change the regulatory system and to introduce reform as quickly as possible. As a result of the home income plan débâcle it has become clear that lax regulation costs people their homes; it costs people their lifetime's savings; it leads to a great deal of stress and worry. It even led eventually to one person's suicide.

Too many independent financial advisers are simply incapable of doing the job and of looking after their customers responsibly. Unless change is made, many of us will be left with the impression that the industry is run by cowboys. I am sure that the Minister does not wish that impression to be conveyed, and that he will have something positive to say.

We need tighter regulation because many of the people who are sold home income plans are not in a position properly to assess them unless public information is made available. The regulatory organisations are running a telephone helpline and making information available through citizens advice bureaux, but it is too little, too late. Information should have been available to people contemplating investing in home income plans before they got into trouble.

Lax regulation does not work. I hope that some lessons have been learnt from the débâcle and that when the Minister replies he will tell us the Government's thinking on compensating the victims and ensuring that they get a decent deal, and on ensuring that this kind of fiasco does not happen again.

Mr. Nelson: It is not surprising that the debate has evoked strong emotions on both sides of the House. I welcome the opportunity to make a few remarks in response to the new clause because I acknowledge that the issue has caused great personal distress to those who have been affected. It has come to the attention of many Members of Parliament who have taken up cases on behalf of their constituents, and it is right that the House should have an opportunity to be brought up to date with how those cases are being dealt with, as well as to examine some of the more fundamental issues of supervision, regulation and compensation.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) used the debate—as he has some others—as an opportunity to call for a fundamental overhaul of our supervisory system, and he reiterated his call for a full-blown statutory system. I have expressed my views on the issue and shall not repeat them, save to say that whatever system one has—statutory, self-regulatory or semi-self-regulatory—it does not, of itself, ensure that no losses will arise, that no fraudulent activities will take place and that no bad advice will be offered. One must not confuse the structures with the need to provide adequate supervision and regulation under whatever structure there is.

Mr. Darling: Will the Minister tell the House whether he and the Government are still wedded to the existing system of self-regulation, and whether there is any hope for any change originating from the Government?

Mr. Nelson: The Government have made it clear on a number of occasions that we believe that the structure provided by the Financial Services Act 1986 has been a considerable improvement, and that further measures can be taken to improve the system of supervision provided under that legislation. That was the purpose of Andrew Large's review, and it is the purpose of some of the changes being prepared by self-regulatory authorities.

I anticipate problems and great damage if any Government were to visit upon the financial services industry the blight of major reorganisation without a consensus as to what should replace the current system, and without confidence that such a reorganisation would result in a better system of supervision. When there is scope under the existing legislation significantly to improve the effectiveness of investor protection, it seems to me that the responsible first recourse of government is to take that approach. That is precisely what we are doing.

I do not rule out, for the long term, changes in response to events and I am always prepared to have a running review of those issues. However, when I am trying to support moves, for example, for the personal investment authority to get off the ground, it would not be responsible or helpful to suggest that we intend to throw the deck of cards into the air and start dealing again, as far as our system of supervision and regulation is concerned. I prefer to address the issues of inadequacies in supervision and regulation where they occur, and not just the structure. It is the human decisions, as much as the institutional structures, which result in good or bad investor protection.

Many hon. Members have spoken about home income plans. Some home income plans are fairly benign; others have caused very serious problems. Home reversion schemes, whereby the owner of a property sells all or part to the scheme provider for an immediate cash sum and carries on living there until he dies, are sometimes a source of distress to next of kin and inheritors, but they are popular and there is nothing necessarily wrong with them, provided that people are well informed and know what they are entering into.

Purchase life annuity schemes can be a sensible source of additional marginal income for people. As the House will know, under such schemes the home owner takes out a mortgage loan on the property and uses the cash to buy an annuity, which services the loan interest and leaves an income. As tax relief up to £30,000 is available on the loan used to buy the annuity, the scheme can provide a positive —if modest—income after meeting the interest due on the loan.

The schemes that have caused most concern are those in which the owner takes out a mortgage on part of the value of his home and invests the proceeds in an investment bond. I understand and fully sympathise with hon. Members' concerns about the plight of home owners —usually elderly—who have been sold unsuitable home income plans. As the House may be aware, action is continuing to deal with the problem and I shall describe a little of the progress that has been made.

The financial services regulators, the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Organisation and the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation, have amended their rules to prevent further marketing of inappropriate schemes and have taken disciplinary action against the firms concerned. To answer the point mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), therefore, such schemes should not be sold in the future.

In addition, action is being taken to help those who find themselves in difficulty. Many life offices have made good the damage that investors have suffered. Some investors may alternatively be eligible for compensation, either from the investment company or from the investors compensation scheme set up under the Financial Services Act 1986. Last week I went to see for myself, at first hand, how carefully the ICS staff investigate those cases, and I should like to take this opportunity to pay a tribute to them. I watched and spoke to the staff, and in my judgment they are extremely thorough and as expeditious as they can be in dealing with the many claims that have been brought to their attention.

Firms regulated by LAUTRO have now paid out £8 million.

Mr. Darling: I am glad that the Minister mentioned the ICS. No one is criticising the staff; the system is at fault. Is it not an anomaly that an investor who goes to the insurance ombudsman will get more or less full compensation, including compensation for legal costs, stress and any payments made, while for those who go to the ICS the upper compensation limit is £48,000 and no other payments are made? In other words, for the latter there is only partial compensation. Does the Minister agree that it is anomalous for the end result to depend entirely on a stroke of luck or bad luck as to which regulator or authority the investor approaches?

Mr. Nelson: I acknowledge that there are differences in the overall amount of compensation that might be available—although in the vast majority of cases the amount will be less than the £48,000 for which the scheme provides. I acknowledge also differences in approach. That aspect was subject to judicial review, which ruled in favour of the fair basis of compensation provided by the ICS. It is an inherent problem of mixed-product schemes—and one which legitimately gives rise to concern—that where a number of institutions or intermediaries are involved in packaging a product sold to an investor one may find different acknowledgments of the liability which may be met. LAUTRO has generally been rather fast and, some would say, more generous. Compensation has certainly been paid more quickly than in cases that are the subject of resolution by ombudsmen or the one-stop procedure.

Each case is different, and many cases are complicated. That explains why a number remain outstanding. Considerable progress had been made in clearing up and resolving cases since the issue was last raised by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) in a similar amendment last year.

Firms regulated by LAUTRO have paid £8 million in compensation to more than 920 investors, and investors have been restored to the final positioin in which they were before they became involved in the scheme. Between 400 and 500 cases are still being considered by the insurance ombudsman. Many cases are complex and may involve the responsibility of a number of different parties—for example, the financial adviser, the solicitor and the lender.

The liaison group established by the Securities and Investments Board announced in March 1992 a one-stop procedure for handling complaints under which investors in such a scheme on the recommendation of a FIMBRA member who are in difficulty as a result and who have received no satisfaction can pursue all their complaints through FIMBRA—even if their complaints involve others besides the FIMBRA member. The majority of complaints against FIMBRA members received so far are being handled by the ICS, which deals with cases in which firms are in default. The making of an award under the FIMBRA arbitration scheme can drive a firm into default.

So far, 15 of the independent investment intermediaries that were members of FIMBRA—that is, most of them —involved in marketing the schemes have been declared in default under the investors compensation scheme. Payment or offers of payment amounting to more than £16 million have been made to more than 1,000 investors with those firms, and a further 600 claims are being considered.

In many of those latter cases, investors have been told that they are eligible to receive compensation but that their claims cannot be finalised until financial details are received from the various third parties or because the investors have not yet encashed their investments. That might include the insurance company whose insurance bond was used or the solicitor who dealt with the mortgage documents. Some building societies have agreed to co-operate with the building societies ombudsman in using the one-stop procedure. Discussions continue with others with a view to encouraging them to do likewise. No doubt those societies and other organisations will note the strictures and comments of hon. Members who contributed to this debate. The Government hope that they will feel able to co-operate in that way.

More than 120 cases have been processed through the one-stop procedure, 29 cases remain in the FIMBRA arbitration process and 19 are being investigated. The remainder have been settled, rejected or referred to the ICS. Meanwhile, the building societies concerned have made it clear that they want elderly borrowers to remain in their homes, resolve their worries and avoid hardship.

The regulators are concerned to ensure that no one who took out such a plan is overlooked. On 7 June, the SIB published a fact sheet, "Home Income Plans: Grounds for Complaint", which sets out the characteristics of investment bond based schemes and encourages anyone who has taken out such a scheme and thought that they were given bad advice, or were not adequately informed of the risks, to contact the SIB. It has also established a helpline for two months to advise those who have not complained before on the action that they should take. Since it was established, a further 24 cases have been identified and referred to the appropriate complaints handling body under the one-stop procedure.

I was amazed that when that fact sheet was sent out and investors were invited to say whether they thought that they had grounds for complaint, and a number completed a questionnaire—when 24 cases were identified as being serious enough to merit investigation—13 respondents wrote to express their interest in home income plans and asked how they could take one out. If anything, that emphasises the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby that the public need good advice—whether it is independent, professional or simply sound common sense. Even now, the public are not necessarily aware of the dangers involved.

I have said previously that, although those involved in selling or wrongly selling such schemes must bear the principal responsibility, and although a statutory compensation scheme is available for those who cannot be assisted in other ways, ultimately the public must exercise a degree of buyer beware. They should observe five rules. They must beware, spread their investments or risks, seek good advice, read the small print and not confuse authorisation with compensation. We cannot provide a fail-safe system of statutory regulation or even self-regulation in this or other areas. We can do our best, and we can take action against those who are in default. That is being done, substantial progress has been made, and the remaining cases should be dealt with over a period of time. I hope that all parties concerned, and particularly the institutions, will play their full part in co-operating to bring this sad episode to an end and to ensure the rightful restitution of funds to those who have undoubtedly suffered greatly.

Mr. Darling: At the start of this debate, I indicated that I had borrowed heavily from last year's amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) and, with respect, I believe that the Minister has borrowed very heavily from his speech last year. As he spoke, I recognised several passages that appeared in the columns of Hansard in July 1992.

I emphasise that no one is suggesting that we should throw the existing regulatory system into the air like a deck of cards and wait to see what lands. There is a growing consensus about what needs to be done. I suggest that we build on the present system but remove the self-regulatory element to end the present situation whereby people can pick and choose between regulators. People can decide to do nothing because there is no pressure on them to do anything. Above all, we must get away from the state of affairs that the Minister signalled again today, in which the Government will do nothing because that is to give the green light to those outside who wish to do nothing to put their house in order.

I remind the Minister that the financial services industry is of crucial importance to the economy, the people whom it employs, and those who buy the industry's products. We are calling for an overhaul of the present system and the establishment of statute-based regulation to protect not only the public but the industry itself.

I am sorry that the Government will not accept that proposal. I am sure that the 10,000 to 15,000 people who bought fundamentally flawed schemes will be bitterly disappointed. Our proposals are made not in any partisan sense. There is support for change outside the House as well as in it.

I am astonished that the Minister made no reference to the comments of the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) about the West Bromwich building society. I thought that the Minister would say something—even if he only expressed concern. I hope that the Minister realises that concern is felt by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Earlier this year, I tabled two early-day motions which attracted more than 100 signatures. I was astonished at that level of interest. Conservative Members tabled early-day motions that were slightly different, but they also attracted supporters.

The Minister must accept that there is concern and that it is not a question of criticising the industry, but a recognition that the industry is of crucial importance. People will want to buy more and more products and it is therefore important that we have a system of regulation and compensation that works. We do not have that at the present time.

In his tour round the compensation scheme, the Minister might have commented a little more on the anomalies between the various schemes. He said that the ICS scheme was fair and that he was glad that the judicial reviews found in its favour. The judicial reviews are to do not altogether with fairness and objective assessment of the pros and cons of such schemes, but with a narrow interpretation of administrative law, which is not quite the same thing. I hope that the Minister will realise that many people will find it curious that one scheme gives help for legal costs while another does not. There must be something wrong with that system when they are dealing with the same product.

The hon. Member for Corby and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) have said that one of the problems is that we have mixed-product schemes which allow the various organisations concerned to duck behind one another, saying that it is nothing to do with them. The hon. Member for Corby also made the point, which the Minister must accept, that even if the Minister does nothing else and even if everything in the regulatory system needs no alteration, there is something wrong in this area. I am sorry that he did not do anything more.

By tabling the new clause, I hoped at least to provoke the Minister to say something different. Since the interview in the Financial Times last year, he has a new boss, a new Chancellor—a man of the people, who comes from the industrial midlands, no less. I had thought that with that new broom we might have seen some changes in financial regulation, but we have not.

My new clause is highly technical and was engineered to produce this debate. I am sorry that the outcome has not been more positive. I can only hope that those who are trying to resolve the situation will redouble their efforts. I am sure that many people long for the day when we have a Government who are prepared to govern in this area. They are keen on interfering in all sorts of trivia, yet when it comes down to such an important, fundamental point, the Government have absolutely nothing to say. I wonder why that can be.

Question put and negatived.

New clause 8

POWERS OF THE BOARD OF INLAND REVENUE

"(1) The Taxes Management Act 1970 shall be amended as follows—

(a) section 20, subsections (2) and (7A) shall be deleted;

(b) section 20B, subsections (6)(a) and (6)(b) shall be deleted and replaced with "the Commissioner giving the consent has also given approval to the exclusion.".'.—[Mr. Beith.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Beith: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause seems rather technical and raises a wider issue. It seeks to ensure that the agents of Government charged with collecting taxes are doing so in a fair, even-handed and responsible way. It specifically seeks to guarantee that, when a tax inspector tries to obtain documents or information from a taxpayer or third party, he does so only with the appropriate judicial approval and that the board of the Inland Revenue does not give the impression of acting as judge, jury and executioner.

Section 20 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 deals with the powers of inspectors to demand the production of documents from a taxpayer and third parties. Under that section, an inspector who believes that he needs access to a document in the possession of the taxpayer or some third party, for example a bank, can get an authorisation to serve a notice for material in two ways: by seeking the approval of the board of Inland Revenue itself to serve the notice, or by asking for the approval of a special or general commissioner. That appeal, whether to the board or the commissioner, is heard in private. The taxpayer need never be told of anything said about his tax affairs and has no chance to put his case against the inspector. The commissioner is under no obligation to keep minutes of the hearing, so often it is impossible to verify what has been said.

There are circumstances in which a degree of secrecy may be necessary. A crooked taxpayer could take advantage of the advance warning of notice. That is all the more reason why the process should be seen to be completely above board and should carry the most stringent checks on the correctness of its application.

There is a further reason why the process is of importance to certain innocent taxpayers. There is increasing evidence that section 20 actions are being used by banks as a reason to limit and even to withdraw credit or access to banking facilities. We all share the anxiety that, if some inquiry were made about us for no reason by a credit reference agency, it might panic our bank into not treating our account in the normal way. That inquiry becomes a real fear when it comes to light that there are cases where banks have ceased to operate an account in the normal way or have not allowed the taxpayer to do so when the section 20 notice comes to them. The bank might not even tell the taxpayer, the small business man or whoever why it is doing that, because it does not wish to alert him to the Inland Revenue's action and it would not be proper for it to do so. Suddenly the business man, who has already been adversely affected by his protracted arguments with the Revenue, finds that his bank is not operating in the normal way for no apparent reason. It is hard to imagine anything more likely to give someone a persecution complex.

In that context, it is not acceptable that the Inland Revenue should be able to act alone and without regard to outside control. The new clause removes the powers of the board to issue its own notices so that, in future, the only way in which an inspector could get a notice under section 20 would be to seek the approval of a commissioner acting in a judicial role or independently of the board.

It is not that tax inspectors are crooked or that they engage in anything other than proper tasks on our behalf, but occasionally there is an excess of zeal, as Ministers know from the cases in their constituencies, where power seems to have been used in circumstances that are not merited and which represent an unfair imposition on what turns out to be an innocent taxpayer.

It is equally important that the work of the Inland Revenue be seen to be carried out in a fashion that is transparently honest and fair to the taxpayer. That is part of the process of maintaining confidence in our system.

There is another aspect that has been brought to light, as so many things have been, by the Asil Nadir case. What a lifting of the stone that case was and how many things were found beneath it. One thing that curiously came to light was that tax officials had given details of Mr. Nadir's tax affairs to the stock exchange. Although few Opposition Members have any sympathy for Mr. Nadir, it raises the possibility for other taxpayers that there may be unauthorised disclosure by the Revenue of documents to somebody or some agency through which they might pass to a business competitor, to a potential creditor or to someone who in some way might, with no proper legal authority, use that information to the detriment of the taxpayer. The discovery that the Revenue is not above disclosing information in a way in which it is legally precluded from doing must add to the arguments for proper protection when the procedure is used to obtain documents.

There are reasonable ways in which that protection can be achieved by following certain procedures. First, hearings for the approval of an inspector's request for notice should have to be properly recorded and the taxpayer should be given a right to see what was said about him and his affairs at any later appeal.

[Mr. Beith]

Secondly, looking back to the House of Lords decision in 1991 in the case of T. C. Coombs and Co., to authorise a notice, the commissioner should be satisfied that, in all the circumstances, the inspector is justified. There is an implied duty on the inspector to divulge all relevant information, even if it does not support his case.

With that case in mind, we should ensure that both aspects are guaranteed. The first is guaranteed in section 20, but the second is not. There is no guarantee that the implied duty to divulge all relevant information will be exercised. If that were to be made a statutory requirement, and if the taxpayer were given the right to discover what had been said, it would be a reasonable safeguard.

Thirdly, we should ensure that when a commissioner hears a case for a notice under section 20, he should not be able to hear a future appeal relating to that taxpayer. It is not clear how often, if ever, that actually happens. The Minister may know how often the commissioner who hears an application for notice under the existing procedure turns out to be the commissioner who deals with that taxpayer's affairs at a later date. If a commissioner has already heard in private and without challenge many arguments of detail about that taxpayer's affairs, it may not be proper for him to be the person judging independently at a later stage that taxpayer's affairs. We believe that we should have such a safeguard. To what extent it is a safeguard observed in practice at the moment we do not know. The Financial Secretary may know the answer.

Those are the grounds on which we tabled the new clause. We believe that an important principle for the protection of taxpayers is involved even in the limited area in which, we all recognise, there may need to be the use of powers for the disclosure of documents so that fraud and evasion of taxes are not allowed to continue.

Mr. Dorrell: I of course agree with the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) that the question of the powers vested in the Inland Revenue to secure the proper collection of taxes is a proper concern of civil liberties and that we have to ensure that the balance between the powers of the Inland Revenue and the rights of the taxpayer is maintained. However, it is important to be clear about the circumstances in which an information notice can be served on a taxpayer.

The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that there are two routes by which an information notice can be served on a taxpayer. Either—this is the normal case—an inspector applies to the commissioners for an information notice and the commissioners grant it in the normal conduct of their duties—that is, on the commissioners' authority on the initiative of the inspector—or there is a power for the board to issue an information notice on its own authority without needing to go to the commissioners.

The right hon. Gentleman did not draw the attention of the House to the provisions in the Finance Act 1990 that limit the circumstances in which the board may legitimately use that discretion to circumstances in which the board can be satisfied that completion of the normal process—that is, applying to the commissioners—would lead to the danger that the right of the Revenue to collect tax that is due would be prejudiced. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman recognises that that is a legitimate concern and that the due process can on occasions lead to delay. Where there is a danger that the delay caused by due process would lead to a taxpayer avoiding tax that is legally due, it is reasonable for us to have a special process to avoid that happening.

The Inland Revenue has in place a code of practice which ensures that the power that is vested in the board of the Inland Revenue to issue information notices in such circumstances is delegated only to a very few senior officials. The inspector who seeks an information power has a choice between applying to the commissioners as an independent body or applying through the internal processes of the Revenue to one of the senior officials who has the power to issue the information notice only if he is satisfied that the conditions of the 1990 Act are satisfied, which is the key point.

That process achieves the objective that I set out at the beginning, which is that we need to maintain a proper balance between the right of the Inland Revenue to secure the information that it needs to collect tax that is properly due and the proper right of the taxpayer to insist that his interests are safeguarded. I shall consider the point that the right hon. Gentleman made about the ability to go back to examine records of decisions made by the commissioners and by senior officials at the Revenue in these circumstances. But I would not be in favour of the further legislative constraints which the right hon. Gentleman envisages because I am satisfied that the existing arrangements provide proper safeguards and maintain the balance that all in the House want to see.

Mr. Beith: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for agreeing to look at some of my specific suggestions, some of which could be implemented without following a statutory route. His reply on the main point had the blandness that one associates with Revenue defences of its existing powers. I cannot imagine a situation in which an official of the Revenue conscientiously going about his duties would not believe implicitly that he should not fail to use the most expeditious power—in this case, the power to go to the board of the Inland Revenue rather than to a commissioner. He would believe implicitly that that power was being exercised to avoid loss to the Revenue of tax that it should properly collect—collection that might be prejudiced by any further delay. Inland Revenue officials go through life suffused with confidence that they are acting on that principle. It was some external check on the exercise of that power which I sought and which I still think desirable.

Mr. Dorrell: The right hon. Gentleman should take note of the fact that the senior officials of the Inland Revenue have been satisfied that the test is passed only in roughly 15 to 20 cases a year.

Mr. Beith: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for that clarification, which is some reassurance. I hope that when he considers my detailed suggestions, he will bear in mind not only the point about unauthorised disclosure, which I hope causes people in the Inland Revenue to think again, but even more my point about the effect on banks and financial institutions of such notices. If the procedure is exercised at all, it could prejudice the conduct of the taxpayer's affairs and it might do so in circumstances in which the taxpayer is wholly innocent. I hope that the Financial Secretary will bear that point in mind. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 11

ENGLISH WINE SALES (RELIEF OF DUTY) (NO. 1)

'. In section 56(1) of the Alcoholic Liquor Act 1979 (Power to regulate making of wine and made-wine provide for charging duty thereon) after paragraph (e) there shall be inserted—

"(f) relieving duty on sales of wine bought directly from vineyards by way of farmgate sales.".'.—[Sir Anthony Grant.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this it will be convenient to take new clause 12—English wine sales (relief of duty) (No. 2)—

'. In section 56(1) of the Alcoholic Liquor Act 1979 (Power to regulate making of wine and made-wine provide for charging duty thereon) after paragraph (e) there shall be inserted—

"(g) relieving duty from wine sold in vineyards of under 10 hectares of production.".

Sir Anthony Grant: I did not expect to move the new clause, although I wholly support it. I know that some of my hon. Friends will wish to speak at rather greater length than I do, so I shall not detain the House. The new clause is designed to rectify the grossly unfair position in which English vineyards find themselves. I have in my constituency a vineyard called Gamlingay. It produces on a fairly small scale a very nice dry white wine which I commend to hon. Members and to anyone else who likes to participate.

One reason why the vineyard has difficulties is the imposition of duty. The producers sell the wine for £4·50 a bottle, of which approximately £1·20 is duty. If it were sold in France, in Germany, in Luxembourg, in Portugal, in Italy, in Greece or in Spain, the £1·20 would not arise. If our producers were on a level playing field, they could sell the wine for £3·30.

This problem applies not only to that vineyard, but throughout the British wine trade. If an Englishman, a Welshman or a Scotsman buys 10 cases of wine by direct sale from a vineyard in any of those European countries, he would pay no excise duty. If he bought the wine in France, the duty would be about 2p a bottle, which is negligible. He could bring that wine back home to the United Kingdom without having paid any duty. That same person buying at an English or Welsh vineyard, whether Gamlingay or anywhere else, will pay £1·16 or £1·20 a bottle in duty, or as much as £1·92 if the wine is sparkling. That is patently unfair to English vineyards. We talk about a level playing field in Europe. That should apply to everything, and certainly to wine.

It is with absolute confidence that I move the new clause. I believe that Treasury Ministers wish to support British wine as well as to consume it. I believe that they wish to encourage the trade and that they want to put us on the basis that applies in Europe. There is no excuse for discrimination, and the sooner that it is got rid of the better. One way to do that is to accept the new clause with pleasure and with alacrity.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): We have heard an enchanting case for the merits of English wine and the prospect of the garden of England being bedecked with new vineyards. I can see the case which is being made, but the new clause amounts either to a plan to subvert EC fiscal legislation—I can well understand why some hon. Members want to do that—or to an invitation to open a Pandora's box of delights concerning the consequential effects on other alcohol taxation.

Unless the Paymaster General tells us to the contrary—I fear that he will not—we will be told that, first of all the new clause runs foul of the agreements on harmonisation, which the Government signed with other European countries, and that if the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire South-West (Sir A. Grant) and his right hon. and hon. Friends wish to have the new lower duty on English-produced wine they will have to have that duty on all wine sold in this country.

Although we suggested in Committee that there was a need for some adjustment in the relative fiscal scales on alcohol taxation, I do not think that anyone suggested reducing the duty on wine in this country to the same level as that of some of our European neighbours.

One of the new clauses would make farm gate sales free of duty; the other would exempt from duty smallholdings smaller than 10 hectares. If the change is applied to wine, why not apply it to beer or spirits? That would invite small-scale duty free sales of home-distilled brews across the country, which may have many attractions but would subvert the basis of charging duty on alcohol and would give rise to a curious distortion in the structure of the industry, as our breweries and distilleries had to get themselves down to the farm gate sales threshold, or the 10 hectares, to take advantage of selling cheap booze.

Although the hon. Gentleman's move to give a special boost to English wine is attractive, I fear that the Paymaster General will have no alternative but to knock it firmly on the head.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): I have a constituency point that causes me to support the new clause. I also support in general the need to make English vineyards as competitive as possible. Although they make fine wines, they do not compete on price. Much of that is a result of the burden of over-regulation and excise duty.

My point relates entirely to our new clause on farm gate prices. The custom of the vineyards in my part of Sussex had dropped dramatically as a result of the single market. I am not criticising the single market—thank goodness for it—but it is having a definite effect on the vineyards in east Sussex because they are not able to sell wines—as they have done—from the vineyards. We must encourage them to be as competitive as possible vis-a-vis the French vineyards. One has only to spend a brief period on holiday in France and see how much of its product any vineyard will sell to people who turn up at the farm gate to notice what a substantial part of sales it is for many vineyards and how much it contributes to their annual output and hence their profit.

I hope that the Paymaster General will, in a general review of English vineyards and the Customs regime to which they are subject, have a good look at helping to make English vineyards considerably more competitive, particularly at the farm gate.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I am glad to have caught your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, over a topic about which I have spoken in the House for the past 15 years. On one occasion—I want to assure the Whips that this will not be such an occasion—I had the Adjournment debate at 10 o'clock. As the business of the House had collapsed, the debate started at 4.30 pm. I had a wonderful three hours —4.30 pm to 7 pm and then from 10 pm to 10.30 pm. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) was engaged in that operation with me and I am pleased to see him here tonight.

I should declare an interest at the outset. I was interested in English wine long before the English Vineyard Association was even thought about, and before we had an English vineyard industry. I now advise the association, which has 400 commercial vineyards in membership. I do not think that many hon. Members realise that there are 400 commercial vineyards in this country. They now produce just short of 25,000 hectolitres of wine a year, some of which is very good.

The trouble is that English wine is out of the reach of the majority of the population, not because it is too difficult to get down in a glass, but because it sells for too much. For most people, the average price of a bottle of wine is £2·99 or less. As the duty on a bottle of English wine is £1·16, one can see that that leaves only £1·83 for a bottle of wine to be produced, marketed and retailed.

I have to declare a second interest, as I have five vineyards in my constituency, and they are very good indeed. I make it a point to visit them to ensure that they are doing what they should be doing and in the way in which we would like it to be done. Devon has 10 vineyards. Somerset has 10 vineyards. Norfolk has only four, but Kent has 170 acres of vines. In the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) there is one vineyard of more than 200 acres. The industry is quite big now.

The vineyards in Britain are so far north that they do not yield as much wine as the French or Spanish vineyards. They need help from the Government——

Mr. Andrew Smith: And sunshine.

Mr. Steen: Sunshine, yes, but they can be helped with the duty as well, which is what this issue is about. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) quite rightly said, people go to France, not only in charabancs but in large transit vehicles, and they can buy any amount of still and sparkling wine at the French level of duty, which is 2p on the bottle. Much more significantly, if they go to any vineyard in Germany, Italy, Spain or Greece and buy over the gate, which is what the new clause is about, there is no duty at all.

Only one country apart from Britain imposes duty on farm gate sales—France. France imposes a duty of 2p a bottle, which includes VAT. In Britain, the duty is £1·16 a bottle, including VAT. There is thus no incentive for British vineyard owners to show tourists around their vineyards because those who would like to take away a little souvenir bottle of wine discover that there is a large amount of duty to be paid on each bottle. In any other European country apart from France such bottles are excise duty free because they are counted as farm sales for personal use. In France people can take six cases of wine, sparkling or otherwise, from a vineyard and pay only 2p a bottle duty on it. In Italy, Spain, Portugal, Greece or Germany cases of wine can be bought without paying duty on them—or VAT.

The new clause tries to establish a level vineyard across Europe. I look forward to hearing what the Paymaster General has to say about this. He will probably say that he has not appreciated that there was a problem. We are, after all, talking about a drop in the ocean—the amount of duty involved, to mix a metaphor, is no skin off the Treasury's nose. We are talking about a few pence at most.

The present injustice hurts vineyards in constituencies such as that of my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait). Many people cross the channel and then drive along the coast. The French, who are understandably rather careless of English wine, drive into vineyards on the Sussex coast and get the shock of their lives when they find that they have to pay £6 for a bottle of wine when they can buy as good wine for a third of the price in France or elsewhere——

Mrs. Lait: Half the price.

Mr. Steen: Quite so.

The new clause is only about farm gate sales and is designed to deal with our Government's discrimination against our own vineyards. The Government have shown clearly that they realise that we must back British goods, and it would help vineyards' commercial viability—they are experiencing difficult times—if they were not charged for farm gate sales to people who buy wine for their own use. Accepting the measure would do such vineyards a great service.

New clause 12 has to do with relief of duty on wines sold from vineyards of under 10 hectares. Most of our 400 commercial vineyards are very small, and it would be marvellous if the Government gave them some relief. There is a precedent for this: the arrangement giving those who produce wine a growers' allowance. I do not know how much they are allowed to consume without paying excise duty, but the point remains the same.

I should have thought that the Government could easily accept this new clause, which would merely give statutory form to the growers' allowance, which is already well established here. Cider producers also enjoy some arrangement allowing them to produce some cider for their own consumption without paying duty on it.

I hope that the Minister appreciates the great interest in the House in English wine. Certainly Conservative Members have a great many vineyards in their constituencies. I look forward to hearing from my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), who runs his own vineyard and who can speak with experience. We also look forward to hearing other hon. Members speak——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. Which other Members are called is entirely the choice of the Chair. It is not up to the hon. Member who is speaking.

Mr. Steen: I apologise without reservation, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You, of course, choose the speakers. I was just hinting that you might choose a speaker who happened to own a vineyard.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): I am very interested to hear about the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of the wine industry, and I have great sympathy with what he is saying. I only hope that the farm gate price of whisky can come down too, so that Scotland can enjoy some of the stuff that we produce more cheaply—but I take the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Steen: What the hon. Gentleman says is precisely what I feared—the Minister will say that he cannot give way on wine because other people will start saying that the same should be done for whisky. There may indeed be a case for that. We are anxious to be fair to those who produce our wine. At the moment wine producers operate with both hands tied behind their backs—we seem to be shooting them not only in the foot but in the brain. We are not allowing them to encourage tourists to visit their vineyards and leave with bottles of wine, because we are tripling the amount that they have to pay for it.

Many other Members wish to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so I will conclude. If the Minister gets this one right, he will perform a great service to the nation —and solve a lot of problems.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): I begin by declaring an interest. On my farm in Suffolk we have a vineyard, which we planted five years ago. We planted seven acres with 12,000 vines, and we are proud to be part of a new and, we hope, growing industry in the United Kingdom.

I was appalled to hear the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) talking about cheap booze. That just shows how little he knows about the quality of wines that can be produced in England. The closer a producer is to the geographical extremity of where a fruit can grow, the better that fruit can be. Even though the process is more risky, the longer maturing period enables production of a better quality fruit.

We in the countryside have all been encouraged to diversify, and this is a diversification—not to mention a large investment, which I and many others who have tried to make a living in the countryside have made. The industry needs encouragement: not help, but fair competition.

The industry also creates employment. By the time we have looked after our vines and made and marketed the wine, our little venture employs six people, part or full time. It thus makes a contribution to local prosperity—another point for the Minister to bear in mind.

What we produce is drunk and enjoyed in this country. It substitutes for imports, another laudable achievement. We do not want help; we just want fair competition. My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) made a good point about that. At present, vineyards near France suffer greatly from unfair competition owing to the new regulations.

Mr. Steen: Am I right in thinking that my hon. Friend's very small vineyard has been extremely successful of late?

Mr. Carlisle: That remains to be seen. We have entered a competition and I look forward to hearing the result. I am hopeful that we have produced good quality wine.

I hope that the Minister will listen to the arguments. The wine industry is not a big one, but it is developing. It is a serious industry, which is becoming more professional and capable of producing good wine. Given a level playing field, we are confident that we will not only create employment in rural areas but help to cut imports.

Mr. Graham: I did not intend to speak in this debate, but I have a lot of sympathy with what hon. Members have said, for example, about employment, which is very important.

I understand the rules that apply in other parts of Europe, and I agree that we should have a level playing field. I would like to extend it to the social chapter and other areas, but that is not the point.

7.30 pm

For years one tremendous growth industry in Scotland has been the tourist trail to distillers. As many hon. Members are aware, people from all over the world visit the distilleries to take a wee dram and encourage them to buy whisky when they get back home. I understand the point about possible visitors to the new wineries in England, or whatever they are called, and how that could be a new growth industry in tourism.

Last night I was reading a book about the history of Great Britain, starting with the Roman times. There was a paragraph about the wine that was produced in those days. Some of the finest wine in the Roman world was produced in Britain. Apparently, the climate then was slightly better than it is today. I came here from Scotland today, and I know how different the weather is in Scotland. I think that, given the heat down here, not only grapes but bananas can be grown.

On a less frivolous note, I think that what hon. Members have said tonight is very serious. I believe in a level playing field and if wine can be bought duty free at the farm gate in France, Germany, and other countries, that should be possible here.

I genuinely believe, based on historical facts, that we can produce wine as good as that produced by any other country. I would encourage the folk in England, who are lucky enough to have the right weather, to produce the wine. The Government could take a wee lesson and give strong support to the new flourishing art—or rather ancient flourishing art—of wine making in Great Britain.

Like every other hon. Member, I like a wee glass of wine. I do not know a good wine from a bad one. I would follow the advice of the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen), who seems to have visited all the vineyards. Next time perhaps he would like to take me and my family with him.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid-Sussex): I am grateful for the support of the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) for the new clauses to which I have put my name. Perhaps we could have a useful twinning association and organise exchange visits to the vineyards in Sussex, Kent or Suffolk and the distilleries that are near the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle)—and this is an unsolicited comment: I have drunk his wine and it is excellent. I hope that soon the Chairman of the Catering Select Committee will ensure that it is available in the Members' and Strangers' Dining Rooms.

I am happy to support the new clause tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen). I spoke in support of him a number of years ago in the debate to which he referred. In my part of the world, in the county of Sussex, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and

[Mr. Tim Renton]

Rye (Mrs. Lait) has already said, vineyards are a growing business. That is a bad pun, but the fact is that tourism has always been immensely important to Sussex.

In recent years, coastal towns such as Hastings, Eastbourne and Brighton have not found it easy to develop their tourist industry. One of the good recent developments is the vineyards, which are increasingly flourishing. Those on the downs in my constituency, inland from the coast, provide a pleasant stopping place during the day for tourists who have been to Brighton, Eastbourne or Hastings. In the afternoon, tourists and their families can go to somewhere like Drusilla's vineyard, where there is a wine shop that sells farm produce as well as English wine.

As my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams has rightly pointed out, there is an anomaly. We want to sell more English farm produce and English wine from our local shops, but the duty on English wine sold at the farm gate is £1·16 a bottle as compared with 2p a bottle in a comparable establishment in France, or nothing at all in other comparable continental establishments. I am sure that my right hon. and good Friend the Paymaster General will say something encouraging about that when he winds up the debate.

Many people in Sussex now take their cars on the ferry over to France from Newhaven, which is next door to Hastings and my constituency. They fill their car boots with dozens and dozens of bottles of wine at the hyper in Dieppe or Pas de Calais. I am a great supporter of the single market, but it is wrong that there should be such a tax differential against our English wine.

Mr. Graham: Is the right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) aware that coach loads of people come down from Scotland every week, or every day, and go over to France to buy wine? They could possibly stop in his area, load up there with wine and save the cost of the petrol necessary to go to France. That would increase the amount of money that would go to the Exchequer.

Mr. Renton: I am delighted that Scotland is so prosperous under a Conservative Government that so many of the hon. Gentleman's constituents are able to take a bus down to fill up with wine in France. I hope that they will also stop at our wine shops in Sussex on the way back.

The tax differential poses a serious problem in Sussex. It is not a frivolous matter. Wine growing is an important young industry and we wish to be able to compete against our continental neighbours on a level vineyard, to use the memorable phrase of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams.

Sussex has often prided itself on the slogan "Come to Sussex, Sussex by the sea". We would like to add a word in the middle of that. We would like people, when they come, to drink Sussex "Sauvignon" by the sea.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): I should like to endorse everything that my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) has said, which applies equally to the vineyards of Kent.

I do not think that it is up to the Chairman of the Catering Select Committee to decide which wines are supplied in our Dining Rooms. All I know is that the excellent Syndale valley wine from my constituency—it is produced close to my home—got on to the wine list. I was privileged to be a member of the Select Committee when it tasted the wines. It was done without any knowledge of the origin of the wines, but that local wine still got on to the wine list. That is a tribute to my local vineyard and explains why I wish to add my voice to the powerful voices that have been heard today in support of the new clause.

Mr. Steen: I am a member of the Catering Select Committee, and I can inform the House that there are moves afoot to remove English wine from the list. Does my hon. Friend agree that we should resist that with all the enthusiasm that we can muster?

Sir Roger Moate: It would certainly be sad if that happened. The important thing is that consumers should be allowed to make their choice.

There is tremendous international competition to supply the wine drinkers of this country. The English vineyards do not produce volumes of wine and cannot compete easily with the flood of high quality wines that now come into this country. What is of tremendous importance is that they can compete by offering tourists and others the opportunity to visit vineyards that are found in some of the loveliest parts of the countryside.

I urge my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General and his colleagues, when considering the new clause or other proposals, to remember that the fact that people can go into the countryside, visit the vineyards and buy wines there is a tremendous and fast developing asset. That is the key point. It is even more important because of the international competition.

If it is true, as we are informed, that virtually no excise duty is charged at the farm gate in France, and that in most other European countries no tax is imposed, what is the justification for imposing it here? It cannot be because of the revenue raised because the amount collected must be very small. But if we can encourage tourism, diversification, conservation and the improvement of the countryside, I should have thought that my right hon. Friend would accept our overwhelming argument.

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): I, too, like English wines. Indeed, I have a constituency interest in the form of a small vineyard at Thornbury castle. I understand what my hon. Friends are trying to achieve in tabling the new clauses, which are designed, as their title suggests, to assist English wines. However, they do not do that. They demonstrate my difficulty in distinguishing between English and other wines under the tax system.

The basic principle of international trade was laid down many years ago, after the war, in article III of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, which says:

"the products of the territory of any Contracting Party should not be subject, directly or indirectly, to internal taxes or other internal charges of any kind in excess of those applied, directly or indirectly, to like domestic products."

Since 1947, there has been a lot of case law on that and it covers the matters that we are discussing. Under GATT we are not permitted to distinguish in favour of English as opposed to imported wines. The principle behind it is that no country's tax system should discriminate against imports. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was doing his best the other day to achieve improvements in GATT and to lower all sorts of trade barriers.

It is also against article 95 of the treaty of Rome and European law to distinguish between products in that way.

Dr. Godman: Is the Paymaster General confident that his decision to reject the new clauses is compatible with European Community law and hence not challengeable in the European Court of Justice?

Sir John Cope: Yes. I have just quoted the GATT article and mentioned the treaty of Rome and subsequent bits of European law.

In trying to get around the problem of not contravening GATT or the treaty of Rome, my hon. Friends have hit on two ideas, which are incorporated in the new clauses: first, so-called "farm gate sales"; and, secondly, the 10 hectare suggestion.

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Paymaster General has given the answer that I expected about European and international law, but how would he reply to the argument that in other European countries, with the exception of France, those farm gate sales are not charged duty?

Sir John Cope: I should not have given way to the hon. Gentleman and I apologise to the House for having done so because I was just coming to that point.

New clause 11 deals with farm gate sales, or rather vineyard gate sales. There is no difference in any European country between duty at the gate of a vineyard, or within a vineyard, and duty at a supermarket or anywhere else, nor can we introduce a difference under European law. The overall duties on wine imposed by France are less than that imposed by this country, and other European countries impose no duty at all. But that is true across the board; it is no advantage to sell wine at a vineyard, nor can we introduce such an advantage.

It is a question of the difference in excise duties between this country and the other countries named by my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen). Our neighbours in other directions, such as Ireland, impose a duty similar to or higher than that imposed by this country. We have often discussed the difference between our excise duties and that of other countries. My hon. Friend discussed a direct function of a much wider argument about excise duties, particularly in the light of the single market.

Mr. Steen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Sir John Cope: I should first like to discuss new clause 12, which deals with the 10 hectare limit.

Sir Roger Moate: Before my right hon. Friend leaves that point, may I say that the English Vineyards Association informed most hon. Members that all those other European countries pay no excise duty at the vineyard? Is my right hon. Friend saying that that is simply because they pay no excise duty at all on all wine sales, or is our information wrong?

Sir John Cope: I am saying exactly what my hon. Friend suggests. No excise duty—in some cases, VAT is charged—is payable on wine in the countries named, apart from France which imposes a small amount of excise duty. The rate of excise duty and VAT is exactly the same for sales at vineyards and in supermarkets or anywhere else in France and other European countries.

New clause 12 suggests that we should discriminate on the basis of size, but 10 hectares is far too large for discrimination to be of value. The vast majority of vineyards throughout the continent are under 10 hectares. I am told that most premier cru Burgundy comes from vineyards of under 3 hectares. Those small vineyards have a small production because they believe in being exclusive to maintain their markets. There are approximately 1·9 million vineyards on the continent, of which only 90,000 measure more than 10 hectares. Therefore, the difference of 10 hectares would be of little use and the same would be true if we changed that figure to 5 hectares or fewer.

Because of the international agreements that I mentioned earlier, we would be unable to distinguish between European and English wines in that way. If we said that the produce of small vineyards under 10 hectares or some other size should carry a lower rate of duty, we would have to apply that rule to continental vineyards of the same size, which is the vast majority of them. It is another way of saying that we would reduce the rate of excise duty on wine from almost anywhere in the world. Under GATT, an Australian vineyard of over 100 hectares or a large Californian vineyard would have to be treated in the same way as we treat our most favoured vineyards. We would have to offer the 10 hectare rate even to the most enormous vineyards imaginable, provided that they were overseas. It would discriminate only against large United Kingdom vineyards, not against large vineyards elseshere.

For all those reasons, I do not think that either of the solutions offered by my hon. Friends provides a way forward for us. I believe in free international trade; I also believe in the single market. I recognise the problems caused by the difference in duty rates, which is not confined to wine, but is a wider issue. In the circumstances, it is not possible to use a duty device to benefit English wine. I hope that the trade flourishes. The best way to ensure that is by improving marketing techniques and by extending the ways in which grapes are grown and wine is produced and marketed. We cannot ensure that the trade flourishes by trying to seek duty advantages, which would cause immense difficulties.

Mr. Steen: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the English Vineyards Association is planning to set up stalls in French ports to sell English wine to English travellers returning from France so that they can buy English wine at £1·16 a bottle less than in England? It is crazy for English people to go to France to buy English wine to bring back to this country because it is cheaper in France. If the new clauses are incorrectly drafted, can my right hon. Friend help us to table some helpful new clauses?

Sir John Cope: I do not believe that there is a method of distinguishing, through the duty, in favour of English wine. Perhaps somebody else can find a way, but I have not found a method consistent with GATT or European Community agreements that benefits English wine through the use of duty.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams has mentioned a marketing method. I was commending innovative marketing methods, and my hon. Friend has drawn attention to just such a scheme. I recognise the difficulties of which he has spoken, but it is true that English wine or any other wine bought in France for personal consumption and either brought back to this country or drunk in France bears French duty. The important factor is the country in which the wine is bought; it is not the specific farm gate or place where the wine is bought or where it is produced. I cannot accept the new clauses.

Question put and negatived.

New clause 23

TAXATION OF FISHING VESSEL DECOMMISSIONING GRANT

'(1) Any grant received under the Fishing Vessels (Decommissioning) Scheme 1993, shall be taxed in accordance with subsections (2) to (4) below.

(2) For the purposes of capital gains tax, a sum payable to an individual by virtue of the scheme referred to in subsection (1) above shall not be treated as part of the consideration obtained by him for, or otherwise as accruing to him on, the disposal of any asset.

(3) Where a vessel is scrapped in compliance with grant conditions under a scheme referred to in subsection (1) above, then for all the purposes of capital allowances legislation, and in particular Part II, Chapter II of the Capital Allowances Act 1990, the disposal proceeds to be brought into calculation of the balances adjustment for the purposes of section 24 of the said Act and the value attributable under section 26 of the said Act or otherwise shall be deemed to be nil.

(4) No part of a sum payable by virtue of a scheme referred to in subsection (1) above shall be treated as a trading receipt in the Schedule D Case/computation of profits of the applicant.'.—[Mr. Wallace.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I hope that the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) will remain in the Chamber as she said in last Wednesday's debate on decommissioning that she was very much on the side of the fishermen, and I think that today's debate will give her the opportunity to reaffirm that. Last Wednesday the House approved the decommissioning scheme for 1993-94, which is expected to be the first of three annual decommissioning schemes amounting to £8·4 million per annum.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I am not sure that the order says £8·4 million per annum, but it says £25 million over three years.

Mr. Wallace: I think that the hon. Gentleman is right. I do not think that the order specifies the amount, but the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food stated what the amount was likely to be over three years. In the present year the figure is expected to be £8·4 million, and the same in each of the two succeeding years.

An official explanatory leaflet sent to people in the industry stated that, in order to qualify for a decommissioning grant—for which hon. Members on both sides of the House have called for many years—three specific conditions must be met. First, the vessel must be scrapped—permanently broken up or disabled so that it is incapable of going to sea. Secondly, registration in the register of fishing vessels must be cancelled. Thirdly, all valid fishing licences must be surrendered.

The leaflet comments on the tax treatment and states:

"Decommissioning grants are taxable in the same way as other grants to the agriculture and fishing industries".

That is an unilluminating statement which begs the question of what prompted the new clause. I hope that the Treasury team will be prepared to accept what I believe to be the most favourable taxation treatment of decommissioning grants. If that is not acceptable, it would be helpful to those in the industry if the Treasury team could state how decommissioning grants are to be taxed.

The hon. Members for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes), for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) have all taken part, over many years, in debates on decommissioning. I think that they, like me, will recall that when we have tried to do the sums, the Fontainebleau agreement has often been introduced into the debate so that it becomes unclear how much the scheme will cost the Treasury. We have always asked what sum will be taken back from the fishermen in tax. I do not recall fisheries Ministers ever giving a clear answer to that question. There is an opportunity this evening for Ministers to clarify the position.

We are asking businessmen to submit tenders and make serious business decisions to scrap their vessels when a key element in the calculation is unclear. I very much hope that tonight we can do something to clarify the position, not least because it was announced last Wednesday that fishermen have until the end of this month to make their submissions for decommissioning grants. Any further information that can be given this evening will be most welcome.

Dr. Godman: Is the hon. Gentleman confident that the scheme will not be hogged by Humberside trawlers in the same way that the previous scheme was so manipulated?

Mr. Wallace: The previous scheme was much criticised, not least by the Public Accounts Committee, and we shall want to watch how the new scheme operates. We do not want money to go only to one port. I shall be ruled out of order if I become too embroiled in a debate on the merits or otherwise of the decommissioning scheme. Many of us would argue that money is not enough, but this evening we are concerned with the tax consequences.

It appears that there are four ways in which the sums can be taxed. First, the receipts could be taxable as trading income. Although nothing in the scheme requires the applicant to cease trading, it would, for the most part, seem reasonably self-evident that if a person scraps his boat, he is unlikely to carry on trading. Such a method will probably not commend itself to the Treasury, particularly, as has been said, if the licences have been returned. Secondly, the receipt could be considered to relate solely to the scrapping of the vessel and accordingly to be taken into account when calculating capital allowances. I suspect that the Treasury may wish to pursue that policy.

Thirdly, the receipt or part of it could be treated as a capital gain. In addition to receiving compensation for the vessel, it could be argued that the value received also includes an element for the surrender of a precious stock licence and the forfeiture of the right to fish with that vessel. I believe that there is case law to support the argument that payments for those items—which amount to goodwill attached to the vessel—could be regarded as capital receipts.

When a grant is allocated, no indication is given as to the amount awarded in respect of the vessel and the amount awarded in respect of the licence. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department may consider that no value is attributable the licence on the basis that nothing was paid for it. I understand that in the north-east of Scotland the Inland Revenue routinely pursue a policy of attributing value to a licence as a capital asset when a vessel is sold. It is possible that a grant in excess of the vessel's current market value could be treated by the Revenue as capital.

Fourthly, it could be accepted that no tax is to be paid on the grant—a proposal that I commend to the House. I believe that that may have been the case in some previous decommissioning grant schemes, although the status of some of those grants has not been made clear from the commissioners' decisions. Perhaps the Ministers will tell us about the operation of decommissioning grants under previous schemes.

The new clause has no implications for capital gains or income tax and it has some precedent. I refer the House to the tax treatment of grants under section 27 of the Agriculture Act 1967. That Government grant was to encourage people to reinquish the occupation of uncommercial agricultural units. The parallel between relinquishing such units and the decommissioning of fishing vessels is immediately obvious. Section 249 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 states:

"For the purposes of capital gains tax, a sum payable to an individual by virtue of a scheme under section 27 of the Agriculture Act 1967 (grants for relinquishing occupation of uncommercial agricultural units) shall not be treated as part of the consideration obtained by him for, or otherwise as accruing to him on, the disposal of any asset."

The leaflet from which I quoted said that the method of taxation would be similar to that which applies to other agriculture and fishing grants.

I have given an example of an agricultural grant that is not included for the purposes of capital gains tax. I am sure that the Financial Secretary is aware of other agricultural grants such as those payable under sections 9 and 12 of the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968. Section 9 deals with grants for reorganisation compensation. When dealing with it the then Minister of Agriculture, Fred Peart, said:

"This is a difficult matter, and right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite are right to ask whether the new payments will be liable to Capital Gains Tax, Income Tax or betterment levy.

Tenants will not be liable for Capital Gains Tax, Income Tax or betterment levy on sums received under Clauses 9 and 12. These sums do not constitute a capital gain or, in the Land Commission's view a realisation of development value, nor do they constitute part of the tenant's taxable income."—[Official Report, 21 February 1968; Vol. 759, c. 473.]

That is another example of agricultural grants not being taken into account for tax purposes.

The new clause seeks to have the grant accepted as non-taxable and to permit the balancing allowance to be granted on the vessel. I do not purport to be an expert in understanding how balancing allowances and balancing charges work. However, they may be of little practical use to taxpayers who have applied for a grant and who have accumulated trading losses in recent years. It would preserve a measure of equity between those who have claimed allowances to augment losses and produce relief against other income and taxpayers who have sought to preserve the tax value of their vessel to set against future taxable balancing charges on a sale.

The share fishermen system operates in Scotland and there are differences throughout Scotland. Unlike parts of the north-east of Scotland, the practice in my constituency for a new person joining a partnership is for continuation elections to be signed when there are partnership changes. The effect of that is that the new partner takes on a share of the tax written down value of the vessel which reflects previously granted allowances. Subsequent allowances do not reflect the price that he pays for his share. There is always the possibility of that person having to pay tax on a balancing charge in excess of the allowances to which he may have been entitled. That means that there may well be a disincentive to Shetland fishermen applying for grants or at least to gross bids up more than would otherwise be the case.

That brings us to the purpose of the grants. The primary obligation is to reduce capacity to meet multi-annual guidance programme targets. Value for money can be measured in how much capacity can be taken out of the fleet. Many of us would have liked to see more money for decommissioning, but surely the effect of the small amount that has been made available should be maximised. An applicant must include the tax impact of accepting a grant in his calculation. If the effectiveness of the scheme is to be judged on catching capacity taken out, the clear efficiency argument says that if no tax is levied on the receipt there will be lower tenders and, therefore, more bids accepted and more capacity removed from the fleet. There will be greater value for money. I accept that that may not mean so much revenue for the Treasury, but it would be pleasant for once to see the Treasury trying to support the policy of another Department rather than trying to frustrate it.

Dr. Godman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the developments that we wish to see with a sensible decommissioning scheme in some of our ports is the pulling out of the older vessels so that the fleet can remain fairly modern? Does the new clause encourage that development?

Mr. Wallace: I suspect that it would certainly help. If I recall correctly, it was said in the debate on Wednesday that vessels had to be at least 10 years old.

If a person applying for a tender has to gross up to take account of the tax that he must subsequently pay, fewer vessels will be taken out of the fleet and the relatively small amount of money will not go so far in reducing capacity. Making the grant tax free would be the best contribution towards achieving the object of the exercise. Those who are engaged in the exercise should know where they stand on taxation before making important business decisions.

Mr. Salmond: I should like to be associated with the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). He has presented the detail of the technical argument and I shall concentrate on why the industry needs some additional tax incentive as part of the decommissioning package. It is highly appropriate that this matter should be debated during consideration of the Finance (No. 2) Bill because many of the decisions, not just for the fishing industry but for all resource-based industries, have been Treasury and Revenue led. That is true for oil, gas and whisky and it is certainly true for fishing.

The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has argued for some time that its original two-year decommissioning scheme was extended to three years with no more money because of pressure from the Treasury, perhaps from the Financial Secretary himself. In a debate on fishing on Wednesday, I quoted an example given to me by Mr. Hugh Allen, the secretary designate to the Mallaig and North West Fishermens Association, on the precise detail of the proposal by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland.

I do not propose to quote the example again because it is available in Hansard. Mr. Allen reasonably set out a case study whereby a fisherman putting in a decommissioning bid of £150,000 on a 15-year-old capital asset that might be worth that amount would be left, after the operation of taxation and other obligations on the decommissioning grant, with a grand total of £4,000. That money would have to be disbursed among four members of his crew.

If that is the current taxation system, it will severely inhibit a successful decommissioning scheme and will lead to one that is designed merely for the convenience of the Treasury. In the past few years, virtually every other fishing fleet in Europe has had access to substantial structural funds of hundreds of millions of ecu. Only the United Kingdom fishing fleet—the fishing fleets of Scotland, Northern Ireland, England and Wales—has not had access to that sort of structural funding. I hope, and it would be a triumph of hope over experience, that when the Financial Secretary replies he will go beyond the narrow Treasury accounting view of what is absolutely convenient and look to the possible success of the decommissioning scheme.

It has not escaped those of us from fishing constituencies that when Ministers argue about the costs of a decommissioning scheme, they always take the costs net of the deduction resulting from the Fontainebleu agreement—for example, even a scheme that is financed 75 per cent. from the European Community would have an impact greater than that on Treasury revenues because of the deduction from the United Kingdom rebate under the Fontainebleu agreement. Yet those same Ministers have always refused to look at the scheme net of taxation and net of the effect on the Treasury of taxation. That argument has been used to produce a very modest decommissioning package for the fishing industry.

Surely, tonight, the Financial Secretary should show that he appreciates that, without some tax concession, the decommissioning scheme could flounder and not have the effect that we all want, which is to bring capacity in the fishing industry into line with catching potential.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): For some years, the Labour party and the fishing industry have urged the Government to introduce a decommissioning scheme. Despite the existence of European Community funds towards the cost of national decommissioning schemes, the Government have repeatedly declared their opposition to such schemes. In February 1992, they announced that £25 million would be made available for a two-year scheme. That scheme is now to last for three years, but the money being made available—which includes EC grant—is unchanged.

That money is quite inadequate for an effective decommissioning programme. Indeed, the House of Lords Select Committee on European Affairs concluded that the £25 million

"is not even enough to prevent the fleet from expanding; four or five times that amount is now needed to make up for the lack of a decommissioning scheme in the United Kingdom during the last decade."

Given the wide agreement that the Government are putting forward too little money for decommissioning, the House should not reject the opportunity to lighten the tax burden on decommissioning grants.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) accurately said that this evening we are here to discuss the tax treatment of decommissioning grants, not their level or nature or the rules surrounding the scheme. The issue of the tax treatment of payments under the scheme is relatively simple. Tax law provides that those payments should be treated in exactly the same way as any payment that a boat operator would have received had his boat been sold. That is the principle that needs to be applied.

On the sorts of specific tax charges that might arise, the main case is that of fishing boats being sold at less than the full new value paid by the operator. In that case, as with any other capital asset sold by a trading entity, if it is sold for less than the tax written down value, no tax is payable; if it is sold for more than the tax written down value, a balancing charge is made. That is the usual provision in income tax for an individual or in corporation tax for a corporation when a capital asset is sold.

If a boat were sold for less than the new price paid for it by the business, that is the only circumstance in which tax would not be payable. If, however—I suspect that it would be relatively unlikely—a boat were sold for more than its original cost, there would be a balancing item because it would have been sold for more that the written down value. Potentially, a capital gains tax charge would be payable and the normal capital gains tax would apply. In calculating the charge to capital gain, the first consideration would be the new price paid for the boat, and then that would be indexed in accordance with the usual indexation provisions. If the boat were sold for an amount greater than the index-based value, once again —in exactly the same way as is with all other businesses operating in the economy—a capital gains tax charge would be payable.

8.15 pm

Dr. Godman: Given the seriousness of the issue and the good sense of the new clause, will the Financial Secretary tell us whether his officials have costed the proposal? It is an important matter. If the hon. Gentleman rejects the new clause, many fishermen may reject the decommissioning scheme.

Mr. Dorrell: Every time a proposal is made to us, we estimate its cost. The cost of the proposal in the new clause is not just the cost that would arise from the benefit to the fishing industry; it is the cost of establishing the precedent of treating Government grants as tax-exempt payments and the distorted incentives that would be built into the system. It would not be rational to build into the system a set of rules to provide that a payment under the decommissioning scheme was tax free, whereas if a boat operator had sold his boat on the open market he would incur a tax liability. That would build in all sorts of distortions, almost all of them undesirable.

In the circumstances surrounding the decommissioning scheme, the main case is not the capital gains tax charge that I described, although that is the law, but the fact that a boat operator is likely to be selling the boat for less than he paid for it, in which case all we are talking about is a balancing charge. That is familiar to any practising accountant dealing with business accounts.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Having considered the provisions of the decommissioning scheme and the likely price of the vessel if sold, has the Financial Secretary calculated what that would mean for the Treasury? Although he says that most accountants can understand the matter, those who have to make the decision do not necessarily understand it. Will the Treasury issue guidelines in clear language that everyone can understand?

Mr. Dorrell: I understand that the calculation of the balancing charge can sometimes be complex, but it is a well-established concept of tax law. We are not dealing with circumstances that differ from the circumstances of a farmer or any operator of a manufacturing or other trading business.

Mr. Hughes: Has the Minister done that calculation? Given the great importance that everyone in the fishing industry attaches to the decommissioning scheme and the paramount need for the scheme to succeed, will the Treasury issue letters of guidance so that the matter is clearly understood and no one is under any illusions about the exact position?

Mr. Dorrell: I have tried to set out the position in very clear language. It would not be clarified further by issuing what would be represented as a special guidance letter. I have said that, in determining whether a tax charge is payable on the disposal of a boat under the decommissioning scheme, the tax rules that would apply are the general rules that apply to all trading businesses when they sell a capital asset that has been employed in their trade.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I shall give way, but I sense that the House wants to get on to the next business.

Mr. Harris: I appreciate the pressure on my hon. Friend, but we are discussing important matters. I want to ask him two questions. First, will he deal with the point fairly raised by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) that an operator selling a boat is not just selling a capital asset; in most cases, he is going out of business? Secondly, will any allowance be made for the considerable cost of scrapping the boat? According to last week's debate, as much as £10,000 might be involved in the disposal of the asset. It is not just a question of a sale to someone else; the seller must then physically carry out the scrapping—or, in most cases, get someone else to do it.

Mr. Dorrell: Obviously, I shall need to take specific advice. As I have conceded to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes), these issues are not 100 per cent. simple; however, I assume that, if the business received a payment for the disposal of the boat under the decommissioning scheme and then incurred a cost, scrapping would be an allowable expense. It appears that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me. I emphasise, however, that those rules would be applied in the general case of traders disposing of a capital asset, whether in the course of their trade or on the day on which they closed down —which, sadly, is not unknown in the fishing industry.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I will give way once more to the hon. Gentleman; then I will end my speech.

Mr. Hughes: I think that we would all feel reassured if the Minister would state specifically that the Treasury was not banking on obtaining revenue from the scheme.

Mr. Dorrell: I have clearly stated that the amounts involved are extremely small from a tax-revenue point of view. However, if we are talking about establishing a precedent and about a sense of grievance among other traders in precisely similar circumstances, I do not believe that a tax-principle case has been established for departing from the general rules that any fishing boat operator would be able to secure from any practising accountant.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister's reply was very disappointing. He does not dispute any of our arguments; he does not deny that the new clause would be the best way in which to maximise the effect, and the objective, of the decommissioning scheme. He has virtually conceded that the cost to the Revenue would be minimal, possibly nothing. He seems to have based his argument on unwillingness to set a precedent; yet in his speech—in which he refused to give way to me—he singularly failed to address the precedents that I cited in my speech.

Fishermen should know that the tax treatment to which I referred applies to any other trader. As I said, the official leaflet sent to fishermen referred to taxation that applied in the same way to other agricultural and fishing grants; however, I referred to two—if not three—agricultural grants involving no tax treatment. Section 27 of the Agriculture Act 1967 contains a concession that was re-enacted as recently as last year. The precedents are already there; those in the fishing industry, hard pressed as they are, will wonder why on earth they cannot be given a little additional help, at virtually no cost to the Treasury.

Mr. Salmond: No doubt the hon. Gentleman will agree that some hon. Members are better briefed than the Minister in this regard. It is clear that the Minister still does not wish to contradict the interventions that have been made.

The Minister said that small amounts were involved, and that he was not very worried about that aspect. We have been given to understand that Treasury pressure turned the decommissioning scheme into a three-year scheme rather than the two-year scheme that was originally proposed. How do the two propositions sit together?

Mr. Wallace: It is not for me to try to understand that; I do not entirely understand it either. The opportunity to explain exists; the Minister has clarified the law as he sees it. However, we are here to legislate. The House had an opportunity tonight to change the position at no cost to the Treasury, but the Government have not sought to take that opportunity. I believe that the hard-pressed fishing communities on our coasts will notice that.

Dr. Godman: I, too, find the Minister's response disappointing. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) claimed—with considerable confidence—that such tax-free concessions were not unknown in agriculture; if that is true, his claim that we must not distort the tax system does not hold water. I feel that a general principle is involved. Let us suppose that several fishermen own a vessel, that they are involved in a share arrangement. They may well feel reluctant to give up that vessel for scrapping if they are not to receive such a concession.

The object of such a scheme is to reduce the capacity of the fleet. Without such small concessions, fishermen who —in many instances—have no alternative occupations to turn to in the community may be deeply unwilling to agree to a decommissioning scheme. We shall then be forced to continue with a fleet that is far too big for the stocks on which it relies.

I am extremely disappointed by the Minister's rejection of this sensible and fair-minded proposal.

Question put and negatived.

Clause 42

FUEL AND POWER FOR DOMESTIC OR CHARITY USE

Mr. William Powell: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 24, leave out lines 3 to 26.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following amendments.

No. 22, in page 24, line 6, leave out 'supply,'.

No. 23, in page 24, line 6, leave out ', acquisition or importation' and insert 'or acquisition'.

No. 24, in page 24, line 6, leave out ', acquisition'.

No. 2, in page 24, line 7, after 'place', insert—

'(a) in the case of a qualifying use within the meaning of Note (1)(a) of that Schedule (domestic use)'.

No. 1, in page 24, line 7, at end insert

'where the supply, acquisition or importation is for a qualifying use within the meaning of Note (1)(a) of that Schedule (domestic use)'.

No. 3, in page 24, line 7, at end insert

'and

(b) in the case of a qualifying use within the meaning of Note (1)(b) of that Schedule (use by a charity), on or after 1st April 2004'.

No. 25, in page 24, line 7, at end insert

'and

(b) in the case of a qualifying use within the meaning of Note (1)(b) of that Schedule (use by a charity), on or after 1st April 1988.'.

No. 5, in page 24, line 9, at end insert

'as respects supplies of the descriptions specified in Group 7 of Schedule 5 to that Act which are made for a qualifying use within the meaning of Note (1)(a) of that Schedule (domestic use)'.

Mr. Powell: One of the fascinations of Finance Bill Committee and Report stages is the huge variety of subjects that we manage to discuss in a comparatively short time. This afternoon, we have discussed home income plans, English wine, decommissioning of fishing vessels and other matters. Amendment No. 7, however, takes us to the heart of political controversy—a matter raised in the Budget speech of the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont). We discussed the matter fully in Committee, when I was lucky enough to catch the eye of the Chair: some of my speech caused some controversy.

Let me repeat the central assertions that I made then. My right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames made a serious error of judgment in advancing this proposal in his Budget speech; moreover—as I said in May—I personally feel ashamed that my party could have introduced such a proposal.

A good many things have happened since May. Perhaps the smallest development is this: I have received hundreds of letters from all over the country about the justice of this proposal. I had received such letters before, of course, but I believe that the debate in May promoted much more discussion in the country. I have engaged in much debate with my right hon. and hon. Friends on the subject, and I am confident in asserting now that Ministers realise that the Budget proposal resulted from a serious error of judgment. I regret that, so far, we have seen no sign that they are prepared to accept that in public.

The truth is that all of us, from time to time, make errors—often serious ones. However, when we realise that we have made such errors—perhaps not at first, but on subsequent examination—the best course is not to persist, but to own up and withdraw what we said initially. I oppose clause 42, which my amendment would strike out lock, stock and barrel. If my amendment is carried, the proposal for VAT to be extended to heating and cooking, fuel and power would go. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General is, I know, under no illusions whatsoever, but if any hon. Member imagines that at the end of the debate I shall ask for permission to withdraw the amendment, I must point out that I have no such intention.

I hope that my right hon. Friend intends to accept amendment No. 7. I shall have no hesitation in voting for it, just as I voted against clause 42. Although the Finance Bill contains many excellent provisions, I feel so strongly about this issue that it will not be possible for me to support my right hon. Friend in the Division Lobby in favour of giving the Bill a Third Reading if this provision remains in it.

8.30 pm

The reason for my strong opposition to clause 42 concerns social justice. The then Chancellor of the Exchequer was entirely within his rights to come forward in his Budget speech with proposals to raise taxes, if he felt that the public sector borrowing requirement made it necessary for him to include proposals to narrow the PSBR gap over a period of time. I understand that it was his hope to raise more than £2 billion a year when this tax is running at the full rate.

My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General may recall that when he said why the extra £2 billion had to be raised by extending VAT to heating and cooking, my right hon. Friend's answer included no justification whatsoever for it. Every hon. Member can identify other ways of raising £2 billion or more a year. Some of us might even be prepared, in certain circumstances, to allow the VAT base to be extended.

One of the proposals which I very much welcomed in the Budget was that changes should be made to the VAT rules to enable our bloodstock industry to overcome the terrifying fiscal disadvantages with which it was faced. A benefit was therefore given to racehorse owners in the Budget. I am a keen follower of the turf, as many of my right hon. and hon. Friends know. I welcome that provision. When it comes to social justice, however, the imposition of a £2 billion a year tax increase on heating and cooking while allowing a fiscal advantage to the owners of racehorses, not all of whom are British, is an extraordinary statement of social priorities.

If VAT has to be extended, I should find it much easier to justify extending it to newspapers and magazines. I enjoy reading Country Life, and I enjoy reading the articles by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) in Horse and Hound, but it does not seem to me that there is a compelling reason for not imposing VAT on magazines. That would be preferable to imposing VAT on heating and cooking.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is an overwhelming necessity to reduce public borrowing? Somebody has to pay for the enormous losses that were incurred on white Wednesday. My hon. Friend will recollect that Sir Samuel Brittan, as he has now to our great pleasure become, is a great supporter—though perhaps not so great a supporter as Mrs. Hogg—of the exchange rate mechanism. Sir Samuel estimates that the cost to the public finances of white Wednesday is £2·5 billion. We can therefore assume that it is at least that sum and that somebody has got to pay for it. It is not a matter of social justice. It is a matter of a near bankrupt Government trying to find somebody to pay for this appalling mistake of being in the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Powell: My hon. Friend makes his point in his own distinctive and interesting way, but he has not taken on board the central point that I am making: that he and the then Chancellor of the Exchequer were entitled to say that taxes should be increased by £2 billion, or whatever the sum is, but that to select heating and cooking as the essential and necessary way of imposing that tax increase was a most bizarre social judgment. I have already pointed out that if it has to be done through VAT, why not do it by means of Horse and Hound or by means of newspapers? If The Sun is so confident today about its market position that it can reduce its price to 20p on a daily basis, it may be able to absorb a 17·5 per cent. VAT imposition and still be able to reduce its price.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Is my hon. Friend not forgetting his European obligations? Does he not recall that under the Single European Act, repeated at Maastricht, we have accepted an obligation to harmonise indirect taxation? Is he not aware that at the ECOFIN meeting that took place as recently as July 1992, we accepted the legal obligation to remove all zero rates by the end of 1996? Although I understand and fully appreciate the important point that my hon. Friend makes, does he not appreciate the Euro-obligation that he has taken on?

Mr. Powell: I was confident that my hon. Friend would raise that point before very long. I had hoped, however, that I might be able to deal with it in such a way as to make it unnecessary for him to intervene. His impatience was such, however—I do not blame him for this, for I have been on my feet for longer than I intended—that he felt that he had to raise the point in the way that he did. The European aspect is one of the most unfortunate and regrettable aspects of the issue. If the Bill contains this appalling clause 42 when it receives Royal Assent, I am afraid that it will be impossible for us to correct the error that was made by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer when he introduced the proposal in his Budget. This therefore, is our last opportunity to say no to it.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Powell: Perhaps my hon. Friend will contain himself for just a moment. I want to make progress, for other right hon. and hon. Members may wish to speak in the debate. There will be a terrifying finality about this proposal, if we allow clause 42 to reach the statute book. That is why we must take this opportunity to say no to it.

I am strongly opposed to the inclusion of clause 42 in the Bill on the ground of social justice. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has sought in the past to reassure the House that those who are most vulnerable will be compensated through the social security system for the increase in their tax, which is estimated to be £1 a week in the first full year of its operation and £2 a week in the second year, when the tax will be running at 17·5 per cent.

One of the most striking features of our community, however—every hon. Member has constituents who are in this position—is that many people with modest incomes are not in the social security system. They have modest savings. They may own their own homes. It is not enough to say that the housing benefit system will compensate them, or that they will receive council tax rebates, an argument upon which my right hon. Friend has sought to rely in the past.

Millions and millions of people of modest means have seen their incomes fall substantially in the past few years. Until fairly recently, people derived income from savings at the rate of 15 per cent., greatly to the regret of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West. Interest rates then fell to 6 per cent. and, like me, my hon. Friend wants them to come down further. However, people found that their income from their savings also fell. It is not a question of the increase in their incomes failing to meet inflation; it is a question of an absolute decline in income, and yet people have to pay their fuel and water bills and all the other essential bills for living.

Mr. Budgen: To do justice to his argument, which he is making with such force and eloquence, would my hon. Friend like to expand on what he said about the European element being one of the most unfortunate? All of us who have admired him and his tremendous support over the years for the President of the Board of Trade know of his tremendously progressive European idealism. It has generally been thought that the European ideal demanded a common system of taxation in all subordinate countries. I should have thought that my hon. Friend would have been grateful for the surveillance of the European superstate in ordering us to impose value added tax on some of the items that have hitherto passed unnoticed by our European masters. I hope that he is not saying someting inconsistent with the role that he has adopted so forcefully in the past.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): The hon. Gentleman should be making not a speech but an intervention.

Mr. Powell: My hon. Friend has allowed himself to get into a little rut about this matter in recent months. He has had many opportunities to make that intervention and I shall not hold against him the fact that he has chosen me as his sacrificial victim. I enjoyed what he had to say about hunting in Horse and Hound much more than his repeating the point about VAT for the 200th time.

I was on the theme of social justice.

Mr. Graham: Up to now, I have thoroughly enjoyed the hon. Gentleman's speech and have agreed wholeheartedly with it. The people that I know who are on low pay have no savings and have never had any savings. Some of my constituents live from day to day. They receive their pay on Thursday or Friday, but use it to repay what they spent in the previous couple of weeks. The Government's proposal to increase VAT will drive these folk into an early grave.

Mr. Powell: The hon. Gentleman has a point, but I do not wish to take it up in great detail because my right hon. Friend will remind the House yet again how the social security system will help the hon. Gentleman's constituents to the most generous extent possible. We can all make up our minds as to how generous "generous" will be in those circumstances.

In dealing with social justice, one must also have regard to those who will undoubtedly be affected by the proposal but who will receive no assistance through the social security system. They will face the increase next year and the following year without the possibility of any reimbursement, compensation or whatever one likes to call it. Many such people have modest incomes; many are elderly, or widows. They feel strongly that the Government for whom many of them voted have let them down badly.

I represent very few people who are affluent and still fewer who are wealthy, but I represent many tens of thousands of people who will be severely affected by the proposal. Some are puzzled and some are deeply angry. Some, of course, have political motives for rejoicing at the large, deep hole that the Conservative party has dug for itself by making this proposal. Others who are and have always been Conservative voters remain puzzled as to how a Conservative Government could possibly make such a proposal which is not only unjust but, even more important, is perceived to be unjust.

You will be relieved to know, Madam Deputy Speaker, that I am drawing my remarks to a close, but I wish to make two further points. When we debated the issue before, there was no question but that the House was influenced by the result of the Newbury by-election and the county council elections. The Government's business managers confidently told us that the worst was behind us. Of course, I and many of my hon. Friends told them that they could not have been more wrong.

8.45 pm

One has only to consider how public opinion has changed in the past two months to realise that the Conservative mavericks—a word that many on the Treasury Bench are keen to use from time to time—are those who persist in pushing this proposal rather than recognising that they were wrong. Unwelcome though it will be to hundreds of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I make this confident assertion: because the Government will not withdraw this proposal, the Conservative party will lose the Christchurch by-election. One could not imagine a constituency——

Mr. Budgen: A very helpful speech.

Mr. Powell: My hon. Friend has a considerable imagination. One could not imagine a constituency with more voters who were likely to be adversely affected by the proposal than Christchurch. It is a misfortune that such a by-election has to be faced, but one of my hon. Friends was heard to use a phrase, which has been adopted—and I apologise for the fact that I am not its author—to the effect that the Government appear to have a death wish. This proposal comes closer to asserting the truth of that than anything else. It is a disgraceful proposal, but I add one gloss.

From time to time, I have mentioned the impact of VAT in the charitable sector as it will affect village halls. It is a subject close to my heart. Village halls will find raising money for voluntary associations——

Mr. Budgen: Now he will say that we are skint as well.

Mr. Powell: Well, they are and I can give my hon. Friend many examples, most of which are run by Conservative supporters who are simply aghast at the extra fund raising that they will have to do because of the proposal.

I have said enough. The proposal should never have been put before the House. Having been made, it should be withdrawn. I hope that my right hon. Friend can yet find the courage to withdraw it. The proposal has done, is doing and, if it remains, will continue to do enormous damage to the Conservative party. It should be rejected.

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): The House will recognise the truth behind the words of the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) when he said that the Tories' fortunes in Christchurch will hang on whether the Government press on with the vote on VAT on gas and electricity tonight. He addressed himself to Treasury Ministers. However, he should also address his comments to his fellow Back Benchers because they have an opportunity tonight to do what Government Front Bench Ministers do not have the honesty or courage to do and withdraw the proposal on VAT for gas and electricity.

When it was first announced in the Budget statement on 16 March that the Government planned to put tax of 8 per cent. and then 17·5 per cent. on gas and electricity bills, there was a sense of shock that the Prime Minister had felt able to break his promise not to put VAT on gas and electricity which was so clearly made in the general election campaign.

There was also dismay at how it would hit hardest those who could least afford it. There was incredulity that the Government should seek to justify it as a measure merely to help the environment. All that was nearly four months ago. Since then, it has become clear that the shock and dismay expressed in the House when that announcement was made is felt around the country.

The opposition to VAT on gas and electricity has grown. It was expressed in the Newbury by-election and it was one of the reasons why more than 400 Tory councillors lost their seats in the May county council elections. The Prime Minister said then that he would listen and learn and he brought in a new Chancellor of the Exchequer. However, VAT on gas and electricity is still in this Finance Bill.

The Labour party and the other Opposition parties have been clear and unequivocal in their opposition to this provision. It is now time for Tory Back Benchers to think again and to use their votes tonight to make their Government think again. I say to Conservative Members, "Remember the elderly in your constituencies. Remember those who are just above income support levels, but who will have to pay this tax in full. Remember what you said in your election address about cutting people's taxes. Listen to what people in this country are saying. Even Conservative councillors are voting against this measure at local level. They will not support it. Heed the warning today of the Social Security Advisory Committee, which has stated that to compensate the poorest, the Government will have to put an extra £400 million into benefits."

Tory Back Benchers must know that if they vote tonight to impose VAT on gas and electricity, they will be whistling in the wind for a compensation scheme. Can we not just hear the Chancellor saying, "Of course I planned a compensation scheme, but I didn't realise that growth would be so low. I didn't realise that the PSBR would carry on getting so big. My hands are tied." Do Tory Back Benchers really think that the Government, already looking for ways to slash the social security budget, will add another £400 million to it—the figure that the SSAC states is necessary just to protect the poorest?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that the winter months are already a nightmare for so many pensioners on income support level and just above it? The cold weather payments are made only if the weather has been freezing for seven consecutive days. Is it not therefore obvious that for so many of our elderly constituents the situation is already a nightmare and tonight's proposal will simply make the situation worse?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and that point was reinforced in today's report by the SSAC.

Government Back Benchers may not always feel that they have much power. Indeed, they complain about that. However, public opinion will be firmly on their side if they vote tonight to tell their Government that they have got it wrong and that they must think again.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): As the hon. Lady is speaking so eloquently about manifestos, how would she finance closing the £50 billion deficit gap and then pay for all the promises made in the Labour party manifesto?

Ms Harman: We tabled 14 new clauses and amendments to the Finance Bill which would have closed tax loopholes and dealt with tax abuse. They would have raised more money than the VAT on gas and electricity. But the Government were not prepared to end tax relief for private health care—they would rather put VAT on gas and electricity. The Government were not prepared to make the privatised water, electricity and gas companies pay corporation tax—they would rather make the elderly and the poor pay tax on their electricity bills.

The simple fact is that the Government are not prepared to close the tax loopholes, which would bring in more income than the proposal would raise, because they would much rather protect the vested interests of their friends who donate to the Tory party and make the pensioners, poor, elderly and disabled pay the bill for the Government's economic incompetence.

The issue of VAT on gas and electricity is a question of the integrity of the Government. The Prime Minister promised in the clearest and most direct terms, using his familiar "honest John" style, that he would not put VAT on gas and electricity. During the election campaign, Labour's then shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury, my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), constantly warned that a Tory victory would mean the imposition of VAT on gas and electricity. That was brought to the public's attention through the "VATman" campaign.

Those suggestions were met with denials and injured outrage from Conservatives and with accusations of scaremongering. The Prime Minister was forced to respond and say, in his "honest John" style:

"I've made the pledge in the past, I've made it clear. We have no need and no plans to extend the scope of VAT."

That in itself should be enough for Tory Members to vote against VAT on gas and electricity because it breaks such a clear promise.

Even if Conservative Members are not moved to vote against the measure because it breaks an election pledge, they should certainly vote against it because of its effect on the elderly, the poor and the disabled. Pensioners up and down the country have signed our petition against VAT because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) said, they already struggle to pay their gas and electricity bills—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. There are too many seated interventions and a few private conversations.

Ms Harman: For those who need extra heat, such as the housebound and the disabled, fuel bills are a major item of expenditure. Their health is at risk if they have to cut back on the heat that they need. The reason why people have queued to sign our petition against this tax on domestic fuel is that they know that it is unfair. The SSAC report published today bears out their concerns.

The facts are these: the poorest 20 per cent. of households spend more than three times the proportion of their income on fuel as the richest 20 per cent. spend. This tax will hit everyone, but it will hit the poorest hardest. Tory Members must not lull themselves into a false sense of security about compensation for those who will be hit by the tax. The Government have yet to make known what their compensation scheme will be. They have not revealed how much the compensation will be. The only thing that the Government have made clear is that even for the poorest, those on means-tested benefits, there will not be full compensation. Even the poorest will have to pay some of this tax from their benefits.

It is equally clear that those who are not on means-tested benefits will receive no help to pay the tax. I can tell Conservative Members that those with small occupational pensions, who are just above income support level, will be writing to them. They will attend Conservative Members' surgeries and ask how on earth they can manage to pay this tax. There will be 17·5 per cent. on heating and cooking bills for elderly people just above the income support level. Before voting tonight, Tory Members should think about what they will say to those people. They will not be able to sympathise with them because they will have done it to them. It is already clear that the compensation scheme will not reach some of the poorest—those who are entitled to income-related benefits but who do not claim them.

[Ms Harman]

Of course, it is not a green measure, either. Birmingham city council, when passing a resolution to write to the Chancellor asking him to think again, commented that it is not so much the Government turning green as the poor turning blue. It is important, of course, to reduce energy consumption and carbon dioxide emissions. The way to do that, however, is not to put up fuel prices so that more elderly people die of hypothermia but to have a comprehensive home insulation programme, as Labour has suggested.

VAT on gas and electricity will raise for the Treasury £950 million next year and £2·3 billion the year after, but all the VAT on gas and electricity will pay the unemployment bill for just six months for the south-east alone. The Government cannot turn to pensioners and expect them to rescue public finances from a problem created by the failure of the Government's economic policy. That is not fair and it will not work. VAT on heating is nothing more than an unfair way of trying to finance the growing dole queue. However much pensioners dip into their pockets to pay tax on basic essentials, public finances will simply get worse until the Government sort out the economy.

The county council elections saw 472 Tory councillors lose their seats. They know that VAT on gas and electricity was one of the reasons why people simply would not vote for them. It is no wonder that the Tory councillors who are left will not support it. A survey that I did of some local councils shows that Tory councillors are voting against VAT on gas and electricity. Some examples are Sandwell borough council, Bedfordshire county council, Dover district council, Bath city council, Darlington borough council, Solihull borough council, Devon county council and Berkshire county council. In all those councils, and in numerous others, Tory councillors have voted against VAT on gas and electricity. In the city of Glasgow, Tory councillor Baillie Young described it as an iniquitous tax, and in North Kesteven a resolution to write to the Chancellor opposing VAT on gas and electricity was seconded by a Tory councillor.

Tomorrow, my hon. Friends and I will present to the Chancellor at No. 11 Downing street a petition containing tens of thousands of signatures. The Government have failed to make a case for VAT on gas and electricity, even among the Tory party's own members. It is not enough, of course, for the Prime Minister to say that he has listened and that he has learnt. It is not enough for him to change the Chancellor, either. The Government must do more than listen to people's concerns. They need to act on them, and they have failed to do that. Tory Back-Bench Members have a choice tonight: they can either stand up for their constituents or follow a discredited Government through the Division Lobby.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I accept absolutely that it would be very unpopular indeed to vote for VAT on gas and electricity. Some people would not vote for us and would condemn us—there is no question of that. However, hon. Members must appreciate when the Government are in an appalling financial situation for all kinds of reasons. The money has to come from somewhere. We would be running away from what I believe is a responsible attitude to say that it should not come from somewhere. The obvious alternative would be income tax, but, when we have more than 3 million people effectively unemployed, an increase in income tax would almost certainly prevent the recovery for which we hope.

I wish to make four brief points. I advise members of the Labour and Conservative parties that nothing makes me more sick than hearing them talk about the problems of poor people when most of them have supported a policy which is forcing the average working-class family—the average family on low incomes—to spend an extra £20 a week on their food and which has forced the taxpayer to pay hundreds of millions for the dumping and destruction of foodstuffs. It would make me a lot happier if the people who were concerned about the poor and the under-privileged showed some concern for something over which we have some control.

Nothing sickens me more than hearing hon. Members complain bitterly of the consequences of policies that they have voted for. Why the blazes do we have VAT? It is not because it is a good idea. We know that VAT, compared with purchase tax, is cruel to poor people—inevitably it is. It is an across-the-board tax, but it was one of the necessary consequences of membership of the EC which some hon. Members have consistently voted against. Those who voted for the EC have no right to complain about VAT.

I remind hon. Members that it is pure hypocrisy to complain about VAT on gas and electricity when they voted for the Single European Act and for the Maastricht treaty which commits this country absolutely and completely to the harmonising of VAT in so far as is necessary to complete the internal market. That is clearly and precisely laid down.

Will the Government state the consequences of the ECOFIN meeting in July 1992? According to information provided by the Library that backs my own belief, we accepted an obligation—subject only to one definition—to remove our zero rate by the end of 1996. Either that is true or it is not.

Sir John Cope: My hon. Friend has misunderstood the July 1992 agreement. It did not oblige us to abolish our zero rate, as he suggests—on the contrary. We are of course committed to negotiations on moving on to the so-called origin system, hopefully by 31 December 1996. However, our zero rate is entirely preserved in the 1992 agreement, as it was in all previous agreements. Part of the July 1992 agreement was that our standard rate should not fall below 15 per cent. for four years from the time that it was made, but that is a different matter. In any case, that has nothing to do with the position after that.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for making that clear, but I assure him—having received clarification of the position in writing from the Library, but I will check this again—that under the July 1992 agreement, although it was accepted that the definition of origin had to be resolved, there was a clear obligation, subject to definition of the origin system, to remove the zero rate by the end of 1996, if not necessarily operate a rate of 17½ per cent.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): Now that the hon. Gentleman has received the Minister's clarification, and given that he is totally opposed to the House of Commons giving any power away to Europe, how does he intend to vote tonight? There can be no doubt that, if zero rating is removed tonight, it can never be reintroduced.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The same as I voted before. If one's country is bust and it has a £50 billion deficit, that is partly because of exchange rate mechanism policies for which right hon. and hon. Members voted. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I have voted against every European treaty against three-line Whips. We are effectively handing over a power of this place. There is nothing more hypocritical than for Labour Members to go on platforms and to say, "We'll stop this dreadful tax" when it is clear that, once the decision has been made, they can do nothing.

There is no doubt that we have secured some reasonable concessions. We have received an assurance that every person on benefit will get something on 1 April next year, before the first bill arrives, and that pensioners will get something because the tax will be taken into account in the cost-of-living index.

As to the remarks of the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), mine was one of the few constituencies in England that held every one of its Conservative council seats with a good majority. I assure the hon. Lady that Conservative councillors did not lose everywhere.

It is nonsense to pretend that we can stop the march forward of VAT. Under the Single European Act and the Maastricht treaty, we have a clear and precise obligation to achieve harmonisation in so far as that is necessary to compete in the internal market—and that is impossible without total and complete harmonisation. The House is kidding itself. It is sad to hear people complain like mad when we come up against the consequences of our own decisions, in voting for measures wrongly and against the public interest.

Sadly, we have to accept that VAT is here to stay. There is no doubt at all that, effectively, VAT is to be part of our style of life. Unless we do something, and do something quickly, all such debates will be pointless, a waste of time and at best will buy us just a little more time before we are taken over by an unjust and unfair system that will hit the poor of this country. I hope that those who complain about the impact of VAT on the poor will ask themselves how they can justify the accursed, filthy system that puts £20 a week on the average family's food bill and spends hundreds of millions of pounds dumping and destroying food that should go to help the poor and to help those on low incomes.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir. T. Taylor) is simply playing rotten in seeking to argue that the Government have been obliged to levy first 8 per cent. and then 17·5 per cent. VAT on fuel as a result of our membership of the European Community or our signature on the Maastricht treaty. If that was so, I am sure that the Government would be rushing to say that it was so. That would at least give them some sort of alibi to use in by-elections, county council elections and everywhere else.

However, as the Minster has already pointed out, that is simply not so. To start with, the Government are under no obligation to levy 17·5 per cent. VAT at all. That figure arose from the Government's difficulties over the poll tax. It seems especially absurd that pensioners will now face 17·5 per cent. VAT on the standard charge on a gas bill when we had 17·5 per cent. VAT in the first place only as a consequence of the Government's poll tax chaos. There is no move whatever to advise the Government to levy more than 15 per cent. VAT, for example, or not to have a lower rate—for the first year there will be an 8 per cent. rate. Why not have a lower rate still? There is nothing to prevent the Government from abandoning the whole venture and retaining zero exemption.

Several hon. Members from different standpoints have been right to warn the Government that, if they give up the zero rate tonight, it will be gone for good. If the hon. Member for Southend, East had chosen to make that point, he would have been right. We should place ourselves under a European legal obligation not to reintroduce that rate.

That is what I find so surprising about the Government's supposedly sturdy defence of our standard rate. As the Minister pointed out, at every ministerial meeting the Government have stood up for zero rates and the right to retain those existing rates. Why has the Minister gone to such trouble if he is prepared to throw away the most important rate in terms of its impact on poor families and pensioners? The defence of that rate will seem a vain exercise—a battle fought for little purpose, when the Government have thrown away the use of that zero rate in an area in which it is most important and have done so permanently with no chance of ever reintroducing it.

The zero rate affects not just gas and electricity, but anything bought for use as a domestic fuel: gas, electricity, oil, wood, coal and even peat. Some consumers have relatively little choice over what fuel they use. For example, some consumers do not have access to gas for their domestic heating or cooking and often have to use more expensive means of providing heat for their homes. In parts of my constituency, some do not even have access to electricity.

Many of the families who are most likely to be adversely affected by the measure have no choice in the matter and no help with the energy efficiency of their homes. Any Government who sought to increase energy taxation on environmental grounds ought to ensure that those who have modest incomes and face an increase in fuel bills have access to help with making their home more energy efficient. So many of the people affected are either unable to command the resources to make their home more energy efficient or have no choice about the kind of home in which they live, whether it is a badly insulated council house or a privately rented house, because they have no means of moving into a better and more energy-efficient house. They may have bought their houses in the turbulent housing market of recent years. They now cannot sell those houses, so they cannot exchange them for more energy-efficient houses. They find it impossible to sell their houses at anything like the prices they paid for them. A lot of people are trapped, for one reason or another, in their houses. They do not command the resources to make those houses more energy efficient. They will be hit very hard by the measure, and they will be hit in two stages.

9.15 pm

The Government have already felt the wrath and anger of the people at Newbury and in the county council elections. That has happened before the bills have come in. The 8 per cent. and 17·5 per cent. stages are yet to come. The story will run and run, and it will not end with the Christchurch by-election, unless the policy ends at the time of that by-election, just as it did not end with the Newbury by-election. The policy will have to be changed if perceptions of the Government are to be changed.

The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), who moved the amendment so eloquently and in such a determined way, was right to stress that Governments should recognise when they have got it wrong, when they have made a mistake and when their policy is not only impossible to sell, but cannot be justified in its own terms.

If the Government try to justify the measure as an environmental tax, we must ask what changes in behaviour it will lead to. It will not lead to people at the poorest levels saving on energy consumption unless they do so at the risk of their own safety and health. We are talking about people who simply do not have the means with which to provide alternative forms of heat or with which to heat their homes more efficiently. We know that the disabled, the poorest and the unemployed spend a larger proportion of their time at home and that they are more dependent on the heating of their homes for their basic health. We know that families with young children are also in that position.

Ms Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): I agree very much with the right hon. Gentleman's point. However, it is a matter not just of heating, but of lighting. Elderly people whose eyesight is failing need a bright light to enable them to read, even in broad daylight. People whose memories are failing often leave the lights on because they have forgotten to turn them off. People may leave the lights on when they leave home to prevent the house from being robbed because they cannot afford burglar alarms and safety locks. Their energy consumption is much higher than that of people with greater means and with better health.

Mr. Beith: That is an important point which enables me to say how much better it would be if the Government said that they would make a scheme available under which elderly people could have access to low energy-consumption light bulbs at a cost far lower than the present high capital cost. If the Government wish to have an environmental policy based on tax, if would be better to have such a measure so that elderly people could reduce their energy consumption in a way that they are not able to do when they face the cost of £15 for a low energy-consumption bulb as opposed to the cost of £1 or so for an ordinary bulb. Such an option is not open to them out of their weekly pension.

I was referring to the groups of families who would be adversely affected. I asked what change in behaviour would be made. One thing that will not happen as a result of this form of taxation is that there will be a switch from polluting and environmentally damaging sources of energy to less polluting or less environmentally damaging sources of energy because it makes no distinction between them. It does not separate wind power or tidal power from coal, from oil or from orimulsion. All fuels along the spectrum of pollution and resource depletion are treated identically under the measure. It is not an environmental tax measure in that sense. It is not an effective environmental tax measure in its focus because it will not lead to behavioural change.

A stronger argument is that behavioural change could be brought about by changes in petrol taxation. Such changes would have to be accompanied by compensating measures. We can see the prospect for behavioural change by people on reasonably adequate incomes in that area. I cannot see much prospect of change for some of those on modest incomes who will be so adversely affected by this tax.

The Government have not only made a mistake, but have put a lot of fear into the minds of many elderly people and of many families. Of all the issues about which we have received correspondence recently, this is the one about which people are, according to their letters, most filled with fear and anxiety. As the hon. Member for Corby pointed out, that is especially true of those who know that they are just above benefit levels. They do not see how they will meet the costs or how they will cut their energy consumption. They know that they will get no benefit. They already have to put up with the fact that alongside them are people who, for one reason or another, have no savings at all and who therefore get housing benefit and council tax benefit. They see themselves getting none of those benefits and facing extra costs while their income, if based on a little savings capital, is declining.

There is real fear in people's minds over the issue. This is the Government's last chance to put an end to that fear. They show no signs of doing so, so the House must take its last chance of putting an end to that fear and force the Government to drop the proposal.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I had not intended to take part in the debate, but such is the extent of public feeling—certainly in my constituency as I know from having spent the morning speaking to a large number of pensioners—that I think that we must express much more vividly the great disillusionment that there is about the proposal.

When I listened to the Budget speech by the previous Chancellor, I was appalled by the suggestion that we should apply VAT to domestic fuel. It is a great pity that the present Chancellor and the Government are now, in effect, laden with the decision of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont).

The debate is useful in other respects. We must address ourselves to the reason why the large increase in tax, which is what it is, was decided. The answer is simple—the enormous borrowing requirement that the Government face.

Those of us who are honest must accept that there has to be a considerable increase in taxation of one form or another if the Government are to be credible in the eyes of those for whom the strength of sterling and our international financial situation depends. That is why the Chancellor effectively gave a future hostage. He did not increase taxation in the present Budget. He offered a considerable increase in the next year and the year after. In that sense, he was quite clever, because he put off paying the price for trying to keep international confidence in this country.

Unfortunately, clever though it was, as I have made abundantly clear, it was not a clever political choice, hence the speeches by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) and one or two other of my hon. Friends and many Opposition Members.

I find myself in a tremendous dilemma. I do not like VAT on domestic fuel. I have said so publicly and refused to vote on the issue when it was last before the House. On the other hand, I hope that I am a realist and know that the Government have to do something about the enormous borrowing requirement.

What would happen if we voted against the increase and it did not go through? There would be a great hole in the Government's strategy to keep international confidence, because the increase in taxation, which the Bill contains, would be swept away. Therefore, we would put my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General in a situation where he would have to try desperately to fill that gap. That gap could not be filled at a moment's notice.

I do not like the proposals. On the other hand, I do not want the Government's credibility to be totally undermined.

Mr. Beith: If the amendment is carried, surely it is open to the Chancellor to announce tonight that he intends to ensure that the tax hole is filled and that he will announce in the November Budget the precise means by which that is to be done, but to leave no doubt about it. Because the tax does not come into force until next year, he has the opportunity to do that.

Mr. Fry: I take the right hon. Gentleman's point. However, to ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to come forward with an alternative strategy at a moment's notice is asking too much.

Let no one be under any illusion. This VAT application is a tax increase. It is an indirect tax increase but it is a tax increase. Therefore, we should move it a step away from the people who will be hurt most, or at least apply ourselves to the effect of that tax increase on various sectors of the community. I say bluntly that those of us who are on better incomes must accept that tax increase as part of the price of trying to get the Government's borrowing requirement down. Unlike some hon. Members, I also accept that those who are on related benefits will obtain substantial assistance. I am worried about a group that has already been mentioned—those who are just above the level of any income-related benefit, who will suffer tremendously. Already, they have seen their water rates soar out of comprehension. They are the ones who are most anxious.

I hope that I am not one of those people who just mentions a problem and does not offer any solutions. As with any taxation system, it is necessary to soften the effect on those who will be hit hardest and there is a solution that will enable the Government to get out of their dilemma. I do not honestly expect my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General to get up at the end of the debate and say that he will not proceed with the implementation of VAT on fuel. Indeed, I would rather that he said that he would apply it to newspapers—I do not see why the Government are so terrified of doing that.

However, the Government could say that they will increase benefits to those who are worst off and, above that, they recognise the problem of many people—perhaps 3 million or 4 million—who have small occupational pensions or a few thousand pounds, usually in a building society, and who have seen their net incomes drop dramatically over recent months with the decrease in interest rates.

The Government should look closely in the autumn Budget at increasing the basic retirement pension by rather more than the retail prices index. I do not want that increase to be paid for out of the borrowing requirement. I want us to accept squarely that the only way to pay for it is through a higher contribution from the rest of the working population. I return to a point that I have made already. We are talking about a tax increase. In all justice, it should be borne by those who are still in a position to earn and are better able to afford such a tax increase.

If my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will give me the assurance that the Government will look closely at the uprating of the basic retirement pension this autumn, above the RPI, he will get me into the Government's Lobby tonight. Without such a statement, the credibility of the Government and belief in what they say, certainly in my constituency, will be greatly undermined. I am not asking for specific promises about amounts of money. I am asking for consideration of that group of people who proudly say that they are not dependent on state handouts, who have saved a few thousand pounds and who, frankly, feel that they have been kicked in the teeth. We have expected them to support us as a political party, and they have been the bedrock of our society. To say to them and to future generations that the only way that they will avoid such an increase in the future is to fritter away their money so that they are totally dependent on state handouts gives the wrong message.

I understand the Government's dilemma. I have much sympathy over the need to provide funds to cover the borrowing requirement but a message needs to go from the House that we understand the problems and fears of a vulnerable section of our community.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) referred to the public sector borrowing requirement. The Government should be under no illusion—our constituents see an incompetent Tory Government who have managed to run up a PSBR of £50 billion and who now expect people on low incomes to pay for that deficit.

Like many other right hon. and hon. Members, I have been inundated with letters from constituents on this issue. I should like to quote from some of those letters which say it all much better than I can. I have questions like, "Why is it that the unskilled, low-waged manual work force bears the brunt of the tax burden to prop up the country?"

Another pensioner said, "I know that we have to set the country back on its feet, but do OAPs have to be hit so hard?" An old person aged 81 years wrote to me saying, "I shall have to cut off my central heating. I will not be able to pay for it. My gas bill last April was £133 and I cannot afford any more."

9.30 pm

An Age Concern report has found that 81 per cent. of the elderly people surveyed had a living room temperature below the World Health Organisation recommended level of 20 deg C. More than a third—34 per cent.—do not heat their bedrooms at all. Britain loses more old pensioners in winter than any other European country. That is not because our winters are colder, but because we pay the worst state pension in Europe. The Government are now telling those people who are struggling desperately that they must pay VAT on domestic fuel and power.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): The hon. Lady provided statistics alleging that the United Kingdom pays the worst state pension in Europe. Does she agree that those statistics do not add up when contributions are considered or, in other words, when one compares like with like? Does she agree that when contributions are taken into account, the British pension is not the worst by any means? Does she further agree that, while the German state pension is larger, the German contributions are proportionately greater?

Mrs. Campbell: I know that my constituents who are existing on the ordinary state pension are badly off. Nowhere in Germany, France or any other European country do pensioners live in poverty as they do here.

I was visited recently by a constituent who was, until recently, a loyal Tory voter. He has now retired and manages a small charity trust for the company for which he used to work. He made the point—as did the hon. Member for Wellingborough—that those people who are just above the income support level will be hardest hit by the proposal. My constituent cited cases of pensioners who have written to him in utter desperation. Those included one who was already reduced to heating one room only. He said, "To meet current fuel bills and repairs to our boiler, my wife and I are now going short of food."

My constituent also said, "I have already had two old folk on the phone, both saying that they hope that they will die before the 17·5 per cent. increase comes in, as they fear the cold so much." It is a terrible indictment of the sort of society in which we are living when we cannot afford, as a society, to tell pensioners that they need not pay any more money.

Last week I visited three residential homes run by Mencap for the mentally and physically handicapped. Many of the residents of those homes have severely restricted mobility, and need consistently high levels to be maintained. The added burden of VAT on that vital provision cannot be accommodated by current care budgets that are already suffering at the hands of the Government.

I do not intend to detain the House for long. Much of what I wanted to say has been said by hon. Members on both sides. I would like briefly to draw attention to the position of Lupus sufferers. Lupus is a chronic, non-infectious, auto-immune disease, mainly affecting young women of child-bearing age—between 13 and 45. The symptoms of Lupus are many and varied, but one symptom is called Raynaud's Disease. Sufferers are, in general, extremely sensitive to changes in temperature. Those can affect the blood flow to fingers and toes and can cause constant pain in severe cases. There is great concern about the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel costs in view of the fact that, for those sufferers, heat is not a luxury but an essential commodity.

When these sufferers experience an attack due to the change of temperature, cumulative tissue damage may occur, and that in turn may lead to more severe forms of the condition—ulceration, gangrene and, at the very worst, an amputation may be required. It is important to minimise the number of attacks and to minimise the tissue damage and the resulting intense pain.

The problem is that many of these sufferers are not eligible for state benefits and will not benefit from any increase in them introduced as a result of the imposition of VAT. So the promised increase in benefits to counter-balance the VAT increase will have no positive effect.

In the course of proceedings on this Bill we have been able to present Ministers with many ways in which they can close tax loopholes and raise the £2 billion which they say this measure will generate. They can raise the money in a much more humane way. I join Conservative Members who have promised the Government that if they carry this measure through they will almost certainly lose Christchurch and any other by-elections that take place in the next few months and years.

I sincerely hope that the Government will rethink their proposal, and that enough Conservative Members vote against it to defeat it.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I rise to support my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), who moved the amendment in his eloquent style. I endorse most of what he said, even though he and I find ourselves in different camps when it comes to Europe and the Maastricht treaty—fortunately, we are not debating that tonight, and I hope that you will ensure that we do not, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I commend the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). His speech was made in a non-partisan way; he merely presented the issues, and I am delighted to support what he said—not only because his family used to live in my constituency for many years but because he went to the famous King's school in Macclesfield.

I deeply regret the fact that the Government have gone back on many election pledges by widening the scope of VAT. I never thought to see a Conservative Government and Chancellor doing that. Over two years we are to introduce a tax at 17·5 per cent. on two essentials of life: heat and light. They are, of course, particularly essential to the vulnerable groups mentioned by other hon. Members this evening.

What is so grossly unfair is that this charge will be levied not only on the consumption of gas and electricity but on the standing charges for them. Many of us believe that those charges are already grotesque and appear to have been mainly used to increase the salaries of the directors, chairmen and senior executives of the public utilities that have been privatised.

I endorse the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby. This tax is perceived to be socially unjust, and it is quite wrong that the most vulnerable people should have to pay so much for mistakes made by the Government.

I believe that it would be far better, far more honest and far more honourable—we are all honourable men and women here—if Ministers were prepared to increase the standard rate of income tax to raise the necessary money: £950 million in the first year, and £2·3 billion in a full year when the rate is 17·5 per cent. I do not believe that we should seek to mislead people by saying that we are not increasing taxation. As has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry), we are increasing taxation, so why mess about as to whether it is indirect or direct?

The people of this country believe that the fairest and most appropriate way in which to help the Government balance their books and reduce the Budget deficit is to increase direct taxation. In November, I would, at a stroke, increase the 25 per cent. standard rate of tax to 28 per cent. for two years only. I would also increase the top rate of tax from 40 per cent. to 45 per cent. The people would then see that those who are in the best position and most able to pay would be making the major contribution to reducing the Budget deficit, which is causing the Government so much difficulty.

As my hon. Friends have rightly said, the present proposals are perceived to be grossly unfair and impinge mainly and most heavily on the most vulnerable groups—the elderly, those on low incomes and, as has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough, those who are just outside any form of state income-related benefit. My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough should note, however, that I do not think that giving an assurance that the old age pension will be increased by an amount above the retail prices index adequately reflects the concern that is felt in this country, nor will it provide the money that those in the vulnerable groups need for a reasonable quality of life.

My own women's association gave me 100 per cent. support in a motion that it submitted to the Conservative women's conference recently. It was not selected, of course—I do not think that the association expected that—but the grave and serious opposition to what the Government seek to do was reflected at national level on the agenda of the women's conference of the Conservative party. The one mistake that my women's association made was to ask the Government—if they were insistent on implementing the measure—whether, after the Budget deficit had been reduced, they were prepared to remove it. As has been said by my hon. Friends, however, once the zero-rated exemption has gone, we can never restore it.

It is wrong to extend a tax to the essentials of life such as heat and light. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, is extremely assiduous and hard working and has had considerable responsibility for social security matters. He knows that the Government have given no guarantee that the position of those on benefit, pensioners and those just above any form of income-related benefit will be fully protected by any steps that the Government may announce before the implementation of the VAT extension to heat and light.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed is absolutely right; to make the excuse that this is being done as our contribution to improve the environment and reduce carbon dioxide emissions is an absolute nonsense. It will have absolutely no effect. It is extraordinary that no proposal has been made to introduce an ambitious and helpful home insulation scheme to go with the Government's announcement.

I will not make as many unhelpful remarks as my hon. Friend the Member for Corby about the political implications of what the Government are doing. All I can say to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench is that I have not had a single letter from any person in favour of extending VAT to heat and light. I have received hundreds of letters from my constituents—my area is relatively well off compared to those of some of my hon. Friends and Opposition Members—who perceive the measure to be unacceptable.

9.45 pm

The Government would lose nothing by saying tonight, as the Prime Minister has said, "We have listened to the people of this country." He should go on to say, "Clearly, they are hostile and overwhelmingly opposed to what we seek to do. We will come back to the House in November" —as is absolutely possible—"with a proposal to plug the gap in the Budget to ensure that the Government's overall economic strategy is not undermined."

Like those of my hon. Friends who belong to the No Turning Back group, I want us to bring our budget into balance, but I do not want to do it on the backs of the vulnerable, the elderly, the low-paid, the handicapped, the mentally ill and all those groups of people who will suffer as a result of that misguided measure. We have heard little about the impact that the measure will have on private residential establishments that cater for some of those people. They will have to increase their fees to meet that additional charge.

If my right hon. Friends want a further Conservative Government after the next election, they must listen not only to the people of this country but to Conservative Back Benchers because the measure is fundamentally flawed and extremely damaging and will hurt the most vulnerable groups in our society. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General would receive immense support from the House—perhaps more than he thinks from Conservative Back Benchers—if he were prepared to think again about that measure.

Why are we so against increasing direct taxation? Why must we dishonestly say that we are not increasing taxation, when we are widening the scope of VAT and increasing contributions under national insurance, which is also something that we said we would never do? What is so sacrosanct about direct taxation? If we raised it for only two years, we would have to seek a renewal if the budget was not in balance. What is wrong with that?

The Under-Secretary of State for Social Security—my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North—and I were with a group of members of the Confederation of British Industry on Friday. Surprisingly, many of those at that meeting would have been perfectly happy to see the Government increase the standard and 40 per cent. taxation rates to get the country's economy right.

I am honoured to have represented my constituency for 22 years in this place—rather longer than the overwhelming majority of the Cabinet—[Interruption.] When Disraeli was heckled during his maiden speech in the House, he said:

"There will come a time when you will listen to me."

There will come a time when my right hon. Friends will listen to me.

Mr. Graham: I have never heard such a tremendous fighting speech from the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and I am delighted to speak after him.

Time and again I have asked the Minister to tell us the price of a bottle of paraffin or a hundredweight of coal and how much it costs to heat a house, and he has never attempted to answer. How can the Government understand the suffering that they are inflicting on the good people of Britain—the people whom they expect to vote for them? Yet they put VAT on fuel. The people of this country know that the weather in Scotland is different from that in England. In recent months, the south has been sweltering in the heat, but in Scotland there have been various weather conditions. When I left home this morning, my wife had the fire on. I wonder how many elderly and disabled people in Scotland can afford to put on a fire in the morning—not very many.

One of the reasons for the fighting fury in Scotland—and, I am sure, in the rest of the country—is the Government's disgraceful commitment to putting 17·5 per cent. value added tax on fuel. One hon. Gentleman said that he would support the Government as they would otherwise lack credibility. That is nonsense—we have been elected to fight and campaign for our constituents, and to ensure that the Government run the country for the good of our constituents. We should not support bad government.

Mr. Fry: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Graham: I shall give way in a minute.

Hon. Members are here to represent our people on a burning issue. Many of our constituents will not be able to light fires or light their homes in winter when they are dark. Back Benchers on both sides of the House have a golden opportunity to join together to ensure that VAT of 17·5 per cent. is not imposed.

I have deliberately spoken to many of my pensioners about the issue. The Government have got away with plenty of things, but one thing that they will not get away with is the imposition of VAT on fuel. I have spoken to people on low pay and I remember the days when I was on low pay. I remember the difficulties that I faced in heating my house to ensure that my two sons went to school warm in the morning and came home at night to warm food and a warm house.

I had difficulties paying my fuel bills in Scotland. Some weeks, 25 per cent. of my income went straight into heating the house. Many hon. Members present tonight do not know the cost involved. I had to heat the house with paraffin as I could not afford the high cost of electricity. Ultimately, I had to use calor gas because paraffin was not good for my two children, who suffered from asthma.

Does the House realise that there are thousands and thousands of people who do not heat their houses as they would wish? They do not heat them to maintain their health because of the Government's mismanagement of the economy. When I look at the Government Front Bench team I do not see an ounce of compassion. I heard the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) make an impassioned plea, which I totally supported. I also heard the hon. Member for Macclesfield make a speech which was absolutely bang on the button.

Tonight, the Government have a chance to show some heart, but I am afraid that they will be hard-headed, and show a hard, cold face. The caring face of Government will be shown tonight as Government Members march through the Lobby and inflict damage and suffering on the elderly, unemployed, disabled and those on low pay. The Government do not have the guts to say that the previous Chancellor was wrong. They bumped him out into the cold, but at least he will be able to heat his house. Our folk, our constituents in Scotland and other regions will not be able to heat their houses.

Will the Minister find out the price of paraffin, calor gas and a bag of coal? Will he find out what it costs to heat a house in Glasgow, and what that costs a family in which one person is on low pay and the rest are unemployed? There is no benefit good enough for the dignity of mankind in Britain. We are all entitled to the dignity of having a warm house and hot food, and seeing in the dark. Let us give our folk their dignity, not impose VAT on fuel. I hope that many Conservative Back Benchers will support us tonight.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I am one of the Conservative Members who has a reputation for being loyal to the Conservative party. That means that when I speak out against my Government it carries extra currency. When I first came to the House, I voted for tougher immigration controls and tougher trade union reforms, and in their little grimy books, which they are writing in at the moment, the Whips wrote one word about me—unpromotable. They were right, but by the time I have finished my speech perhaps they will wish that they had promoted me.

I support my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). Never in my experience have I seen such a politically naive, unfair and unjust measure. It is common knowledge that we have to find some money. The world recession has gone on for longer than all the industrialised nations had thought it would, but there is no disgrace in telling people the truth about that. If that causes us to break an election promise, it is not the end of the world, as long as we explain carefully to people why we are breaking that promise.

I guess that the Government thought that it was clever footwork to put VAT on fuel because they were not raising VAT but introducing another category. It was not a rise in direct tax and therefore did not place the Government in conflict with the electorate, as the Government did not have to say that they had broken a promise. If it is necesary to break a promise to straighten out the nation, the Government must do so, but people must be told why that is being done and it must be done fairly. To do it unfairly is inexcusable.

How will this affect young families? A young man who is a rising executive in his company may not have much money but may earn too much to qualify for income support. If he has a young wife and children, the washing machine will be on the go all day. Heating will also be on all day because the house must be kept warm for young children. The family is too rich to get benefit but too poor to pay ever-increasing costs, some of which we are inflicting on it.

Hon. Members have mentioned the elderly and people in other categories who are too rich to get benefit but too poor to pay ever-increasing costs. Many pensioners have had to take early retirement because of unemployment in their companies and have not even reached the state pension age. Out of the small amount of interest on their savings, which has been decreasing, they will have to pay extra fuel costs. That is inexcusable.

As hon. Members have said, there are other ways to raise money, and if hon. Members want me to list them, I shall do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) listed about four or five different ways and my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) suggested a basic tax rate of 28 per cent. and a higher rate of 45 per cent. That would be fairer than what the Government propose. VAT could be increased to 20 per cent. rather than nibbling at fuel costs. Many options are available to the Treasury, but I shall not detain the House by listing them further.

It is strange that in Tokyo we were able to offer President Yeltsin millions of pounds to help his country, but when we need money for our own country we cannot find it. We were able to find it to send an armada to the Falklands and we can send military aid to Bosnia and take part in the Gulf war, so there must be a contingency fund somewhere. We cannot be absolutely broke, because we seem to be able to find money from some source. Where is the money and how deep is the contingency fund purse?

I want the Government to withdraw the stupidity of VAT on fuel. It is unfair and unjust and we shall rue the day that we impose it. I did not go to university and I know that it sometimes shows. I did not rush out to advise Ministers with two firsts from university. I attended the university of life. The university of life does one thing above all else—it makes one streetwise. If only Ministers and civil servants had consulted a few streetwise Back Benchers, they would never have pursued such stupidity.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I support the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). I am sure that he is aware that, as shown in the Order Paper last Thursday, I tabled an amendment along similar lines to his. I know that we share a deep concern about the issues at stake.

I am aware that there is no requirement for the House to vote at 10 o'clock. When hon. Memberrs want to register their views on an important issue, they should be prepared to stay in the building to enable all hon. Members to do so. In that way, our constituents can judge how we feel about the issue.

It is almost with a sense of despair that yet again I speak about fuel poverty. I have been in the House since 1974, albeit with an interim absence. In the 1970s, I raised the question of fuel poverty and the problems faced by many of the elderly, the disabled and those on fixed incomes. I watched the actions of the Labour party when it was in government and the actions of the Conservative party when it was in opposition. I do not say that with any sense of immodesty.

My concern is that the House has never objectively addressed the issue of fuel poverty, especially against the background of the wealth from North sea oil, Scottish oil and gas and all the natural resources throughout the United Kingdom. The House has never drawn up a strategy or a policy—[Interrruption]—to ensure that no one has to face the realities that were so eloquently described—[Interruption]—by the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham)——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Lady, but there is now a general buzz of conversation such that it is not easy to hear her. That is extremely discourteous and I ask the House to be very much quieter.

Mrs. Ewing: I suspect, Madam Deputy Speaker, that hon. Members from the two main parties assumed that there would be a vote at 10'clock. They have come here specifically for the vote, rather than to listen to the arguments.

There has been a great deal of argument about the political implications of imposing VAT on domestic fuels. I have registered my view on that during previous debates on the Bill. It may be that fear has been struck in the hearts of many people, from Basildon to Brechin, from Newbury to New Pitsligo, from Christchurch to Cullen. The vote tonight should not be about votes for political parties: we are voting on something that will affect the lives of individuals, people who are citizens of our constituencies and of the United Kingdom. I urge all hon. Members to search their consciences before casting their votes.

The hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde spoke about the need to define the cost of fuel for each and every individual. We have already done a great deal of research on that. I do not believe that it is an issue only of wealth; it is also an issue of climate. We must recognise the differentials in that regard between the north and the south of the United Kingdom; indeed, I have introduced several Bills to that effect.

Let me remind Ministers that it costs 36 per cent. more to heat a house in Dundee, Edinburgh or Glasgow than it costs to heat a house in Bristol. It costs 38 per cent. more to heat a house in Inverness and Stornoway, 48 per cent. more in Aberdeen, 60 per cent. more in Lerwick and 74 per cent. more in Braemar. Those statistics were produced by the Department of Energy, and they underpin the need to review our attitude to ensuring that those on low or fixed incomes—for instance, the disabled—can fulfil their requirement for a decent, warm house.

A dry, warm house is not a luxury; it is the right of every individual. Far too many of our people wake up to find condensation running down their windows—or, in winter, ice on the insides of their windows—and fungus creeping up their walls. This is not a commitment to Rio; it is a penalisation of the most vulnerable members of society. If the Government really want to meet the environmental requirements made at Rio, they should consider releasing the capital receipts of local authorities to ensure that they can implement the energy efficiency needs of our housing stock. They should ensure that all new build meets the requirements necessary to ensure decent insulation and heat conservation.

I believe that, if the Government proceed with their proposals, they will not only lose votes—possibly—in by-elections here and there; they will have on their conscience the lives and, ultimately, the deaths of many people in our society.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): My purpose in tabling amendments Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 5—which are grouped with amendment No. 7—is much more limited than that of my hon. Friends the Members for Corby (Mr. Powell) and for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). Indeed, I differ from them. I accept, reluctantly—how could I do so other than reluctantly—the Government's main argument for the extension of VAT to domestic fuel and power; I recognise the need to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement and, indeed, the need to reduce global warming. My aim is to exclude charities from the requirement to pay VAT on fuel and power, and I have tabled a number of amendments that seek to approach that objective from different angles. I do not mind which my hon. Friend the Minister chooses, as long as he chooses one of them.

The Government have promised to protect the needy from the burden of the additional charge on heating and cooking. My right hon. Friend the former Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that in his Budget statement, and the Government were right to make the commitment. I simply ask the Government to be consistent. They intend to help the needy directly; correspondingly, they should help the charities whose purpose is to help the needy.

I am talking of charities whose role is supportive of the state, or complementary to the state; charities, for example, that care for the elderly and the disabled. These are among the areas of growth in social expenditure where the Government are particularly worried about how they are to finance meeting the need that they foresee. Charities operate in these fields sensitively, in two senses. They target need more accurately than state agencies commonly do; and they approach their human dealings in a sensitive manner. They are also cost effective, tending to have lower overheads than public agencies, and they mobilise voluntary energies.

In his excellent Mais lecture, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security set out some of the principles that he thought should govern the reform of social security. One was the principle that policy must harness popular energies. Charitable activity certainly does that, on an enormous scale.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind those hon. Members who have just come into the Chamber that it is grossly discourteous to chatter away while somebody else is seeking to make points that are important to him.

Mr. Howarth: Those who give money to charities may ask why, if the Chancellor is to take away money from charities by extending the burden of VAT on them, they should give money. Those who work for charities may ask why they should work for charities if the Government make their task harder by increasing their costs.

I shall give one or two examples of what the costs to individual charities will be as a result of extending VAT to fuel and power. Methodist Homes for the Aged will have to pay an extra £143,000. Barnardos will have to pay an extra £122,500. The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children will have to pay another £31,000. The Royal National Institute for the Blind will have to pay another £126,500. Mencap will pay an extra £170,800. The National Children's Home will pay another £100,000. Those are significant additional burdens on charities that are acting in partnership with the state to provide very basic social support.

The Cancer Relief Macmillan Fund gives a third of its grants to sick people who face additional fuel costs. Applications to that fund and to other grant-giving charities will undoubtedly increase as people find it more difficult to cope with the increase in the cost of domestic fuel and power.

The Government have said that they want the needy to be helped. Why, then, do they intend to make it harder for charities to help those in need?

The Government increasingly want charities to do things. The problem with VAT is that it penalises charities that do indeed do things. The inequalities of the VAT system hit charities discriminatorily. It is a mistake to extend its scope. It would be much better to remove the existing £300 million burden of irrecoverable VAT that charities already carry. If the Government feel unable to exempt charities from having to pay VAT on their non-business activities, they should provide a VAT refund scheme.

It is important for the Government to think carefully about how to achieve a better balance in their fiscal policy relating to charities between relief on giving and relief on expenditure. I received a letter today from Mr. Peter Berresford of Mencap, who said:

"Assuming we receive tax relief on all our voluntary income, we actually receive tax relief on 7 per cent. of our activities!"

I can quote figures that have been supplied by other charities that face heavy VAT burdens on the activities which they undertake—activities which, surely, we all want them to undertake. The Royal National Institute for the Blind incurs £1·2 million of irrecoverable VAT. In its last financial year, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children had to pay £615,000 of irrecoverable VAT. Methodist Homes for the Aged currently pays £405,000 worth of irrecoverable VAT.

The Government have not put forward strong arguments to support their case for extending the imposition of VAT on charities. They argue that charities should make their contribution to reducing global warming, but the charities most affected by this change would not be able to do so. They are already energy efficient. Those for whom they care—the old, the ill and the disabled—need more heating.

Charities have a duty of care to look after those who depend upon them. The Government require charities to do so—for example, under the Registered Homes Act 1984. The Act requires charities running residential homes to maintain temperatures at a certain level. It is inappropriate to tax charities for complying with the Government's legal requirements. It is also discriminatory to do so, because of their inability to recover VAT.

The Government argue that the extension of gift aid and payroll giving will provide compensation, but it will not compensate the same charities, nor will it do so to a sufficient extent. The National Children's Home tells me that at best it would gain £10,000 from the extension of gift aid and payroll giving that is provided for in the Finance Bill. At the same time it will have to pay an additional £100,000 in VAT on fuel and power.

The Government also argue that charities already pay VAT on their business use, but it is not a good idea to establish further precedents. If we remove this zero rate, for which the Government fought, we may well create a precedent and encourage the attitude that, if charities pay VAT on fuel and power, why should they not pay it on their new buildings or building alterations for disabled people?

It is estimated that the Exchequer will gain £27 million from this extension of VAT to charities, but the net benefit to public funds will be very much less because, on a reasonable estimate, about three quarters of that will come back as a charge on public funds through increased fees charged by charities. It is disproportionate to abolish the zero rate for such a token gain to the Exchequer. I therefore ask my right hon. Friend to exclude charities from this extension of VAT. If he feels unable to do so, I ask him to make a positive commitment to consider constructively the possibility of introducing a VAT refund scheme in the autumn Budget.

Sir John Cope: We have today covered much of the ground that we covered in our debates on the Budget, on Second Reading and in Committee of the whole House when we debated the clause stand part motion to which the amendment relates. Very little that is new has been said today, and I do not suppose that my response will change much.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) mentioned charities in which I know he takes a great interest. Other hon. Members, too, expressed concern about their charities under this legislation, especially those involved in residential care. I acknowledge at once that charities provide a valuable service and I pay tribute to them. Charities in general provide many useful services in the community, which is why we already grant them large tax reliefs—especially, as my hon. Friend said, on charitable giving. Tax reliefs have been increased elsewhere in the Bill. I regret, however, that we cannot exempt charities from the national need to conserve energy; nor can they be immune from the problems of national financing.

Besides, charities are not alone in providing residential care. The amendments would disadvantage commercial residential care, which also provides a valuable service. They would also disadvantage the elderly at home, thus cutting across the care in the community policy. I would not want to introduce a measure that would encourage people to put the elderly into homes. In addition, because of the way in which the amendments are drafted, they would make some difficult and probably unintended distinctions between individual charities that provide residential care. Of course, we keep all such matters under careful review and will be reviewing taxation of charities again, as we always do, before the next Budget.

Mrs. Ewing rose——

Sir John Cope: I must make some progress in dealing with the general points which the hon. Lady and others have raised.

The House knows very well, because we have said it over and over again in the debates to which I have referred and elsewhere, that the clause was included for two reasons: first, to help to deal with the public sector financial deficit; and, secondly, to contribute towards meeting our Rio commitment. Both reasons remain valid and important.

Contrary to what has been said this evening, the clause is not the only way in which we are dealing with either of the problems, but it will make a contribution in both cases. From the Budget speech onwards, we have made it clear that we would make additional help available, through the benefits system, for those hardest hit. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will announce more details in the usual uprating statement in the autumn. That will allow increases to be put into effect when the VAT increases also come into effect.

There have been arguments, which I have observed today and on previous occasions, about whether we should tackle the public sector deficit by restraint on public spending or through tax increases. The fact is that we are tackling it by both methods and both are necessary given the scale of the deficit.

My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) seemed to think that we were somehow denying that this was a tax increase. We are not: it is a tax increase and we accept that. We have been asked to choose between direct taxes and indirect taxes. We are increasing both in the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield quoted Disraeli's maiden speech. My hon. Friend should note that Disraeli said those words in his maiden speech and not after he had been a Member for a very long time—longer than I have been here, and I have been a Member for only 19 years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), who moved the amendment, said that it was a matter of judgment and responsibility. I accept that. My right hon. Friends and I have not claimed that this is the only option. Of course it is not. My hon. Friend the Member for Corby seemed to think that it is, but, as I have made clear, we had to choose and this is the way in which we have decided to make a contribution in both cases about which I have spoken. During this debate, we have been urged constantly by my hon. Friends, and even those who have spoken against the amendment, to tackle the deficit and that is what we are doing. That involves difficult decisions. We realise that those decisions are difficult; nevertheless, they are necessary.

We have been reminded again this evening that it has become a sackable offence on the Labour party Front Bench to say anything in favour of a tax on fuel. Lord Desai discovered that the other day. Perhaps his real offence was embarrassing the Leader of the Opposition during Question Time. That is, after all, quite a recent position for the Opposition. The Opposition's policy document of May 1990 entitled "Looking to the Future" contains the heading "Value Added Tax". They promised to keep many of the zero rates, but they did not promise to keep this one. That document states:

"We will also use the tax system . . . to help protect the environment."

Exactly so, and that is what we are doing. The present leader of the Labour party made environmental taxes part of his leadership platform.

The Liberal Democrats have, in their time, also spoken in favour of taxes of this kind. In one of their policy documents in August 1991, they said:

"The UK is unusual amongst EC members in not applying even standard rates of VAT on domestic fuels."

Of course the Liberal Democrats say different things now —that is politics. We must take the difficult decisions and that is what we have done. That is why I commend clause 42 to the House.

Mr. William Powell: This has been, to say the least, a lively debate. None of us who listened to it will forget the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) stimulated the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) in his contribution.

I want to make two very brief points. First, there is absolutely no doubt that the Conservative party and our leader gave an unequivocal promise to the electorate during the election campaign that we would not extend VAT in this way. I also gave that promise to my constituents. I meant it and I propose to keep it.

Secondly, this debate is not about whether there should be a tax rise. It is quite obvious that, in the proposals which were made, the Government accepted that there would be a tax rise. The question is, what is the priority in imposing that tax rise? I opened the debate by saying that the chief criticism which could be made was that it was socially extremely harmful. I have to say that, after all the hours of discussion on different occasions, I remain absolutely perplexed as to how anybody could select this as the socially most just way of raising tax. It is the most bizarre decision that could be made. I know that, although many of my right hon. and hon. Friends will join the Government in the Division Lobby, they, too, are thoroughly perplexed as to how this selection came to be made.

I note also that, although my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General justified the rise in tax—I do not criticise him for that, and I praise the way in which he faced that matter absolutely directly—he made no attempt whatsoever to justify to the House why this method had been selected, in terms of where the increase should fall, and not some other option. Quite obviously, every hon. Member could put forward two dozen options that would raise the same amount of tax and would be perceived by our constituents to be socially far more justifiable than the option that is presently before the House.

As my right hon. Friend said, we have not made much progress. The House has debated this matter fully. I simply ask right hon. and hon. Members to join me in the Division Lobby in supporting the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 78

RATE OF ADVANCE CORPORATION TAX AND TAX CREDITS

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I beg to move amendment No. 26, in page 54, line 38, at end insert—

'(1A) The amendment made by subsection (1) above shall not have effect as respects so much of the amount or value of any distribution as is payable to a section 505 body which, in accordance with regulations made by the Board, supplies a certificate to the company making the distribution to the effect that it is such a body.

(1B) A body is a section 505 body if it is—

(a) a charity (as defined in section 506(1) of the Taxes Act 1988);

(b) a body mentioned in section 507 of that Act (heritage bodies); or

(c) an Association of a description specified in section 508 of that Act (scientific research organisations).

(1C) The Board may by regulations make such incidential consequential, transitional provision as they consider necessary or expedient in connection with subsections (1A) and (1B) above (including provision amending any provision of the Taxes Acts).'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 8, in page 54, line 41, at end insert—

'(2A) The amendment made by subsection (1) above shall not have effect as respects so much of the amount or value of any distribution as is payable to a section 505 body which, in accordance with regulations made by the Board, supplies a certificate to the company making the distribution to the effect that it is such a body.

(2B) A body is a section 505 body if it is—

(a) a charity (as defined in section 506(1) of the Taxes Act 1988);

(b) a body mentioned in section 507 of that Act (heritage bodies); or

(c) an Association of a description specified in section 508 of that Act (scientific research organisations).

(2C) The Board may by regulations make such incidental, consequential, transitional and supplemental provision as they consider necessary or expedient in connection with subsections (2A) and (2B) above (including provision amending any provision of the Taxes Acts).'.

No. 9, in page 57, line 24, [Clause 80], leave out from beginning to end of line 25 on page 58.

Mr. Brown: It is appropriate that, having discussed one tax rise, albeit an overt tax rise, we now proceed to discuss a substantial concealed tax rise, and one which bears in a most unfair way on charities—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should be grateful if hon. Members would either listen to the hon. Gentleman speaking to the amendment or retire quietly from the Chamber.

Mr. Brown: Conservative Members, whose consciences must already be pricking them, should stay and listen to my exposition of what is intended to be a relieving measure —[Interruption.] They shout and jeer, suggesting that they are not sympathetic to the cruel and unfair position in which charities find themselves.

Those Tory Members who served on the Committee considering the Finance Bill will be aware that we have received a substantial number of written representations about the point. It would probably do Tory Members some good—at least it would inform them—if I read each and every one of those representations into the record. It would take some time. However, they might prefer it if I broadly outlined the Opposition's case, and if I were heard in silence it would be easier for me to do so. [Interruption.] I see that the hon. Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) is already seized by my remarks and wishes to make a contribution. Would she like me to give way to her?

Dame Peggy Fenner (Medway) indicated dissent.

Mr. Brown: No. I am sure that it is shame that keeps her seated.

When the former Chancellor addressed the issue of advanced corporation tax in his Budget speech, he promised us a measure which would, on the one hand, help all dividend-paying companies. That sounds like good news. He said that he would provide help in a way that would also raise considerable revenue. That should have set the alarm bells ringing, as of course it did, among two interest groups: pensions and charities, especially charities that rely on income from equity investments.

To some extent, at least, the Government realise that the impost is shameful because they have provided for transitional arrangements to ease in the tax. The arrangements grant temporary relief to charities, so the Government clearly realise the harm that they are doing.

The impact on charities is bound to be severe and bizarre because the extra tax will come directly from the money that charities use for charitable purposes—in effect, a shift of money from those purposes to the Exchequer, for the Chancellor's purposes. And these purposes, according to Conservative Members, are to do with reducing the deficit.

The irony lies in the fact that the work that the charities which have written to us are doing is often financially assisted by the Government. Charities make a part payment towards certain projects, and the Government make another payment towards them. Some of the projects jeopardised by the extra tax are the very ones on which the Government have looked favourably—in some cases, they have even helped them by way of partnership.

Certainly, the charitable purposes of the organisations that have sent in representations are approved by the Government. The work that they do often substitutes for public provision. The organisations say that the Government are transferring responsibilities from the public sector to the charitable organisations at the same time as withdrawing funding from them through the tax system. They are also withdrawing funding through local government sources, inner city partnerships and other schemes.

Charitable organisations tell us that they expect to lose about £100 million eventually under these changes. They expect to lose £130 million from the VAT impost; and to offset all that, they expect an extra £31 million in gift aid and payroll giving—nothing like enough to make up for their losses.

This has been a bad year and a bad Finance Bill for charities. That is not just my view; it is also the view held by the Charities Tax Reform Group. Ministers are attempting to breach an important principle here—that charities should be exempt from taxation on their incomes. We seek to remedy that state of affairs by means of our amendments.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The proposed tax change to advance corporation tax in the Budget has not hit the headlines, but it represents the most important change for charities.

The way in which the change will affect four charities illustrates the seriousness of the damage that will be caused to charitable income. Once the new system is fully operational, the Royal National Lifeboat Institution will lose £250,000 a year as a result of the reduction in tax relief on dividend income. The gravity of that loss should be measured in comparison with the £80,000 that that charity will have to pay as a result of the imposition of 17·5 per cent. VAT on fuel and power. Barnardos will lose £200,000 as a result of the loss of tax relief on dividend income, while it will have to pay out £122,500 as a result of the VAT imposition.

The Coal Industry Social Welfare Organisation will have to pay an additional £460,473 in tax on dividends compared with £15,556 on VAT on fuel and power. The most spectacular figure, if I may use that adjective, is the amount of the burden on the Wellcome trust, which will have to pay no less than £10 million additional tax on dividend income compared with £70,000 in VAT on fuel and power. Those figures illustrate the importance of the issue.

The cost to charities of the reduction in the value of tax credits on dividends by the end of the transition period will be, on the Government's admission, not less than £50 million and the Charities Tax Reform Group calculates that the sum cannot be less than £100 million.

I tabled amendments Nos. 8 and 9 to protect charities from this proposed change. I did so after careful discussions with the Charities Tax Reform Group, which itself took advice from a parliamentary draftsman. I was therefore rather surprised when the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) lifted my amendment No. 8 and retabled it some three lines further forward in the Bill. Some people would call that pilfering; I would call it plagiarism. Plagiarism is a weakness displayed by people who want the world to be impressed by what they do, but who do not produce their own ideas, and lack candour, courtesy and shame. It is a pity that the hon. Lady could not support my amendment. Policy towards charities should not become another arena for party political opportunism.

Mr. Nicholas Brown rose—

Mr. Howarth: I would be happy to give way to the hon. Member for Peckham if she cares to defend her conduct. Does the hon. Lady wish me to give way to her or would she prefer a knight errant in the person of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) to champion her cause?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman should not be too chirpy about all of this. He spent the first part of his speech whingeing about his right hon. Friends on the Front Bench and now he is whingeing at my colleagues on the Opposition Front Bench. He should be grateful for our support. If he refers to the Committee proceedings, he will discover that our position is entirely consistent.

Mr. Howarth: It is just a shame that once again the Opposition have been unable to produce their own ideas about how to deal with the problem.

I appreciate the Government's need for increased revenue. I also appreciate why my right hon. Friend the then Chancellor considered the possibility of improving the Government's revenue from taxation of investment income, and I am grateful for the transition period that the Government propose to allow to charities.

The Government say that the transition period will allow charities time to rearrange their portfolios, as if to suggest that charities might, by and large, escape the impost. I fear that matters will not be so simple. Responsible trustees will need to keep a balance in their investment portfolios and I am far from optimistic that charities will be able to escape from more than a limited proportion of the new tax burden. My amendments therefore call on the Government to convert the transitional relief into permanent relief. Technically, there would be no difficulty about doing that and I believe that my amendments would achieve that purpose.

Why is it so important that charities should be given permanent relief from the new taxation? The Government need a clear and consistent strategy in relation to charities. They are asking charities to do more and more. With care in the community, they are inviting charities into a new, more formalised and more extensive partnership with the state. It is right that they should do so. State agencies can only do so much. We are bumping up against the limits to which the Government can tax and borrow. State bureaucracies are relatively clumsy; indispensable though they are in social provision, they lack sensitivity to the infinite variety of personal human need.

Charities have entrepreneurial qualities; they are innovative, with a capacity to respond flexibly to new needs as they are identified. They are also highly cost effective as they lever voluntary energies. We need what Beveridge described as a comprehensive policy of social progress, which means harnessing all the resources of society. The Government should develop a new partnership with charities so that we can mobilise society's generosity. Charitable activity benefits not only the recipients but the givers, and strengthens our society's bonds.

For those reasons, the Government need a fully considered, clear view of the role of charities and the nature of the partnership that they want with charities and voluntary organisations. That implies that they should consider the range of their policies systematically to ensure that they are consistently supportive of charities. It means, for instance, that a national lottery intended to raise additional money for good causes should not be so designed as to generate a net financial loss to charity. I am sorry that my amendments on that subject were not selected, but I will say no more on the matter as I would be straying out of order if I did.

Cumulatively, the tax concessions for charities introduced by the Government during their period in office had, before the Budget, reached the impressive total of between £900 million and £1 billion. Sadly, the Budget will reduce that total by not less than £100 million once all the measures in it are fully operational. Of those, the ACT change is particularly important.

Mr. Dorrell: I am listening to my hon. Friend carefully. Will he enlarge on the calculations leading to the estimate that when the ACT changes have run their full courses they will cost the charities world £100 million? Charities currently receive tax credits to the value of approximately £200 million. I do not understand, in simple arithmetic, how reducing the tax credit rate from 25 to 20 per cent. —a reduction of a fifth—can lead to a reduction of a half in the value of tax credits received by charity.

Mr. Howarth: I do not have all the figures to hand to assist my hon. Friend with the details of the computation. However, I am sure that he will respect the Wellcome trust as a source. The Wellcome trust considers that the measure will cost it an extra £10 million. If my hon. Friend considers the other large charitable foundations which we are fortunate to have in this country, and the totality of registered charities with investment income of widely varying levels throughout the country, he should not be surprised. The Charities' Tax Reform Group, which has a reputation for integrity and a high level of competence in policy analysis and how it develops its recommendations, has suggested that figure, so I hope that my hon. Friend will be willing to accept it as a serious estimate.

At a time when the Government are asking charities to do more, when private donations to charities have been depressed as a consequence of the recession, and when central Government and local government grants to charities have been under pressure, the Government have chosen to present a Finance Bill reducing the overall value of the tax concessions that they provide to charities. The Government should be more systematic and consistent in their relationship with charities and their policy towards them.

Let us consider the case of the Wellcome trust. The Government are looking to medical charities to support a larger proportion of the cost of medical research in this country. As it is, medical charities contribute more to those costs than the Government's directly funded Medical Research Council does. I make no complaint about that. But it seems to be an instance of where the left hand in Whitehall is not very clear about what the right hand is doing. The Government want medical research charities to do more to support medical research, but then reduce their capacity to do so.

It is time that the Government reconsidered the balance of reliefs between giving and expenditure. Given the background of the large public sector borrowing requirement, the 20p basic rate which my right hon. Friends have held out to us for some time past still seems a good way off in the distance. The treatment of ACT can, however, be seen as a straw in the wind and a prelude to the 20p basic rate. As the Government are successful over the years in reducing levels of income tax, the value of income tax concessions and of relief on giving falls. Charities receive less money back as the rates of tax become lower, and as it becomes less tax efficient for donors to give to charities it becomes less attractive to them to do so, so income to charities on that side will tend to fall. At the same time, for good economic reasons, the Government have chosen to switch the burden of taxation to indirect tax so that the rates have increased. The extent of the application of indirect taxation is also increasing. It is timely that my right hon. and hon. Friends should reconsider at a fundamental level their strategy for fiscal support for charities.

I hope that the Government will be able to reconsider their policy on ACT in relation to charities.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Is there not another important argument? If the Government demand more and more from charities and the income to charities from donors falls, there will inevitably be a demand for the shortfall to be made up by direct grant from public sources? The danger of that process is that more and more charities will be pushed into becoming service providers to a monopoly purchaser. Charities would then lose much of their principal value—the fact that they have considerable freedom to choose whom they will help and how they will help them.

Mr. Howarth: With his deep knowledge of the charitable world, my hon. Friend has made an extremely important point. The Government must be wary that their tax policies do not result in their cutting off their nose to spite their face, to use a rather inelegant phrase.

Will my right hon. Friends rethink the ACT measure as it bears on charities? Will they give careful thought to the scope for a VAT refund scheme? It is extremely important that before we reach the autumn Budget some searching and radical thought should be given by my right hon. Friends across the range of Departments on what they expect of charities and how they are to support them.

Mr. Dorrell: In introducing the debate, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) drew attention to the language that my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) used in introducing the change in the Budget speech. He made it clear that the purpose of the advance corporation tax change in the round was, first, to help dividend-paying companies and, secondly, to raise revenue. There has never been any doubt that that has been the effect of the slightly complex changes in ACT and tax credit rates.

The policy injects £1 billion this year and £1 billion next year into British company balance sheets. In the third and subsequent years, it delivers £1 billion into the Exchequer as a revenue-raising measure. Therefore, it both helps dividend-paying companies and raises revenues, as the Chancellor made clear that it would when he introduced the change.

The effect of the amendment would be to maintain a 25 per cent. rate of ACT and associated tax credits where the shares of company are held by a charity. That proposal was also supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth). It is not difficult to see why that course does not commend itself to the Government, bearing in mind the practical effect of that tax change. It would discriminate between shareholders when determining the tax consequence of paying a dividend. The amendment requires that when a company pays a dividend it would first have to find out whether a share on its shareholders' register was held by a charity. If it was, the company would be required to pay 25 per cent. ACT rather than 20 per cent. to allow the charity to reclaim a 25 per cent. rate of tax credit on the dividend.

The proposal is extremely complex. My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon said that it would be possible to implement it. I cannot argue that it would be impossible, but it would certainly be complicated. Companies would be denied the benefit of the change, at least those with charities on their shareholders' register, and in the worst case it might make the charity undesirable and unwelcome as a shareholder. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East seems to be learning the lesson of his hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor because he is building for himself a lectern on the Opposition Dispatch Box. [Interruption.] I hope that he will not read it all.

I have illustrated why I do not find the proposal by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon attractive. That should not be taken to undermine in any way the Government's commitment to charitable enterprise and to providing the broadest possible support to charitable activity.

I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon about the importance of encouraging charitable activity and its value to the person receiving it and those who are engaged in providing it. My hon. Friend was right when he said that charitable activity is part of the bond that binds society. It is precisely for that reason that we have proposed for the various organisations that will be affected by the change in ACT a long transitional arrangement. That will shield charities from the immediate consequences of the reduction in the rate of income tax on dividend payments from 25 to 20 per cent.

However, they cannot be shielded from that change indefinitely, nor is it right that they should be, especially when we remember, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon acknowledged, that charities have already felt the effect of the reduction in the standard rate of income tax and therefore of tax credits and ACT from 33 to 25 per cent. The Government are committed to a further reduction to 20 per cent. We have given notice of the effect of the reduction in the value of tax credits. We are committed to it and when the transition provided for in the Bill has run its course, charities will face the new situation. As I have said, that does not reduce the value that the Government attach to charitable activity. However, we recognise that the inevitable consequence of a reduction in the standard rate is that the associated tax credits will also reduce in value. I cannot commend the amendment.

INDEXATION OF ALLOWANCES ETC. FOR 1994-95 ONWARDS

Mr. Dorrell: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 76, line 36, at end insert

'and accordingly, in subsection (4) of that section for "subsection (5)" there shall be substituted "subsections (5) and (5A)".'

This is a minor drafting amendment to insert a missing cross reference in the amendment made by clause 107 to section 509C of the Taxes Act 1988.

Amendment agreed to.

Further consideration adjourned.—[Mr. Wood.]

To be further considered tomorrow.

Bill, not amended (in the Committee) and as amended (in the Standing Committee) to be further considered tomorrow.

International Development Association

11.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): I beg to move,

That the draft International Development Association (Tenth Replenishment) Order 1993, which was laid before this House on 21 June, be approved.

The International Development Association—IDA—is part of the World bank. Its aim is to help improve living standards for the world's poorest people. It provides loans on highly concessional terms to the poorest countries. IDA's central objectives are poverty reduction, economic reform and sustainable development. Those aims complement, and are mutually supportive of, the priority objectives of the United Kingdom aid programme. The World bank has an important leadership role in policy dialogue with developing countries and in promoting sound economic management. It also plays an important role in co-ordinating the efforts of other donors, especially in Africa under the umbrella of the special programme of assistance for sub-Saharan Africa.

The United Kingdom, therefore, has always been a strong supporter of IDA from its inception in 1960. In concert with other donors, we have played an influential part in shaping IDA's evolving role in response to the changing needs and priorities in the poorest countries. IDA's resources are replenished periodically, and the negotiations provide an opportunity for donors to agree the policy priorities which should guide IDA's operations, to supplement the day-to-day policy guidance offered by the bank's board of directors.

The purpose of today's order is to authorise a contribution of £620 million to the tenth replenishment of IDA. Negotiations were concluded last December and donors pledged a total of 13 billion special drawing rights —about $18 billion. That maintains the value of IDA-9 in real terms and will cover commitments over the three years beginning this July. Taking account of the recycling of loans repaid by IDA's borrowers, the total amount available over that period will be about $22 billion.

IDA has received a mandate to continue and to increase its efforts in the key areas of poverty reduction, economic adjustment and environmental protection and improvement. I welcome the attention being paid to those important areas. Development will not happen if people are uneducated and unhealthy and have insufficient access to resources. Development will not be sustainable if we do not take steps to protect our environment. I am particularly pleased that more attention is to be devoted to bringing down the rate of population growth—a better life for all is not possible if economic growth is outstripped by population growth. Nor can prospects for sustainable development be enhanced when over-population leads, as it so often does, to environmental degradation.

The central objective of the World bank is to reduce poverty in developing countries. The bank is following a two-prong strategy, combining economic growth with the development of human resources through expanded social services. IDA is currently undertaking poverty assessments for all active borrowers. The assessments provide the basis for IDA's lending operations and help to determine a country's commitment to poverty reduction. An increasing feature of IDA's country assistance programmes is that a Government commitment to poverty reduction warrants increased lending, while the absence of such a commitment leads to a lower level of activity. We have given strong support to IDA's bias in favour of support for those countries that are genuinely attempting to raise the standard of living of their poorest citizens.

In recent years, there has been an increased awareness among the donor community of the need to promote environmentally sustainable development. IDA has promoted and will continue to promote environmental protection and improvement throughout its operations. A key component of its strategy is the production of national environmental action plans for borrowers. The plans provide the basis for IDA's dialogue with borrowers on the means of securing sustainable development based on actions that have no adverse effects on the environment.

In addition, IDA produces environmental assessments for all projects when there might be cause for concern. The assessments made available to affected groups locally contain a full analysis of any significant social and environmental impacts. There are many examples of the increasing attention being given by the bank to environmental issues, not least the work being undertaken in such important areas as energy efficiency, water resources management and involuntary resettlement.

We have pressed successfully for good government—including respect for human rights—to be an important part of the development agenda in both bilateral and multilateral discussions. By good government, I mean competence in pursuing sound development and economic policies, legitimacy and accountability of public institutions and respect for human rights and the rule of law.

We have welcomed the attention to be given under IDA-10 to the economic aspects of good government—essentially, features that have long-term implications for a country's capacity to initiate and sustain programmes for effective poverty relief and environmental sustainability.

Another important area covered in the deputies' report is the need to strengthen the bank's project performance. Last year, the president of the World bank set up an internal task force to examine why the proportion of successful projects—although still high—was decreasing. The bank has prepared an action plan based on its recommendations: the plan was endorsed by the bank's board of directors last week. The bank will also publish a booklet outlining the steps that it is taking to improve performance.

I am confident that, with the active support of its members and borrowers, the bank's performance will improve in the areas under its control. It will be especially important for borrowers to commit themselves to the ownership of the projects in their portfolios.

In IDA-9, it was agreed that up to 50 per cent. of lending should go to Africa. This allocation will be maintained under IDA-10. We welcome that, as well as the recognition given to the needs of Asia, where more than half of the world's poor live; but it is in Africa that some of the greatest challenges in tackling poverty lie. IDA has played a leading role in supporting the efforts of countries in the region to put in place measures that will lead to a resumption in growth.

We have been strong supporters of the structural adjustment programmes, and have provided funds from bilateral aid programmes to supplement the efforts of the World bank. The special programme for Africa, to which we have committed £550 million, is intended to ensure that reform programmes in low-income African countries do not fail for lack of finance. The programme has also increasingly devoted attention to protecting expenditure on the social services, and more generally to addressing the needs of the poorest. However, donors have recognised that more needs to be done to protect the poor during the implementation of adjustment programmes. Increasingly, IDA-supported adjustment programmes incorporate measures to protect public expenditure in such areas as primary health care and education.

IDA faces many new challenges. The association will need to address the requirements of new members, particularly countries that have emerged from the former Soviet Union and other countries that have rejoined the association. It will need to give increased attention to such areas as poverty reduction and environmentally sustainable development and it will need to implement measures that will improve its performance. IDA will therefore need the full support of its donors. In commending this order to the House, I can give an assurance that we shall be monitoring the activities of the World bank closely to ensure that the objectives set out in the deputies' report are met.

In summary, we are glad to support IDA's central aim of alleviating poverty and its concentration of resources in key areas, including environmentally sustainable development. We welcome its action to tackle the problems of the poorest, and particularly the poorer indebted countries in Africa. We support its attempts to help those countries improve their co-ordination of aid from all sources. We play a vigorous part in such co-ordination.

The World bank and IDA are the world's leading development institutions. They constitute the cutting edge for change and for improvement in the social and economic conditions in developing countries. Successive British Governments have supported the World bank and our commitment is as firm as ever. I commend the order to the House.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): We have just listened to a typically anodyne canter round the course from the Minister, who did not seem even to notice that all his worthy and wordy platitudes, such as environmentally sound projects, the international rule of law and priority for poverty alleviation, are all belied by events and by the evidence that is before us. He did not appear even to notice that all these issues have been the subject of profound criticism, none of which he answered—not least, I might add, the British Government's monitoring, if one can use that word, of World bank activities. As I shall go on to show, that is ostentatious by its absence.

When an ODA resolution seeking support for several hundred million pounds for development projects comes before this House, one normally gives it a strong welcome. In this case, however, the tenth IDA replenishment, the criticism of IDA procedures runs so deep that, contrary to the whole tenor and content of the Minister's speech, with breaches of World bank policy so flagrant and results so often counterproductive, it is doubtful whether this order should be approved at all. On balance, I believe that the order should be approved, but only on the basis of far stricter accountability than the lax and complicit record of ODA Ministers in handling World bank projects would suggest so far.

At the heart of this debate, which the Minister did not even mention, is accountability, according to financial, environmental and developmental criteria, for the huge sums devoted to IDA and the World bank by donor countries, including Britain which will be contributing £620 million under the order. A significant proportion of IDA funds is directed towards big top-down projects that forcibly displace local populations, forestry projects that contribute to deforestation, large-scale energy projects that are highly pollutant and do not improve conservation, and structural adjustment programmes that worsen poverty and degrade the environment. They favour export promotion and unregulated business activity.

As I listened to the Minister, I wondered whether he existed on the same planet where all these things are taking place. There is no record of resistance by British Ministers or British representatives to these anti-social and anti-development policies of the World bank—not in every case, but in so many cases. On several occasions, the voting record shows that the Government colluded in and actively encouraged such policies.

As everyone knows, the Government have gone on and on about value for money in the case of the health service, ambulance workers, teachers, local authorities and, most recently, the police. However, in the face of overwhelming evidence that IDA lending can have damaging social and environmental effects, that project quality is deteriorating and that World bank policy and loan agreement conditions are ignored, Ministers have made no public protest. If I am wrong, let the Minister correct me.

Why did the Government not make known, for example, their intense dissatisfaction when the recent Wapenhans report revealed that 37 per cent. of World bank funded projects failed to meet the bank's own criteria? That compares with only 15 per cent. in 1981, and deterioration has accelerated in the past three years. The Wapenhans report states that pressure inside the bank to lend money and promote projects overwhelms all other considerations. As a result, poor project design, poor appraisal practices and a failure to enforce loan agreements are widespread in the bank's operations. If that is so, why do the Government continue to lend hundreds of millions of pounds without insisting and without checking that such major defects are rooted out? The Minister's speech was a travesty; some serious questions, involving large sums of taxpayers' money, need an answer, but we have not remotely begun to hear one. I should be glad to give way if the Minister could tear himself away from writing or reading his latest brief and perhaps deal with some of the problems.

How does the Minister justify the huge programmes of forced resettlement which World bank projects have often caused? In the 1980s, about 95 World bank supported projects caused the forcible displacement of more than 2 million people. The World bank policy objective is that those people are afterwards "afforded opportunities to become established and economically self-sustaining in the shortest possible period, at living standards that at least match and if possible improve on those before resettlement".

That is a quotation from page 19 of World bank technical paper No. 80. However, the bank has not documented one single case anywhere in the world where a large number of people displaced by one of its projects have improved, let alone regained, their standard of living.

[Mr. Michael Meacher]

These projects have often resulted in hundreds of thousands of poor people being made homeless and destitute.

Perhaps the most notorious case is that of the Narmada dam. I hope that the Minister has heard of it—it is in India. The World bank approved $450 million for that power and irrigation project in northern India at the expense of forcibly displacing more than 200,000 of the rural poor. After years of controversy, the World bank was obliged to set up an independent review team, whose conclusion is highly relevant to the debate. Its conclusion was that the the projects were "flawed, that resettlement and rehabilitation of all those displaced . . . is not possible under prevailing circumstances and that environmental impacts . . . have not been properly considered or properly addressed."

That is a pretty damning indictment. The team argued that the bank should consider the projects "afresh".

In fact, the World bank's management decided to ignore the independent review's advice. However, at the crucial meeting of the bank's executive directors in October 1992, an unprecedentedly high 44 per cent. of directors, including representatives of the United States, Japan, Canada, Scandinavia, Germany and Australia, voted to suspend funding, despite the management's advice.

Britain held a decisive vote at the meeting, which it used to support the project and to recommend the loan of more money. I submit to the House that that was a shameful decision by the British representative, who must have been acting on instructions from the British Government.

Perhaps the Minister will now tell the House how he justifies that decision. I would be glad if the Minister would take time from my speech to answer that point. I would prefer that to the glib platitudes that a civil servant has written for the Minister. I would like the Minister to answer a few relevant points about accountability—[Interruption.] May I have the Minister's attention? I am very concerned to have an answer to this point. I hope that we shall not hear the same kind of ridiculous travesties that we heard in the Minister's opening speech.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I understood that the hon. Gentleman was making a speech. With the leave of the House, I shall have an opportunity to respond in the usual way to any points that the hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Members wish to make. I think that the hon. Gentleman should leave the matter there.

Mr. Meacher: I am certainly not going to leave the matter there as I am sure that in the last five minutes of this extremely short debate we shall hear a few more platitudes which make no attempt to answer any detailed questions.

The point that I have raised is probably the most serious event in the past year in terms of World bank policies in so far as they affect Britain. How does the Minister justify the decision that was taken in respect of the Narmada dam when all the other major countries voted to suspend funding and Britain alone tipped the balance? That project produces the forcible displacement of 200,000 people. How can the British Government possibly justify that?

Will the Minister confirm that he will answer that specific point when he replies to the debate? I am prepared to continue if I am assured that I will receive an answer later. I am not prepared to leave the point so that it is just swept aside in the last minute of this debate. Will the Minister assure me that he will answer the point about the British Government's culpable responsibility for the continuation of the Narmada dam project?

It is a particularly disreputable episode when the Overseas Development Agency's press release, which was issued at the same time, admitted:

"there has been no effective consultation with those affected by the project, and there is insufficient baseline data to measure the impact of the project."

The press release continued:

"The World Bank's own guidelines on resettlement have been repeatedly ignored."

In that case, the House will want to know why ODA Ministers gave their support to continuing that project. We want an answer to that tonight.

Nor is that saga an isolated case. The independent review team report states:

"Problems besetting the Narmada project are more the rule than the exception to resettlement operations supported by the bank."

Similar results in fact happened elsewhere in India, Rwanda, Brazil, Indonesia, Argentina and Malawi.

Because forced resettlement on a mass scale is resisted on the ground, the policies that the Government are supporting have led to human rights violations and widespread disregard of international law. It is astonishing that the Minister can stand before the House and parrot words about respect for the international rule of law. Has he looked at any evidence of what is actually happening with the money that we provide to the World bank?

Since 1990 in the Narmada valley, for example, there has been a dramatic increase in beatings, arbitrary arrests and illegal detentions of the people to be displaced and their supporters. Does it not give the Minister just a little cause for thought that that is supposed to be in the cause of development? To take another example of human rights, in June 1992, when other donors world wide were refusing funding to Malawi because of recent human rights violations, why did the British Government support a highly questionable $55 million IDA loan for Malawi's power sector? Will the Minister, in his five minutes at the end of the debate, explain that?

How can the ODA piously say, as it does, that it is cutting off aid to Malawi because of human rights violations when at the same time it instructs its representative in Washington to support a major capital project for Malawi? How do the Government justify increasing IDA forestry lending when so much of the expenditure leads to deforestation? Again, the Minister uses the simple words "environmentally sound projects". I should like to know the evidence. A $23 million forestry and fisheries management IDA project in Guinea, for example, was supposed to protect the country's remaining primary forests, but by supporting the construction of 45 miles of road around two rainforest reserves it opens up 100,000 hectares in that area to logging. Why did the British Government support that? There are many examples, especially in India, but IDA's social forestry programmes in Peru, west Africa, Colombia and the Philippines have all benefited commercial interests rather than the poor.

I come to the point of the debate. As the World bank is now asking donor Governments for $18 billion replenishment and $5 billion for the so-called earth increment, which the bank would use for increased environmental lending, how can the British Government trust the bank to use that much more taxpayers' money for environmental projects when the bank's current portfolio is so highly destructive to the environment?

My final main charge against the Government's lax and, to put it very politely, over-ready support for World bank policies, even when they are patently damaging in some cases, is that although one of the principal objectives of IDA is stated as poverty alleviation—I give full credit to the bank and to IDA that they have made that their primary objective—nevertheless a substantial proportion of IDA credits underwrite products that actually harm the poor. In particular, IDA-funded structural adjustment programmes, which absorb 30 per cent. of IDA lending, have worsened conditions for women, children, poor workers and small producers, have increased environmental degradation, and have led to austerity programmes that cut public expenditure on health and education. Why do the Government—again, I should like an answer and I do not see why I cannot have one now, although no doubt it will not be forthcoming from the Minister—continue to ram Thatcherite economics down the throats of developing countries when they have abandoned the medicine here because it is too painful and too damaging and because it leads to spectacular failure?

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): I have been listening to the debate on the Floor of the House and in the Strangers Gallery. If the hon. Gentleman is so opposed to the order, because he considers it to be flawed, why did he say at the outset that he supports it?

Mr. Meacher: If the hon. Gentleman had been listening, he would have heard me say that I supported it on balance and with great reluctance. I still think it right that £600 million should be given to the World bank—but I made it clear that it was only on condition of tighter and more rigorous accountability than anything seen so far. If nothing has changed by next year and we hear the same travesty of an opening speech from the Minister, the result on this side of the House will be very different.

Why do the Government insist that a condition for debt relief and for aid is the fulfilment of structural adjustment programmes even to their destructive limit, yet when countries fulfil such programmes even with the destructive consequences that I mentioned they are still not offered a crumb of debt relief—as the G7 summit in Tokyo last week revealed only too clearly?

The expansion of cocoa production and the revival of the timber industry in Ghana are both conditions for structural adjustment loans to that country, yet they cause massive destruction of Ghana's last remaining forests. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Robinson) disagrees, I shall be glad to hear his detailed comments.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I do become exasperated by the hon. Gentleman. He said that if I come to the House next year and make a speech of the kind that I made tonight he will not be able to approve the order. The hon. Gentleman does not know what he is talking about. This replenishment is for a three-year period.

Mr. Meacher: I am perfectly aware that it will last a long time, but if the Minister will only wait to hear the end of my speech he will hear me say that we should have annual debates on this issue, and not confine discussion to one and a half hours after 10 o'clock.

What is the point of the Government boasting of any particular increase in bilateral aid programmes—when that occasionally happens—if the conditions of the multilateral aid programme have such devastating consequences for the same recipients? There is no consistency between the bilateral and multilateral aid programmes.

For all those reasons, we are deeply sceptical about the Government's willingness, let alone determination, to ensure full accountability for the £600 million replenishment. A new framework is needed that will allow much greater public scrutiny of both the World bank and the regional multilateral development bank, so that taxpayers' money is spent and is seen to be spent in ways that genuinely benefit developing countries.

I make three specific proposals to achieve that, and I pay warm tribute to the excellent pioneering work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) in this regard.

First, a report should be submitted by the World bank to Parliament each year and the Government should offer a day's debate on it so that issues of overriding importance involving billions of pounds can be properly debated. It is not acceptable that discussion of issues of such magnitude, affecting one-third of the world's population, should be confined to a debate such as this, attended by a handful of hon. Members on either side—most of them giggling and talking at the side.

Secondly, we want mandatory publication—and I hope that the Minister will respond to this point, too, and that he will make a long winding-up speech because he has so many comments to make—of the United Kingdom's voting position at the level of board decisions within the bank. That is important if another Narmada is to be avoided. At present, shameful decisions such as that taken by the British Government over the Narmada dam are taken in a complete vacuum without any reference to Parliament before or after. That is a major loophole in what is supposed to be a democratic system of government and one that must be remedied.

Thirdly, we believe that technical documents which have a bearing on board decisions, such as the environmental impact statements, should be released in advance of board meetings that take the decisions. Again, one would have thought that that was an obvious matter. NGOs have sometimes had some success in winkling out specific details on particular projects and exposing them to the public and to the media, but that is an arbitrary hit-and-miss affair. Surely such technical documents are the kind of material for which there is a public entitlement to know on a systematic basis.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I have been following the hon. Gentleman's criticism. Does he accept that the bank seems to have responded to such criticisms? In April, it made a number of procedural changes, including the one to which he has just referred. The bank will make the environmental assessments more widely available to member states and on the bank's premises.

Mr. Meacher: I accept that point. I also accept that there were references in the papers today, especially in the Financial Times, to various improved procedures. I strongly welcome them. I do not think that they take us very far, but I believe that they are in the right direction. I should like the whole critique of the Wapenhans report to be addressed.

[Mr. Meacher]

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: It is being addressed.

Mr. Meacher: The Minister says that it is being addressed. Where is the hard evidence? Where is the beef?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: It would be better to respond to the hon. Gentleman at the end of the debate, which is what I am anxious to do.

Mr. Meacher: Why not do that?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The hon. Gentleman provoked me on at least six occasions. I am jolly well going to intervene now. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the board considered the recommendations of the Wapenhans report last week. I said that in my opening speech, of which he took not a blind bit of notice. A booklet has been published about the Wapenhans report and about the recommendations to address those matters. The hon. Gentleman will be able to read it if he bothers to look at any of the sensible facts.

Mr. Meacher: I am glad to know that the Wapenhans report will be addressed. There is a great deal of difference —[HON. MEMBERS: "Why not listen?"] I listened carefully to platitude on cliché on boring phrase from the Minister at the beginning. He appeared not to be aware of any of my criticisms tonight. He did not address a single one.

I am pleased that we shall have a response to the Wapenhans report. What I want to know is how far it addresses those comments. There is a 37 per cent. failure by the bank to meet its own criteria. What changes in management will bring that figure below 5 per cent. or 10 per cent.? Perhaps there should be no failure at all. Until we have seen the response, I shall suspend my judgment. However, I am glad to know that there is at least some readiness to address these issues.

I attach great importance to the three demands that I have made to improve the bank's acountability. We are still deeply sceptical about the accountability of IDA and of the World bank. I give the Minister notice that we shall campaign to put all three proposals into effect. Without them, the role of Parliament in sanctioning £620 million of extra expenditure is wholly unsatisfactory. The Opposition will certainly not accept such an unsatisfactory basis again for any future debates on IDA replenishments.

Mr. John Denham: (Southampton, Itchen): As has already been mentioned, last week the World bank discussed the document on increasing openness and access to information. As a Member of Parliament who tries to follow World bank affairs, I thought that it would be interesting before last week's board meeting to obtain a copy of that document. I approached the Washington office of the United Kingdom's executive director of the World bank by letter and said that I understood that the document was to be discussed at the board meeting, and that it was about freedom of information and access to World bank information. I received a reply from the United Kingdom's executive director saying that I could not be shown a copy of the document because it was confidential. That travesty of openness and accountability surrounds the Government's approach to the World bank. Even when openness and accountability are being discussed, hon. Members cannot get a sight of the documents through official Government sources.

I did the obvious thing, which was to ring up an American non-governmental organisation, and I was sent a copy, by immediate courier, from the US. Not all Governments work on the basis of such secrecy and lack of accountability.

It is interesting to learn from the press that discussions are taking place in the World bank about the response to the Wapenhans report, and the next steps document produced by the World bank management. The House knows from the press that the first version of the next steps report was informally rejected by board members, and a board meeting set up to discuss it was cancelled and turned into a seminar. To my knowledge, no Back-Bench Member has any idea of what input the United Kingdom Government made in the discussions about the Wapenhans report.

The issues are not simply that the report shows than an ever-increasing number of World bank projects are failing to make an economic rate of return. Those who wrote the Wapenhans report decided to assess World bank projects, and projects alone, on the basis of the economic return on the investment in those projects. As the development and environmental organisations have repeatedly said, and not just in this country, that is a narrow set of criteria by which to judge the effectiveness of World bank projects. My belief, and that of many of those organisations, is that if World bank projects and loans were assessed not purely on an economic rate of return, but by their effectiveness in poverty eradication and in promoting sustainable development, a much larger proportion of the World bank portfolio of loans would be shown to have failed.

I do not believe that any hon. Member knows whether the United Kingdom Government have pressed, in the discussions on the Wapenhans report, for a broadening of the criteria by which the success of World bank loans is to be judged, or what specific management measures in the World bank our Government has pressed for. I cannot see any reason why hon. Members, and the much wider development and environmental community, should not have access to that information. Why is the conduct of our executive director, who will be responsible for spending the £620 million that we are debating tonight, shrouded in such secrecy?

The problem is that the secrecy and lack of accountability that have surrounded the World bank go to the heart of its many failures as a development institution. We should be aware that many NGOs in the north, and far more in the south, would like us to vote against the replenishment of the IDA. That would be an enormous step, and not one that I am prepared to contemplate, but we must all be aware of the power and significance of the money under discussion.

Bank lending determines the economic and social policies of recipient countries. For example, for the more than 20 African countries covered by the special programme of assistance for Africa, access not only to the IDA but to bilateral funding is effectively dependent on the implementation of bank-designed structural adjustment policy. Those policies—not the policies of the recipient Governments—determine the relative priority of social spending and environmental protection, trade and fiscal policy, agricultural and industrial policy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said, they set the context that determines the success or failure of every bilateral trade programme, every NGO project, every indigenous development initiative and every local business venture. By replenishing the IDA, we are strengthening the awesome power of the World bank to determine the policy of Government after Government and country after country.

There is not time to detail the many failures of World bank policy—many have already been referred to. The Wapenhans report, the task force on portfolio management, has recognised the unacceptable and rising rate of project failure. It looked only at projects, but many were failing because the structural adjustment loans promoted by the World bank were also failing, and creating an economic situation in which individual development projects were bound to fail. We should bear in mind that every failure of World bank lending rebounds not on the bank, as it would with a commerical bank, but on the borrowing country in the form of an increasingly unserviceable debt burden. By and large, these projects were conceived outside the countries concerned, and designed and implemented outside those countries too.

The criticisms levelled at the World bank are not new. The bank's belated response owes much to the growing threat to the bank from northern taxpayers, who ask why they should continually fork out for an organisation with such a poor record——

Mr. Fabricant: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the World bank lends to third-world countries and undertakes risky ventures? If they were not risky ventures, commercial banks would make the loans. Surely, by definition, the failure rate of loans by the World bank will be higher than that of the commercial banks.

Mr. Denham: It is true that some development lending is bound to fail. The problem with the World bank is that it conceives the loans in the first place; it designs the projects, makes the loans—and then offloads the failures on to developing countries and their peoples. That problem has yet to be overcome.

The bank is a strange organisation. It is a creation of Governments, particularly the powerful Governments of the industrialised countries. Yet in almost every industrialised country there is weak scrutiny of the bank by Governments and elected Parliaments, or similar institutions. The bank has a high degree of autonomy. Although it is staffed by intelligent people from all over the world, almost all of them share a narrow set of economic ideas, were trained in a small number of the same northern universities, and share almost identical ideological outlooks. The bureaucracy of the bank is not accountable enough to those whose lives it touches.

This is why the bank's recent commitment to poverty reduction, the promotion of education for women, environmental assessment and sustainable development has been greeted all around the world with scepticism. Although we all applaud the intention, we have yet to see significant improvements on the ground. We have yet to see a willingness to examine whether structural adjustment policies work, or just meet a politically correct test of free market ideology.

The Washington office of the United Kingdom Government does not have enough staff independently to assess the bank's work; nor does the ODA. One critical new policy has been consultation with local non-Governmental organisations on implementation of the bank's policies, but the ODA is incapable of answering parliamentary questions about which NGOs have been consulted, and in which countries. We just have to trust the bank to get it right.

The World bank's first report on environmental impact assessments reveals that local consultation with NGOs is at best patchy, so the Government cannot even monitor our role in the bank, or learn whether it is fulfilling its objectives.

Apart from debates such as this, every three years, the House has scarcely any opportunities to discuss how the bank is performing. Given the large sums under discussion, that is not adequate. The House should be given an annual report on the World bank's activities, and a debate on them. The ODA should produce its own independent assessment of the impact of the bank's policies in countries where we have bilateral aid programmes, and assess the impact of those policies according to the objectives set by the ODA for development.

There is no reason why the House should not be given a report, at least after the event, on the voting record of and policy stances adopted by the United Kingdom executive director.

I believe that the House should ensure that the relevant Select Committees regularly scrutinise this country's policies towards the bank. The National Audit Office should also, on occasion, examine whether we get value for money, judged by sustainable development criteria, for the large sums of money at stake.

New and increased transfers of money to the poorest developing countries are needed. By agreeing the proposed increase, however, the House will pass new powers to the bank's staff in Washington to determine the lives of hundreds of millions of people. If we do that, we should make it clear that, in future, sharp questions are asked continually about how that money is used and the real impact it has on people's lives and the environment.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): We have heard two good contributions from my colleagues on the Opposition Benches.

It is difficult to overestimate the importance of the debate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) has said, the World bank and the International Monetary Fund of Washington are the governments, in an economic sense, of innumerable countries. How do we scrutinise what is done by the World bank? We have this kind of debate, late at night, once every three years. That simply is not good enough as a means of holding accountable some of the most powerful people in the world. It is through the World bank and the IMF that the private sector decides whether to invest in certain countries. Access to the resources of the world depends on the imprimatur of the World bank.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was perhaps a little harsh on the Minister for being complacent. He is not the only Minister to display such an attitude. The Minister for Overseas Development, Baroness Chalker, said about the additions to IDA resources:

"I have a high regard for the effectiveness of IDA in promoting development in the poorest countries."

It is incredible that the British Government are less critical of the IDA than the IDA itself. Following the Wapenhans report, I find that very depressing. That report found that a declining proportion of good projects was being undertaken. It revealed alarming problems with the bank's follow-through on loans and found that most of the bank's expertise was devoted to coming up with projects of which it approved and spending large amounts of money. Hardly any of its expertise was devoted to determining whether a project was doing any good. It found that, on average, projects took two and a half years longer to complete than estimated.

One would never know from the Minister's opening speech that more than 40 non-governmental organisations had asked that the replenishment should not go ahead. They were speaking on behalf of the poor of the world because of the damage done by the IDA. Of course I demand that resources should be given to the poor, but I want them to be used properly and appropriately. That expenditure should be subject to critical scrutiny. It should not be applied simply in a manner that is more in the interests of the donors than of the poor.

It is worth considering what the IDA has said about itself in its 32-page document. It contains just one sentence about debt being a matter of concern for the developing world. The World bank displays absurd complacency about the debt crisis being over when everyone in the poorest parts of the world would say that it is easily the most important problem to be faced.

The entire document contains no mention of the mega-projects, the energy projects for which the IDA has been famous. It gives the impression that all the IDA does is to promote women's health, family planning and the like, but the IDA and the World bank are bywords for building large dams that displace many people. As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West said, those centralised, top-down, ill-conceived projects are more to the benefit of the donors, their construction companies and the elite of poor countries than to poor people. In the 1980s, the World bank sponsored some 90 energy projects involving 90 dams and the displacement of some 2 million people. It has not come back with a single report showing that those people's lives were improved.

The IDA's document mentions new concern for women's education, reproductive health and general welfare. The IDA and World bank projects show new concern for the need for safety nets, but they do not mention that those safety nets are needed because of the activities of the World bank and the IDA. A huge part of the loans is for structural adjustments that put the needs of the first world first and damage the third world's capacity to feed itself.

The IDA and the World bank do not act first on behalf of the developing world as they claim. The inside front cover of the IDA document says:

"The central challenge for IDA is . . . to mobilise the will and the resources of the affluent and afflicted alike in the global battle against poverty."

One would never gather from that statement that, during the 1980s, the external debt of sub-Saharan Africa rose from 28·2 per cent. of gross domestic product in 1980 to 109 per cent. of gross domestic product in 1990. No mention was made of the fact that, in 1991, the World bank's transfers to developing countries were minus $1·7 billion. The World bank took out of Africa $1·7 billion more than it put in, and the Government say that it is an effective way to invest in the developing world! The IDA document does not mention the lack of representation of the interests of the poor in the GATT talks. It does not criticise protectionism, such as the common agricultural policy and its devastating impact on the third world.

The Minister must deal with those issues in his response. What will he do—not just say that he will do—to increase the accountability and transparency of the World bank and the IDA? Why should not we know how we vote, as the Americans do? We are being asked to approve the expenditure of £620 million, which an unknown civil servant spends in an unknown way. How did we vote last week—according to the Financial Times, it was today—on public information policy at the bank? How did we vote on the issue that the world should know what happens on the board of the World bank? What was our director instructed to do? Did he say, "Open the doors" or "Keep the doors shut"?

How did we vote on the right of appeal on complaints against the bank's activities, which was before the board today? Is there to be a right of appeal for poor people affected by the decisions of the bank which parachute projects on people? How is our policy at the World bank decided? Does the ODA, the Foreign Office, the DTI or the Treasury decide how we vote? What ministerial meetings take place? What is our policy? When will the Government reveal their policy on the huge amount of money that we vote to be spent there? Will the Minister give us an honest evaluation of the World bank and the IDA? What side does he take on the Wapenhans report? What is he going to do about the World bank culture that puts lending first and the consequences and planning second?

It is well known that Africa is our special area of influence and concern at the bank and the International Monetary Fund. It is well known that nobody goes ahead with projects at the World bank without the say-so of the British director. It is recognised that Africa is our special sphere of expertise. The Americans might have special expertise in Latin America, but our specialist area is Africa. Other directors look to the British director for advice on projects in Africa. Where is the world's biggest disaster area? It is Africa—the place where the Minister, his colleagues and the Departments of State have most influence. When will we receive a re-evaluation of the world's Africa policy?

What are we going to do about forestry policies which exploit, rather than safeguard, the world's resources? My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West said that we praise Ghana for its structural adjustment policies; but there is not simply increasing poverty but the pillage of the rain forests in Ghana.

The World bank and the IMF are peddled as the wealthy helping the poor, but the poor are becoming more numerous all the time, and the gap between rich and poor is widening. We are approaching the 50th anniversary of the Bretton Woods institutions and there could not be a better time for re-evaluating. When the Minister says that he now backs the World bank, and the IDA, which does he mean—the old World bank or the new one?

The World bank vice-president for Africa spoke of how the capacity in Africa has been undermined. Earlier, the Minister gave his approval to the old World bank but now the vice-president for Africa, Mr Edward Jaycox, whose speech I have, says:

"In sum the donors have done a disservice to Africa. After 30 years of technical assistance and so much money spent, Africa's weak institutions, lack of expertise and current need for more and not less assistance tell us that we have failed badly in our efforts."

That is what the World bank is saying now, but that is not the World bank that the Minister was backing earlier. Jaycox talks of 100,000 foreign experts working in sub-Saharan Africa and consuming a major chunk of all foreign aid moneys to the continent. Does the Minister agree with the World bank's assessment or does he agree with the earlier assessment of Baroness Chalker that the IDA's contribution was effective in developing countries? The Minister must tell us what changes he proposes because even the World bank and the IDA are more critical of themselves now than the Government.

12.12 am

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have had a great debate with the most characteristic exaggeration from the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), supported by his hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington). We heard a much more balanced criticism from the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr Denham). The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) also made a much more balanced and composed contribution, and placed the World bank's problems in a far more sensible context than that described by the hon. Member for Oldham, West. The hon. Gentleman did not even seem to know that we were discussing a three-year funding mechanism. He hid his confusion by saying that he was speaking about a debate next year, not that there should be another funding mechanism next year but that there should be such a debate every year. That covering of tracks was not lost on me.

If the hon. Gentleman had listened to my speech he would have heard me remind the House of the three-year funding mechanism. If he pulled his finger out and asked for a few more Opposition Supply days, one of which is to be held on Wednesday, he could have any number of debates on the subject. We should be delighted to debate these matters because we are confident of our assertions.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the Wapenhans report. He did not listen to a word of my speech because I said that an action plan by the bank based on the recommendations of that report had been cleared last week. There is a booklet describing the steps that the World bank intends to take to improve performance. The hon. Gentleman was not interested in such significant facts but, for reasons that are best known to himself, he contented himself with a sustained attack on the World bank. I shall deal with some of the criticisms of the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends, but I shall first deal with some of the other contributions in the debate.

The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie said that the document before the House did not contain a report on the world's debt problems. I hope that he is aware that, following a comprehensive study, the World bank issued a separate report on the important subject of debt repayments. Everybody realises that that subject is at the heart of the world's development problems.

The hon. Gentleman made another point with which I am familiar about the fact that some countries in sub-Saharan Africa are repaying the IMF more than they are currently receiving by way of loans. I shall deal with what the World bank is seeking to do to address that problem, but I shall first put the matter in context. It must be remembered that IMF flows are only a part of total assistance provided to Africa. The countries of sub-Saharan Africa have consistently received more than they have paid out when aid, foreign direct investment and other sources are included. The amount received in 1991 was about £7 billion.

As I have said, the World bank is aware of the problem that the hon. Gentleman mentioned and it is anxious to help those countries to meet their technical and financial needs with a 0·5 per cent. interest rate and a 10-year repayment period. The IMF's ESAF provides concessional support for medium-term reform and it seeks to address the problem.

The hon. Member for Itchen spoke about access to information about the World bank. The United Kingdom director's reply is correct: there is a need to preserve a balance between openness and confidentiality about the board's proceedings and its relationship of trust with borrowers. One of the reasons for that balance is to enable our representative to make clear and firm criticisms when the occasion demands it. We must be able to say what we think without our remarks being the subject of press comment which gets back to the country whose conduct is being criticised. There is a need for confidentiality, and any sensible person would realise that a proper balance must be struck in that area.

I have mentioned the Wapenhans report. Action has been taken on that report, which was instituted by the bank to address some of the problems.

The World bank lends money for complex and difficult projects. Over recent years, some of the projects have been made even more difficult by the complicated economic background, the world recession and the fact that those projects have not always materialised in the way that over-optimism suggested they would.

Mr. Lewis Preston, during his relatively short time as president of the bank, has made it his priority to deal with the problems of environmental degradation. That is the reason for the Wapenhans report, which was initiated by the World bank. The bank's directors have made decisions in response to criticisms, as was explained to the House last week.

Mr. Worthington: Does the Minister agree that the Wapenhans report is a major step forward? If so, why did we hear about it only because it was leaked?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I cannot believe that that is the case. I cannot comment on the allegation of a leak as I have not heard it previously. The fact is that we received the resolution of the directors only last week. It is not appropriate to discuss the Wapenhans report before the bank's directors have had the opportunity to say what action they are taking on the report and what they intend to do to deal with the matters that it identifies.

Mr. Denham: The Minister referred to some problems with World bank openness and decision making in relation to developing countries. Can he explain why we should not know what policy position the UK executive director took in the discussions on the Wapenhans report, which is about the management of World bank projects, not about specific policies in a particular developing country?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We support the bank's intention to make publicly available more information about its projects and programmes. That is the British position. As the hon. Gentleman knows, other members of the board have differing perceptions about the degree to which the bank's operations should be open to further public scrutiny. No decision has been reached on the bank's proposals, but it will be preparing revised proposals for further consideration by the board.

Sir David Steel: Does the Minister accept that there is a difference between public scrutiny and public accountability? I think that the House is more concerned about public accountability. Is not there a case for persuading our colleagues on the Treasury Select Committee to take a closer interest in the affairs of the IDA and the World bank?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have no objection to that suggestion, but it is also a matter for this Chamber. Every opportunity is afforded to Opposition parties to have Supply day debates on these important issues. Indeed, some of the subjects that the Opposition choose for debate are so uninteresting that I should have thought that occasionally they would want to choose the subject of aid, which is so close to the heart of the Labour party.

I want to make a few comments about environmental protection and sustainability. The hon. Member for Oldham, West——[Interruption.] He is not listening to me again. I do not care if he does not listen to me, but if he does not listen he should not criticise me. He should give credit to the fact that over recent years environmental concerns and the whole question of environmental impact assessments have increasingly played an enormous part in the World bank's activities. The implementation of IDA-10 will help developing countries to meet the priorities of Agenda 21 that were agreed at the earth summit a year ago.

The World bank's performance on environmental issues has been mixed in the past, but it has improved in recent years as lessons have been learned. Understanding the complex economic and social pressures over the past few years has been of benefit to the bank, and there has been significant progress in the way in which the bank has approached such problems. For example, it has set up a new vice-presidency for environmentally sustainable development. The decision to establish the vice-presidency constituted an explicit recognition of the significant shift in development thinking which has taken place in the bank and elsewhere, and which recognises the enormous importance of environmentally sustainable development —in particular, in regard to the bank's responsibilities.

The bank and the new vice-presidency are assisting the bank's operational departments in the delivery of quality assistance to member countries. The bank has also been reviewing its policies in sensitive environmental areas; recent studies, for example, have concerned the electric power sector—to which the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie referred—and energy efficiency, conservation and water resources. Currently under review is the bank's policy on resettlement; the executive board will consider a report on that at the end of the year.

Mr. Meacher: If the Minister is so concerned about increasing sensitivity in regard to environmental projects, how does he explain the fact that, a year ago, the World bank's management wanted to continue with the Narmada valley project? How does he explain that it went through the executive board only because the British vote permitted that decision to be made?

Does the Minister accept World bank-funded projects that lead to the forcible resettlement of 2 million people? If not, what are the British Government doing to stop it?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I was about to turn to the Narmada valley project; I anticipated the hon. Gentleman's remarks. As he knows, at the end of March the Indian Government announced that they had asked the bank to cancel the undisbursed portion—some $170 million—of World bank loans, and had decided to complete the dam themselves.

Throughout the difficulties that the World bank had over the Narmada valley project, the Government—and our representative, on instructions from the Government —were extremely critical of the bank's performance in this regard, and whatever assertions the hon. Gentleman has made otherwise are simply untrue. As for the voting arrangements and the allegations that the hon. Gentleman has made, no vote was taken in October 1992, when the board considered the way ahead on the project. As I have said to the hon. Gentleman before, the board often works by consensus. A majority of directors supported the continuation of World bank funding, subject to the meeting of certain benchmarks by the Indians over a six-month period.

We were concerned with the welfare of those affected by the project to which the hon. Gentleman has referred, but we judged that the best chances of a successful resolution of the resettlement and environmental projects associated with the programme depended on the World bank's continuing involvement with the project. That has not happened. That is why we decided to give the project one last chance—but there was no vote.

I have touched upon some of the important points that have been made by Opposition Members. I welcome these debates. I should be happy to have further debates about World bank projects that are causing concern. The World bank has had difficulties over many large projects for a number of years. Those difficulties are due to the world recession and concern about their impact on the environment. The concern has grown in recent years. It was not so great when these projects were put in hand.

The World bank is aware of the criticism. It is taking action and has set up inquiries to examine it. The World bank is also responding to the criticism, a point that was made by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale.

I ask the House to support the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft International Development Association (Tenth Replenishment) Order 1993, which was laid before this House on 21st June, be approved.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

PARALYTIC SHELLFISH POISONING

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning) (No. 5) Order 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 1515), dated 15th June 1993, a copy of which was laid before this House on 17th June, be approved.—[Mr. Conway.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning) (No. 6) Order 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 1523), dated 18th June 1993, a copy of which was laid before this House on 21st June, be approved.—[Mr. Conway.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning) (No. 7) Order 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 1606), dated 23rd June 1993, a copy of which was laid before this House on 25th June, be approved.—[Mr. Conway.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees).

AIR TRANSPORT

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 4146/93, relating to air transport relations with third countries; supports the Government's aim of developing satisfactory procedural arrangements on the basis of which negotiations between the Member States and third countries could be conducted; and also agrees with the Government that any such negotiations should require separate Council authorisation, which should be given only where action would be plainly better taken at Community rather than Member State level.—[Mr. Conway.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees).

FRONTIER CONTROLS

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 4077/92, 4527/92, 6497/92, 7632/92 + COR1 and 8679/92, relating to the abolition of frontier controls and the completion of the internal market; welcomes the benefits to business and consumers of the freer flow of goods across the internal frontiers with other Member States of the European Community from 1st January 1993; and endorses the need for immigration controls to be maintained on non-EC nationals at United Kingdom frontiers together with such checks as are necessary to combat terrorism, drug trafficking or other serious crime.—[Mr. Conway.]

Question agreed to.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Ordered,

That Mr. Patrick Nicholls be discharged from the Social Security Committee and Mr. Peter Thurnham be added to the Committee.—[Sir Fergus Montgomery, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

Flint Bypass

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Conway.]

12.32 am

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): The subject of this debate is of great interest and importance to my constituents, especially to those people who live, as I do, in the town of Flint or who travel through Flint, for work or leisure reasons. Especially at this time of the year, holidaymakers travel through Flint in their thousands.

As with all Adjournment debates, I wish that the issue had not reached this stage. Unfortunately, it has done so, due to a variety of factors that have conspired to ensure that Flint's travel problem remains unsolved. The need for a bypass in Flint has long been recognised. When I was first selected as the Labour parliamentary candidate for Delyn about seven years ago, many people believed that the issue was about to be resolved by the implementation of a coastal route. It may help if I outline how we have arrived at this position and the need for the debate.

Although this is not directly a Welsh Office scheme, the Welsh Office has had a major influence on events so far. Flint, in the south of my constituency, is a pivotal town on the coastal road into north Wales. The A548 which passes through the town carries, according to current estimates for a 12-hour day, 10,000 vehicles between 7 am and 7 pm. A large amount of industrial and commercial traffic enters the town, bound for industrial areas to the north of Flint, the recently abolished enterprise zone area and towns along the coastal road in the far north of my constituency. Local traffic is also heavy. At the peak of the tourist season, as now, there is a great deal of additional traffic, which causes chaos for local people at weekends.

The need for a bypass is accepted by all who have been involved with the town and its welfare. In response to demands for a bypass in 1985, a public consultation exercise was undertaken by the county council to obtain views on two possible routes for a bypass—an inland route and a coastal route. Local opinion was overwhelmingly in favour of the coastal route, but the opposite view was expressed by environmental groups, including Cadw—Welsh Historic Monuments—and the then Nature Conservancy Council. Following consultation, however, the coastal route for Flint was adopted by the county council as its preferred route and the scheme was prepared to the stage where planning permission could be applied for by the county council.

In June 1989, the then county surveyor and bridgemaster applied to the county council for deemed planning permission for the coastal route. The application included an environmental statement because of the effect that the scheme could have had on Flint castle and the Dee estuary, a site of special scientific interest and a special protection area under European legislation. Copies of the application and all representations were forwarded to the Welsh Office in accordance with the procedures.

The Secretary of State informed Clwyd county council that, because the issues raised in the objections were of more than a local nature, the county council should not determine the application and that it should be passed to him for determination. He subsequently decided to hold a public inquiry into the coastal route, which was held in March 1990. After consideration of the inspector's report, the Secretary of State informed the county council that he was refusing planning permission for the scheme on the ground of its environmental effect on Flint castle and the Dee estuary. In my view, the Flint castle objection by the Secretary of State was sadly misguided.

Flint castle is the hidden monument of north Wales. The town is very proud of it but, passing through the town on the A548, it is very difficult to see it. The coastal route would have opened the castle to a new travelling public who would have seen it in all its glory. It would not have damaged the castle. The environmental objections made at the time were valid, but they could be overcome especially when viewed with the alternative with which I shall deal in a moment.

The inspector's conclusion on the county council's coastal route option was that there was no reason to suppose that an alternative way of bypassing Flint could not be found. Clwyd county council then decided to look afresh at solutions to find a bypass for Flint and appointed consulting engineers to carry out a new feasibility study. The findings were that there was only one effective, feasible route remaining—the inland route, which was not dissimilar to that taken to consultation in 1985.

The new inland route was the subject of a further consultation exercise held in June last year to obtain the views of the general public and a wide range of other consultees. Due to strong local opinion against the route, and a demand to resurrect the coastal route, the council did not in the end adopt the new proposal of the inland route as its preferred route.

Shortly after my election to the House last year, feelings were running very high. The inland route proposed by the county council was met wih horror in most of Flint and in the neighbouring village of Bagillt. A genuine upsurge of public feeling against the inland route ensued, not orchestrated by any political party but reflected by all politicians at a local level.

The inland route would have passed near to many properties in encircling the town, cut through agricultural and residential land, sliced the local golf course in half, bordered a children's play area in the process and removed much of Flint's remaining open spaces, including the town's major recreation area and green space, Cornist park and hall which is owned by the borough council. In doing so, it would have failed in the key objective of reducing industrial traffic to the industrial areas of Flint and, in particular, Castle park industrial estate. Environmentally, the inland route would have devastated Flint.

I was besieged by letters 10:1 against the inland route and by petitions; concern was expressed at my surgeries and an action group was formed called FAIR, Flint Against the Inland Route. The Member of the European Parliament, Joe Wilson, Flint town council, Flint borough council members and two county councillors, Alf Jones and Alec Aldridge, made their opposition very clear to the town and the public at large. I am pleased to see that councillor John Hughes, a member of Flint town council, has travelled to London to witness this debate.

The county council's consultation exercise was clear: an inland route was unacceptable to Flint and its people and a public meeting organised by the town council highlighted the opposition which I fully share. Clwyd county council wrote to the Minister of State, Welsh Office asking for a meeting to discuss the issues involved because both the coastal route and the inland route were unacceptable and traffic was still building up.

That request for a meeting was refused on the valid ground that the Minister might in future be required to make a decision on subsequent planning application and he could not prejudice his position. Subsequent requests to the Minister from me for a meeting with the county council were refused in similar terms. I understand that the Minister's split role in Wales, as the Minister responsible for roads and for planning, creates difficulties, but that has not helped matters to progress. However, I fully understand and accept the Minister's difficult position in those circumstances.

Since the consultation exercise took place, further developments have occurred. The Welsh Office and Clwyd county council have given the go-ahead for a third Dee crossing that will bring more traffic to Flint. The proposed crossing will reach Wales some two miles south of Flint, with the resulting predicted traffic flow in Flint rising from 14,000 vehicles a day to 24,000, according to local county council estimates. It is estimated that 12 per cent. of that traffic will be new traffic as opposed to diverted traffic.

The construction of the third Dee crossing will also result in some redistribution of traffic within Flint town centre and in respect of its routing either via the A5119 to Northop and on to the A55 or the A548 towards Oakenholt. My hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and I fully support the idea of the Dee crossing, but it must be accepted that it will cause additional traffic to come into Flint in my constituency. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside welcomes the proposal which will relieve traffic in his constituency, it will cause problems for my constituency. However, we are at one on the issue.

The problem in a nutshell is that there are two possible routes for a bypass through Flint. One of those routes is wanted by the people of Flint, but that route has been refused following a decision by the Secretary of State. The other route is very much opposed by the people of Flint while traffic continues to build up and there is likely to be more traffic in future.

From the 1990 public inquiry and the 1992 public consultation exercise, it is known that local opinion is strongly against an inland route and in favour of a coastal route while Cadw and all national and local environmental groups are strongly against a coastal route and have no objection to the inland route. As you will appreciate from that brief history, Madam Deputy Speaker, the solution to the problem will not be straightforward.

In essence, the dilemma is that, although almost everyone agrees that a bypass is needed, the public have forcefully rejected an inland route and a coastal route has been rejected by the Secretary of State on the powerful grounds of adverse environmental impact on an area of international importance in conservation terms. Faced with that, what are the solutions? In the wider context, we can all agree that it would be desirable to reduce the traffic entering Flint.

I should like to see less reliance on the car and the internal combustion engine. Major investment in British Rail to take passenger transport and freight on to the railways would be welcome. Similarly, more tourists should be carried by rail and it would be perfectly adequate for north Wales if that could be achieved. In addition, improvements in public transport to service Flint and the coastal towns would be welcome, as would other measures.

In the short term, despite all those issues that could and should be addressed by all involved in transport in Clwyd, there will still be a need for a bypass. I hope that the Minister will tonight address two key areas in particular that will help to break the current impasse.

I would welcome an honest opinion from the Minister, as the strategic Minister for roads in Wales, about his view of traffic in Flint, the implications of the Dee crossing for traffic in Flint and for the coast road and the merits of the routes that have been proposed to date. I hope that the Minister will agree that a bypass is needed. It would be a great help to my community if he would recognise that this evening.

Also, and more important, I hope that the Minister will address another issue. Does he agree that it would be helpful at highways and planning levels to have informal discussions about traffic on the A548 between officers of the Welsh Office and members and officers of Clwyd county council? We currently have an impasse—no coastal bypass, no inland bypass, and more traffic. I recognise the difficulties for the Minister with his split responsibilities, but I still hope that he will agree that open discussions with the county council on how to resolve an issue that everybody agrees exists would be in the best interests of all.

Is there a modification—for example, to the coastal route—that would be better received by the Welsh Office? Is there assistance that the Welsh Office could give to examine positive options for the bypass in other areas? After all, in his own constituency of Conwy, the Minister has seen miracles worked in respect of a bypass. The need for dialogue is vital. No one in the county council wants to follow the path of resubmission of a revised coastal route, only to face planning bog-down, further inquiries, further costs and a negative result—a costly path at public expense.

No one in the county council wants to proceed with an inland route that remains unacceptable to the people of Flint—the very people whom it is designed to assist—yet, without dialogue, impasse will continue to reign and the misery of traffic in Flint will worsen. I do not believe that the discussions that could take place would be prejudicial. In the light of the impasse, the Welsh Office surely has a duty to examine and assist in the strategic view of the bypass issue.

My firm view remains that a revised coastal route is achievable, that the environmental concerns of that route remain far less damaging than the inland option and that of no action. All that I ask is that, at the very least, the two parties that can most influence the situation, the Welsh Office and the county council, meet, talk and examine the options on a non-committal basis. As the Member of Parliament for Flint and a resident of Flint, I have called for this debate because it remains an issue that is for the well-being of my community. People in Flint need traffic peace. Industry in Flint needs sound infrastructure. Tourists visiting north Wales and travelling through Flint need trouble-free travel. Above all, the environment in Flint needs to be protected in a modern age.

It is not acceptable to my community to face the prospect of an increase in traffic in Flint to 24,000 cars a day in coming years. That is the worst of all options, and I would be failing in my duty as the Member of Parliament for the town if I did not bring it to the attention of the House this evening.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Sir Wyn Roberts): As the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson) is clearly aware, responsibility for the local road network within Delyn rests with Clwyd county council. The A548, which passes through Flint, is such a local road, and improvements are the responsibility of the county council. A number of improvements to the A548 have been undertaken, and others are planned to help to meet the needs of the area.

The statutory planning procedures, which involve wide consultation with the public, ensure that the impact of significant new road proposals are fully and publicly appraised where necessary. Those procedures apply as much to the proposed Flint bypass as to other major proposals.

Clwyd county council, as local highway authority, undertook a feasibility study in 1983 to assess possible routes to bypass Flint. Of the six routes originally chosen, four were rejected and two remained—an inland route and a coastal route.

In 1985, as the hon. Gentleman described, the county council carried out a public participation exercise on those two routes. Almost 800 people responded, and 79 per cent. of local residents wanted a bypass and 82 per cent. of the respondents wanted the coastal route. There was, however, strong opposition to both routes on environmental grounds.

The authority subsequently decided on the coastal route, and in 1989-90 the scheme was conditionally accepted by the Welsh Office for transport grant support to meet the preparation costs involved in developing the proposal.

The design of the scheme and the resolution of statutory requirements were always matters for Clwyd county council. In keeping with normal procedures, it sought to obtain planning permission for the road, using powers under regulation 4 of the Town and Country Planning General Regulations 1976—under which the county council was empowered, subject to certain conditions, to grant, by making two resolutions, planning permission for developments that it proposed to undertake itself.

The proposed development attracted significant objections. Organisations such as the Countryside Commission, the Nature Conservancy Council, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, the Cambrian Archaeological Association, the Clwyd-Powys Archeological Trust and the Deeside Naturalists Society were concerned about the potential environmental impact.

There were requests for the Secretary of State to call in the planning application for his own determination, and they were given the most careful consideration. The Secretary of State's long-established approach is that applications should be called in for him to determine only when they raise planning matters of more than local importance. That approach recognises that matters of day-to-day importance should properly be resolved by elected local authority members accountable to the communities that they serve.

[Sir Wyn Roberts]

Only in particular circumstances, when matters of more than local significance are raised, will there be justification for taking matters out of local hands. In the case of Flint bypass, the then Secretary of State concluded that there were sufficient grounds for intervention. As a consequence, the county council was required in effect to make application to the Secretary of State for planning permission to construct the bypass on the coastal route.

Two main areas of concern underlay that decision. One related to the possible effect on Flint castle. The castle and town was the first to be planted in north Wales by Edward I, and there was concern that the bypass might have an adverse effect on both the castle and its environs —particularly in terms of the area's appearance, in forming a physical barrier between the town, the castle and the sea.

The other concern was that the route proposed by Clwyd county council encroached on a site of special scientific interest and bird habitats of international and national importance. There was concern that the road would destroy part of those protected areas and could disturb bird life over a wider area because of the noise and movement likely to be generated.

In the light of those wider concerns, the proposed development was called in by the then Secretary of State on 16 August 1989 and arrangements were made for a public local inquiry, which began on 6 March 1990. It considered the likely effect of the coastal bypass route on Flint castle and on conservation, and in relation to national and local planning policies, and the likely environmental impact on the immediate and surrounding areas.

Following a full inquiry and receipt of the inspector's report, the then Secretary of State gave careful consideration to the proposal and issued his decision letter on 17 September 1990. He accepted the inspector's conclusion that there was need for a bypass for Flint on traffic and economic grounds, and that the proposed coastal route would be an extremely intrusive and incongruous element in the landscape of the Dee estuary which no ameliorating measures could render visually acceptable. Further, it was acknowledged that the proposed bypass would cause unacceptable harm to the Dee estuary's natural habitat which would not be rendered acceptable by the proposed measures.

During the inquiry, evidence was presented on the planning merits of the alternative inland route. The Secretary of State concluded that examination of that alternative route was a material consideration in the application. He did not consider that his role was to make a choice between the routes, but confined his consideration to whether the need for the development could be met elsewhere.

The detailed appraisal of the two routes, and of any other alternatives that may become available, is a matter for the county council following appropriate consultation. However the Secretary of State was not satisfied that it had been clearly demonstrated that there was no alternative route. He agreed with the inspector that, on the basis of the evidence provided to the inquiry, there was no reason to suppose that the coastal route was the only way to provide a bypass for Flint. Therefore, the requirement to build it on this route was not demonstrated. In the absence of convincing evidence ruling out alternative routes, the Secretary of State concluded that the proposed route was unacceptable because of its effects on Flint castle and its setting, the landscape quality of the Dee estuary and the unacceptable harm to the natural habitats of the estuary. Having issued his decision, the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State in the matter ended. The provision of the bypass and consideration of the route it must take remain the responsibility of Clwyd county council as the local highway authority.

I fully understand and appreciate the arguments already put forward by the hon. Gentleman and others for a bypass for Flint. Indeed, the Welsh Office accepted those arguments when it conditionally accepted the proposed bypass for transport grant as long ago as 1989-90. That said, the responsibility for taking forward plans to provide the road must rest with Clwyd county council as the local highway authority. The county council must reconsider how best to proceed using the established procedures.

The county council may decide to proceed to seek planning permission for the inland route on which it consulted the local community in 1992. It may also, of course, decide to re-examine possibilities for providing a route along the coast. Clearly, whichever option is chosen, the county council will need to consider local opinion fully and to consult bodies with particular environmental interests. Whether it decides to proceed with one or two route options, the resulting planning applications will be referred to the Secretary of State so that consideration can be given to whether call-in would be appropriate. I must again stress that any consideration of call-in would be made on the basis of whether the proposed development raised planning matters of more than local significance. I cannot prejudge whether an application will be called in.

The hon. Gentleman asked for a meeting between officials of Clwyd county council and the Welsh Office to consider the way forward. The Secretary of State has well-defined responsibilities, which have already been used, to call in and determine the county council's earlier planning application for a bypass following a coastal route. The Department would, of course, be ready to advise on procedural matters. Should the council be unsure about how it might proceed, I suggest that it writes to me setting out the procedural issues on which it requires guidance.

But I must emphasise that the Department's involvement is inevitably restricted by the need to avoid prejudicing my right hon. Friend's statutory position. It will not be possible for Welsh Office Ministers or officials to advise on the merits of individual schemes.

There is continued strong support for the need to bypass Flint so as to improve the living conditions of its residents, to ease congestion on the A548 and to contribute to the environmental and economic improvements taking place in north-east Wales. Given this, it should be possible for the county council to work with Delyn borough council, the local community, agencies and interested groups to agree a way forward which would result in the early implementation of the scheme. The hon. Member rightly raised the issue of increased traffic problems in Flint that might arise following completion of the third Dee crossing. The county council is aware of the potential problems and while it sees a bypass of Flint as the long-term solution, it does, I understand, believe that any increase in traffic through Flint, following the opening of the crossing, can be dealt with by traffic management measures.

The Dee crossing and Flint bypass can each be justified in its own right. The previous Secretary of State was pleased to announce last year that resources will be made available to start the crossing in 1994-95; delaying that until a solution has been found to the Flint bypass would prolong unnecessarily congestion in Shotton and Connah's Quay, and the problems of access to the Deeside industrial park.

The hon. Member has raised an important issue, relevant both to his constituents and to the wider public. An efficient road network is vital to our economic welfare. It contributes to prosperity at both national and local levels. The hon. Member is fortunate to represent a constituency in a part of Wales that has seen substantial improvements in the road network. The A55, a trunk road for which the Welsh Office is responsible, provides a high quality link to the British and European motorway networks, a link to markets and to prosperity. I am sure we shall see further developments in future years.

I must stress once again to the hon. Gentleman that the planning for the Flint bypass is a matter, in the first instance, for the county authority. If there are procedural difficulties, I am only too anxious to help. However, I cannot assist the council in the choice of route to put forward.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION

University Places

1. Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he plans to meet the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to discuss the places available in universities for students leaving school in the current year with appropriate A-level qualifications.

4. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what discussions he has had with principals and vice-chancellors about the funding of universities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Further and Higher Education (Mr. Tim Boswell): I am sorry that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education is unable to be on the Front Bench for oral questions this afternoon.

We meet the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals from time to time to discuss a range of matters affecting universities. My right hon. Friend and I intend to meet members of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals later this month.

Mr. Wicks: Has the Minister noted the concern of the universities and university authorities that, this year, some well-qualified young people with good A-level grades will not be able to go to university? If that assumption is true —I ask him to confirm or reject it—what message does that give to young people who have worked hard but cannot get into university? What message does it give to young people when we need well-trained and well-educated youngsters?

Mr. Boswell: The first message that I would give young people is to remind them that student numbers, on a full-time equivalent basis, have expanded by 46 per cent. during the past four years. We have more students and a higher proportion of our young people in higher education than ever before. There is some consolidation at present, which is an opportunity for universities to catch breath after rapid expansion and to assert the importance of the full quality of entry standards, to which we attach considerable importance.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Will the Minister confirm that the Higher Education Funding Council is encouraging universities not to take arts students this year, and that it is spending up to £3·5 million encouraging them not to do so, as a kind of academic set-aside? What does that say for the Government's policy towards broad education across a range of subjects?

Is this not the first time in the United Kingdom that a Government have decided to restrict the number of students taking courses, and to channel students away from a broad range of courses—including arts, which are very valuable—into more technical subjects?

Mr. Boswell: It is difficult to please everyone on such subjects, but I remind the hon. Gentleman that the changes in tuition fees earlier this year referred to expansion at the margin beyond the funded number of places. There is no question of prohibiting people from going for arts or humanities subjects—far from it. There is a higher level of participation in those subjects than ever before. If the funding council, which has discretion in the matter, decides to set aside a proportion of money to meet the particular problems of institutions that have expanded so quickly, that is its decision, but I think that it is a prudent one.

Mr. John Marshall: When my hon. Friend meets the principals and vice-chancellors, will he pay a particular tribute to the work of the former polytechnics, such as Middlesex university in my constituency? Will he also draw attention to the fact that, three years ago, those people who are complaining about a shortage of places said that the introduction of student loans would result in a reduction in the numbers of people going to university?

Mr. Boswell: I shall, as ever, do both those things.

Mr. James Hill: When my hon. Friend visits Southampton, he will be able to recall some of the whingeing words of Opposition Members when he sees the college of higher education, La Sainte Unione and the university of Southampton moving ahead with increased numbers of students, and expanding on other sites.

Mr. Boswell: I cannot wait to receive an invitation from my hon. Friend, and I will do my best to respond to it positively as soon as possible.

Mr. Beggs: When the Minister meets the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, will he discuss the dramatic increase in student numbers but the absence of corresponding increases in the numbers of lecturers, and lecturers' concern that there could be a slump in standards?

Mr. Boswell: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. It is certainly the case that numbers of students have expanded faster than the number of lecturers. It varies from place to place and situation to situation and, in some respect, it can be interpreted as productivity.

Mr. Devlin: Will my hon. Friend telephone the Secretary of State this afternoon and wish him a speedy return to good health, and remind him that it is a source of great pride among Conservative Members that this country spends a higher proportion of its gross domestic product on higher education than either Germany or Japan, righting a long-term situation that has needed correction for some time?

Mr. Boswell: I am sure that the wise remarks of my hon. Friend will help speed up the return to good health of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Rooker: Will the Minister make an early response to the letter that he has received from the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals asking for an extension to the consultation process about the funding of student unions to 1 November following the statement made on 1 July?

The Minister was careful to talk about full-time equivalent places when he answered my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks). Is it right to fund some universities for not filling full-time places and, at the same time, refuse to assist the University of Central England in Birmingham, which is undergoing a vast expansion of part-time places for which there are no taxpayers' contribution to fees or mandatory grants and is funding them free for students who happen to be unemployed? Will he do something about the unfair mismatch of the funding regulations between full-time and part-time university students?

Mr. Boswell: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, I can assure him that the letter we received this morning will be carefully considered, and we will respond to it as soon as possible.

The hon. Gentleman has made clear in the past the views expressed in his second point. We have no proposals for the complete restructuring of the system of academic support at present. We recognise that we have greatly expanded the numbers in higher education, significantly in the new universities, including the ones to which the hon. Gentleman referred, as well as the older universities.

We have also quickly expanded, and are continuing to expand, further education. It is always possible to make suggestions, and they will be considered. We believe that we are delivering the goods in the structure that we have in place.

Teacher Testing

2. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to test teachers.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools (Mr. Eric Forth): Under the appraisals regulations 1991, all teachers in maintained schools must be subject to an appraisal of their performance by 1995.

Mr. Evans: Does the Minister agree that teachers should be given a simple test to tell us the difference between the Labour party conference, the Trades Union Congress and the National Union of Teachers conference? They are all a lot of hooligans who jump up and down and sulk when they are asked to do any work. Is the Minister aware that a certain hon. Member who has driven us mad over the years has been learning to drive this morning? Would not it be a good idea if that whole lot over there, and some of the teachers had L plates round their necks?

Mr. Forth: I welcome my hon. Friend's sound endorsement of the principle of teacher appraisal. It must be right that teachers undergo a form of appraisal in a properly structured and agreed form, but I am not sure whether that includes the questions that my hon. Friend suggested. Appraisals should be carried out to assure the highest quality of teaching, by identifying the full potential of teachers and meeting their training, retraining and support needs. That is the objective.

Mr. Steinberg: In response to that predictably silly outburst from the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), does the Minister agree that the hon. Gentleman would have great difficulty in passing the present standard assessment tasks, and does he also agree that the vast majority of today's teachers are far better skilled than they were in the days when the hon. Gentleman went to school?

Now that the opinions of teachers on testing have been vindicated, would the Minister please listen to the teachers during consultation over the new arrangements for primary school teachers?

Mr. Forth: It is certainly the case that properly structured and developed appraisal of teachers must be a major contribution to the quality of our education. It is a matter of some regret that a union that is not totally unconnected with the hon. Gentleman is persisting in opposing the principle of teacher appraisal. I know not why it is doing so—it is for the union to explain—but the rest of us are entitled to be a little suspicious.

Dr. Twinn: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments about teacher appraisal. To enable teachers to pass his appraisal system, will he place further emphasis during teacher training on more practical classroom skills and more subject-based knowledge?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend has unerringly put his finger on one of the main thrusts of the Secretary of State's proposals. Of course it must be right that all training of teachers must lay the maximum emphasis on practical classroom skills, so that we do not rely entirely on paper qualifications, important though they may be, but identify the ability of teachers to educate in the classroom. That would emanate from my hon. Friend's sensible suggestions.

Mr. Don Foster: Following the recent revelations about masonic lodges linked to schools in Conservative-controlled Buckinghamshire, does the Minister think that teachers and governors should be tested on their membership of secret societies?

Mr. Forth: Given that we are sitting in a Chamber which probably contains more secret and semi-secret societies than any other, I should be careful before embarking on throwing stones from this glass house.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: In connection with teacher training and assessment, does my hon. Friend agree that schools should be given more time and a greater role in planning and assessing such courses? Does he agree that, in that connection, there should be less stress on educational and sociological theory and more stress, as my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) said, on subject knowledge, classroom skills and, in particular, classroom discipline?

Mr. Forth: Indeed. My hon. Friend shows yet again his enormous experience in this area, to which I defer. It must be right that the balance between theoretical and academic training, which must always have its place, and practical hands-on experience in the classroom is constantly reassessed. I am sure that my hon. Friend will fully support the recommendations and proposals that my right hon.

Friend the Secretary of State has made recently, which we are now developing very much in the direction suggested by my hon. Friend.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: As the Minister has acknowledged that the quality of teachers is important, why are the Government proposing to dilute the professionalism of teachers by the introduction of a semi-trained mums' army? Although we all want mature entrants into teaching, surely it is important that those who are entrusted with our children's education are highly educated and well trained. Why are Ministers gambling with our children's future by more crackpot experiments?

Mr. Forth: I approach this in sorrow rather than anger. It is sad that the hon. Lady should assume that the possession of a paper qualification automatically gives someone skills in classroom teaching and, worse, that she should suggest that people who do not possess academic qualifications, such as graduate skills, are in some way less than good in the classroom.

The reality is that 50 per cent. of teachers are graduates. Is the hon. Lady suggesting that half of all teachers are incompetent and unable to operate successfully in the classroom? Our proposals are that intelligent and mature people with two A-levels and considerable experience with children should surely be the sort of people that we want to encourage to come into our classrooms and deal with our young people—rather than relying entirely on, let us say, a 21-year-old with a narrow degree subject, who the hon. Lady seems to suggest would be better qualified.

National Curriculum and Testing

3. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what representations he has received about his review of the national curriculum and testing.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education (Mr. Robin Squire): Sir Ron Dearing, who is conducting the review, has held a series of regional conferences for head teachers and has consulted widely among teachers' organisations and other interested bodies. The Government expect his first report later this month, which will take into account all views expressed.

Mr. Lidington: Does my hon. Friend accept that many responsible and moderate members of the teaching profession, while welcoming the principle of the national curriculum and testing, have expressed legitimate concern about the bureaucracy associated with their implementation? Will he assure the House that not only Sir Ron Dearing but Ministers will listen to constructive criticism and comments from the profession, with a view to improving that state of affairs?

Mr. Squire: I hope that hon. Members of all parties will endorse the wise words of my hon. Friend. Sir Ron Dearing is setting out to tackle the major criticisms that have been expressed by teachers and their unions. I am confident that he will produce a report around which the majority of our teachers can unite to restore order and proper teaching in our schools.

Mr. Hardy: The Minister's noble Friend Baroness Blatch wrote to me the other day in reply to a letter from an able and respected headmaster in my constituency who had submitted a detailed assessment of the Government's approach to testing. The noble Lady said that "some" of my constituent's comments were unfounded. Would the Minister ask his noble Friend to publish her comments about those criticisms that she accepted?

Mr. Squire: The House will recognise that I have a small problem in trying to answer a question that refers to a letter which I have not seen. The Government will publish their response to the Dearing review as soon as possible after that review, and I would expect that that response will cover the type of issue to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr. Pawsey: Does my hon. Friend accept that the overwhelming majority of the nation's parents believe that the national curriculum and testing are essential for good education? Does he further accept that the majority of Conservative Members welcome the setting up of the Dearing review, look forward to its findings, and hope that those findings will be accepted by the teaching profession and implemented without any further problems?

Mr. Squire: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments, and I echo them. Testing and the national curriculum have raised standards in schools—[Laughter.] I hear laughter from Opposition Members. That is strange and sad. Testing and the national curriculum have raised standards, and the majority of teachers share the Government's wish that standards continue to be improved.

EC Students

5. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Education whether he will make a statement on arrangements for EC students pursuing third level courses in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Boswell: United Kingdolm higher education institutions have a strong tradition of internationalism and openness. Their popularity with students from other countries is a welcome indicator of the quality of the education they offer. EC action programmes have provided an added impetus. We fully meet our EC obligations to provide equal rights of access to higher education. Eligible students from other member states studying here may receive an award to cover the cost of their course fees to a specified maximum. Reciprocal rights apply to United Kingdom students studying elsewhere in the EC.

Mr. Trimble: Have the number of students involved, and the expense, increased substantially in the past few years? I understand that the cost of the awards that the Minister mentioned was over £41 million last year, and the cost to the education system may have been somewhat higher. Does the Minister agree that the burden does not fall equally throughout the country but on certain regions? Will steps be taken to compensate those regions for the burden that they have to bear, and will he make other provisions for students from those regions who consequently find it more difficult to get a place?

Mr. Boswell: There is undoubtedly a cost in grants of the order the hon. Gentleman suggests, although it is a gross cost. Against that must be set the large income received from overseas countries as a result of overseas students coming here. That amount has been estimated at £1·5 billion.

The regional implications depend on the admissions policies of the institutions in question and on the policies of the various funding councils and their equivalent in Northern Ireland. I will draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to their attention.

Further Education Funding

6. Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will review the distinction between local education authority budgets and further education funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boswell: The Government will keep under review the spending needs of local education authorities and of the Further Education Funding Council in the light of their respective statutory responsibilities.

Mr. Tyler: Does the Minister accept that, since 1979, funding per student has been reduced by 22 per cent., according to Library figures? In those circumstances, does he accept that community colleges that are caught between the two stools of further education funding and local authorities' restricted budgets face a budgetary crisis?

Mr. Boswell: I should prefer to study the hon. Gentleman's figures at leisure—and I will do so. I am surprised that he did not acknowledge the huge expansion that we are carrying out in further education, to increase the number of students participating by 25 per cent. over the next three years, and to provide in the coming year £750 per full-time student place in further education.

The hon. Gentleman's point about the interface between further education and local authority provision is made from time to time. This is the first year and, broadly speaking, it has gone well. There have been one or two problems, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no black hole of funding and no reduction in the responsibilities of the parties involved.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Given the huge planned increase in the numbers in further education during the next few years, is my hon. Friend aware of the great welcome that the principals of further education colleges have given to their greater freedom, from April of this year, to manage their own affairs? Will he ensure that the Educational Assets Board gives further education insitutions enough control over their assets, especially when there are disputes between further education colleges and district councils —there was such a case in Kidderminster in my constituency—to ensure that they can fulfil their responsibilities?

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend is right: there has been a positive response in general to the changes that we have made in the structure of the further education sector and to the indpendence that we have given to the various corporations. My hon. Friend will not expect me to comment on cases involving the Educational Assets Board, which is responsible for dividing assets, but I will draw his remarks to its attention.

Discretionary Student Grants

7. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he has any plans to alter arrangements for the award of discretionary student grants.

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend keeps the administration of student awards under periodic review. Any plans for changes in this field would be announced at the appropriate time.

Mr. Hain: Will the Minister agree to ring-fence funding for discretionary student awards? I and other hon. Members know of many students who cannot study medicine, law, music or other courses that they want to follow. It is crazy for society to deny them the opportunity to acquire those extra skills. I warn the Minister "Don't dare blame local education authorities, after the Government have savaged their budgets in recent year."

Mr. Boswell: I cannot accept what the hon. Gentleman says for a moment—but, then, I usually cannot. The fact is that we continue to fund local education authorities for their responsibilities to schools and to all other aspects of education. We will continue so to do.

At the moment, we are looking at a pattern of anecdote, rumour and innuendo about the withdrawal of certain services. For the short term, there is no point in giving local authorities discretion and then trying to take it away from them by fettering that discretion. In the slightly more medium term, and in view of the concern that has been expressed, we have joined with the Gulbenkian and Sir John Cass Foundations, asking them independently and throughly to review the current state of provision. If they have any messages for us, we will consider them carefully and quickly.

Mrs. Peacock: Is my hon. Friend aware that some Labour authorities, such as Kirklees, are refusing to give discretionary grants, so young students who have taken law degrees cannot then go on to law school or to the Council for Legal Education? They have degrees, but they cannot practise. What action can he take to help resolve that?

Mr. Boswell: The nature of discretionary grants is such that LEAs must use their discretion when choosing whether to award them. We continue to fund them—[Interruption.]—whatever the Opposition may bray. If they want the figures, I can give them to them. If a local authority decides that it is not going to give any awards at all, that would be tantamount to a withdrawal of discretion, and would indeed be a serious matter. If my hon. Friend has evidence to that effect, I shall be pleased to consider it.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Is not it staggering that the Minister claims that he has the figures, yet he accuses my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) of anecdotes, rumour and innuendo, while his colleagues tell him that discretionary awards have, in effect, been abolished by local authorities? We are talking not simply about Labour authorities but about authorities up and down the country, and the Minister should know that that is the case. He should not come to the House and claim ignorance.

Let me ask the Minister a specific question. What will he do about those authorities? They tell me that cuts in Government money mean that they have to cut discretionary grants. No discretionary grants means no opportunity. The responsibility lies with the Minister. What will he do about it?

Mr. Boswell: The hon. Gentleman can start by being a bit less arrogant about the Gulbenkian report unless or until he has seen it. What on earth is the point of commissioning the report or paying part of its costs if we are not prepared to consider what it says and take a view in the light of its findings? The hon. Gentleman said that authorities are cutting back. I happen to know—this reflects the change of political control, although the decision was taken before—that my local authority has expanded its provision in discretionary awards. That is an anecdote.

As the hon. Gentleman would like to have the figures, I can tell him that we have increased total expenditure to local authorities by 2·6 per cent. this year for education. That is above the increase in pupil numbers. Taking into account the level of pay settlements, which is required under current policy, that should be sufficient to continue to fund discretionary awards. If local authorities choose not to do that, it is their choice. It is not a decision which we have either imposed on them or encouraged them to take.

Examinations

8. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what research has been undertaken by his Department into the relationship between examinations and scholarly attainment.

Mr. Robin Squire: None, but I share the widespread view that performance in examinations provides both a measure of current achievement and an indicator of future potential.

Mr. French: Does my hon. Friend find it surprising that the loudest complaints about exams often come from those people who do not have to take them but who profess their interest in educational standards? Does he accept that examinations are not only a measurement, as he just indicated, but provide a useful spur to performance at all ages and are an essential component of any good education system?

Mr. Squire: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his contribution. It is a little strange that all the evidence that we have shows that, far from complaining, school children have enjoyed taking the standard assessment tasks and that school attendance has risen on the days when tests are set. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the spur that tests and examinations provide. They give children a sense of purpose and achievement, which undoubtedly helps to raise standards in our schools.

Mr. Bryan Davies: The Minister has access to voluminous research that establishes that A-levels are a terrible predictor of subsequent degree performance. Why are they used to ration entry to higher education?

Mr. Squire: A study by Smithers and Robinson in 1989 showed a correlation between success in A-levels and degree performance. I am pleased that it also showed that mature students who lack A-level qualifications can perform as well as A-level entrants.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that the conduct and marking of SATs should now be passed to examination boards, which perform professionally in that area? That would take the SATs away from being a burden on teachers to mark and take the setting of those important tests away from the bureaucracy which has been dealing with them so far.

Mr. Squire: I have listened carefully to my hon. Friend's suggestion. He will know that Sir Ron Dearing is addressing that issue within his overall review. It would be wrong for me to anticipate that. I look forward, as I am sure my hon. Friend does, to seeing Sir Ron's comments on that aspect.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Can the Minister tell the House who in the Government will be responsible for this year's response to the GCSE examination results? Does the Minister recall last year's fiasco when the junior Minister praised the GCSE results and, a few days later, the Secretary of State rubbished them and the efforts of those who had taken the exams? Will the Minister assure the House that Ministers will not undermine the achievement of those who have taken GCSEs this year and that credit will be given where it is due—to the teachers and children who have worked so hard? Will he guarantee that Ministers will not rubbish those results this year?

Mr. Squire: I am advised by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools that the hon. Lady has entirely misunderstood what he said. Of course we welcome the improvement in GCSE results which has been seen recently. We look forward very much to those upward trends continuing and we will, of course, expect teachers to have carried out their responsibilities in that respect. I look forward to the hon. Lady joining the Government in seeing ever-higher standards achieved in those examinations as well.

Sir Anthony Grant: If such research is carried out, will my hon. Friend look into a complaint that I have received from certain dons in Cambridge—that the award of first-class degrees is made far too easily these days? They tell me that many of the people at other universities who receive firsts are the sort of people who would not have obtained their matriculation in the old days.

Mr. Squire: Despite the fairly wide-ranging responsibilities that I carry, I must tell my hon. Friend that I do not carry that responsibility. However, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Further and Higher Education has heard my hon. Friend's interesting comments and I have a strange feeling that he will reflect on them in the immediate future.

English and Technical Studies Testing

9. Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the cost of external examiners for the current year's English and technical studies tests.

Mr. Robin Squire: External marking is not a requirement for the 1993 tests in English, technology or other subjects. My right hon. Friend has asked Sir Ron Dearing to consider the merits of this option for the tests for 11 and 14-year-olds in 1994 and subsequently.

Ms Gordon: My question was what has been the cost of the external examiners for this year's tests. Is the Minister aware that I have received letters from head teachers in Tower Hamlets saying that they did not have the equipment in place to cover the areas required for testing in technological studies and that they received the details so late that their money had already been committed for the financial year? Instead of wasting money on publicity campaigns and external examiners to force English tests down the throats of unwilling teachers, would not it have been better to spend that money providing the tools for teaching our children? Will the Minister and the Secretary of State now admit that they were wrong about the tests and stop attacking the teachers? Education Ministers come and go, but it is the teachers who are the mainstay of our education system.

Mr. Squire: The hon. Lady has justified her reputation as being part of the jurassic tendency in educational terms. In taking but one element of the hon. Lady's comments, the adult literacy and basic skills unit recently reported that one third of students entering further education colleges did not have an adequate command of English to take advantage of their courses. I hope that the hon. Lady will join me in regretting and deploring that fact and in looking forward to supporting the tests which will enable us to improve the standards of pupils of all ages.

Mr. Fabricant: Does my hon. Friend agree that external examination has shown itself to be an excellent way of ensuring that British universities maintain objective testing and standards throughout Europe? Does not he think it quite extraordinary that the Labour party consistently opposes everything that will improve testing, objectivity and a raising of standards in secondary schools?

Mr. Squire: I can only say to my hon. Friend, who is of course absolutely right, that I am not surprised. Time and again, when faced with a choice, the Labour party sides not with the consumer—in this case, the parents or pupils—but always with the producers. In this particular case, the Labour party is on a losing wicket and it will come to see that that is not helping to improve standards in our schools.

Standard Spending Assessment (Merseyside)

10. Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the standard spending assessment for education for each of the Merseyside metropolitan authorities for each of the last two years.

Mr. Forth: The figures for 1992-93 were as follows: Knowsley, £79 million; Liverpool, £215 million; St. Helens, £73 million; Sefton, £110 million; and Wirral, £136 million. For 1993-94 the figures will be: Knowsley, £71 million; Liverpool, £199 million; St. Helens, £62 million; Sefton, £96 million; and Wirral, £122 million.

Mr. Evans: I thank the Minister for that reply. Does he acknowledge that the figures he has just given show that school children in St. Helens get a very raw deal from the Government's SSAs? Will he explain to the parents of St. Helens—preferably in plain and simple English—why Liverpool and Knowsley are allocated £500,000 more to run a 1,000 pupil secondary school than the neighbouring borough of St. Helens?

Mr. Forth: Yes. Education SSAs are based mainly on pupil numbers. Recently, pupil numbers in St. Helens have been falling. That is one of the reasons. The other is that St. Helens comes out rather badly from the additional educational needs—AEN—index, which is part of the educational SSA mechanism. The good news for the hon. Gentleman and his constituents is that we are conducting a wide-ranging review of the methodology and mechanisms of SSAs and the AEN index. We will seek to update them and make them more relevant, fairer and more reflective of needs than in the past. I cannot predict what the outcome will be for St. Helens, or any other authority, but the hon. Gentleman and his constituents can be sure that, at the end of that process, all will be seen to be fair and even-handed.

Trainee Teachers

11. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to give trainee teachers more time in the classroom learning practical skills.

Mr. Forth: The tougher standards that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced last year for the training of secondary teachers will ensure that post-graduate students spend two thirds of their time in schools. Our recent proposals for reform of primary teacher training also involve a significant increase in the time to be spent in schools.

Mr. Mans: Does my hon. Friend agree that good teacher training should be a balance between education theory and practical skills? Does he further agree that, in the past, too much attention has been paid to education theory and that, in the future, more attention should be paid to practical skills, which are best learnt in the classroom?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend has put succinctly the philosophy underlying the proposals that my right hon. Friend made recently. Although they are out to consultation at the moment, I believe that, on mature reflection, most people will agree with my hon. Friend that the balance between academic training and classroom experience has probably not been correct in the past. That is something which we will seek to correct. I hope that all hon. Members and people outside the House who are interested will take the opportunity to reply during the consultations that we have recently initiated on this important subject.

Mr. Win Griffiths: In accepting that there must be a correct balance between the theory of learning processes and the actual practice of teaching, does the Minister agree that his Department's idea for a one-year course for adults who will teach children at the most critical stage of the learning process is totally inadequate? If the majority view of the consultation that he is undertaking is that one year is not enough, will he accept that professional opinion?

Mr. Forth: Of course we will look carefully, as ever, at the responses to the consultation paper. The reality is that, at the moment, many graduates enter teaching, following a one-year degree postgraduate certificate of education course, with a degree that may have no relevance to the primary curriculum. It is odd that the hon. Gentleman has leapt to that conclusion without properly considering the strength of the suggestions made by my right hon. Friend in the consultation paper. When the hysteria shown by Opposition Members has settled down, it will be shown, on reflection and consideration, that our proposals are sensible and practical and in the interests of teaching and education.

Standard Spending Assessments

12. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education whether he will give consideration to increasing the sparsity factor in future calculations of standard spending assessments.

Mr. Forth: The education elements of SSAs are currently under review. The review will extend to the sparsity allowance, but, at this stage, it is too soon to say what the outcome will be.

Mr. Gill: Will my hon. Friend acknowledge the importance of giving sufficient weight to the sparsity factor, adequately to reflect the fact that the economies of scale available in urban areas are simply not available to sparsely populated rural areas?

Mr. Forth: We have long recognised the sparsity allowance's relevance. My hon. Friend has been assiduous in ensuring that his county's interests have been fully represented in our consideration of that factor. As I said earlier, we are looking comprehensively at SSAs and the additional educational needs factors, including the sparsity allowance, to satisfy ourselves, education authorities, parents and pupils throughout the country that we fairly reflect the needs and balances of schools and authorities in the mechanisms for paying moneys and providing resources to them. Everybody in this Chamber will be happy with the result of our consideration, which we hope will be finalised and available in the autumn.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 13 July.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Evans: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Conservative Members are delighted to welcome him back from Tokyo and congratulate him on his success? Is not that in stark contrast to the lot opposite, who are horrified that their leader has just come back from Bournemouth? Did my right hon. Friend's father, at the height of his career as a trapeze artist, do as many somersaults as the Leader of the Opposition, the wriggler from Monklands, East?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome home. We did have a successful meeting in Tokyo and, from what I hear, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) had a rather less successful meeting in Bournemouth.

Mr. John Smith: Following the vote in the House last night in which the Prime Minister and his colleagues voted to impose value added tax on the heating bills of millions of pensioners and families, does not he think that he should now apologise to the British people for betraying the election pledges that he made during the last election?

The Prime Minister: I am surprised that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should raise that matter today. This week's edition of "Labour Party News" contains an article with the heading "Sending your comments to Chris Smith MP".

It asks:

"In what ways can economic policy be developed to encourage environmental protection?

You might consider: Taxation Policy (eg energy tax . . .)".

Mr. Smith: The Prime Minister clearly does not want to hear a reference to his VAT commitment. Let me remind him what he said in the "Conservative Campaign Guide" —[Interruption.] I know that Conservative Members do not want to hear it. The last thing that they want to hear about is the "Conservative Campaign Guide". It attacked the Labour party for what it called irresponsible scares about VAT and said:

"The Prime Minister has confirmed that the Government has no intention of raising VAT."

Why was that said in the election?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman clearly does not know his own policy and I offer him my copy of "Labour Party News". My comment was in response to Labour's charges that we intended to raise the standard rate to 22 per cent., which we were not intending.

Mr. Battle: You lied to them.

Madam Speaker: Order. I clearly heard the hon. Gentleman's unparliamentary language. Will he now withdraw it?

Mr. Battle: I understand that the expression is "economical with the truth", Madam Speaker.

The Prime Minister: That was a typically cheap withdrawal. Frankly, the Leader of the Opposition is not being remotely open about his position. Quite apart from this week's admission that the Labour party was considering VAT on fuel—and still is—in its policy review document, "Looking to the Future", the Labour party stated:

"Zero-rating should remain on fares, books, food and children's clothing."

It specifically excluded fuel. That fact, allied to the document from which I quoted earlier, constitutes the clearest illustration that that is Labour party policy.

Before the Liberal leader looks too smug, may I say that in his document "Costing the Earth" the Liberal Democrats advocated a tax on energy and, failing that, said:

"We would . . . press forward . . . by ending the anomalous zero rate of VAT on fuel."

Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will go back to Christchurch and tell them that.

Mr. John Smith: If the Prime Minister wants to wriggle out of the "Conservative Campaign Guide" commitment, let me remind him of what he said to the House on 28 January 1992. He said:

"There will be no VAT increase."—[Official Report, 28 January 1992; Vol. 202, c. 808]

Did the Prime Minister say that? Does he deny that he said it? Does he also deny that he has cynically betrayed an election pledge?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is embarrassed because he walked into an open hole. That quote of mine is clearly related to the 17 per cent. rate of VAT, which we have not changed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is well aware of that. He may wriggle and wriggle, but this week's edition of "Labour Party News' shows clearly what the Labour party policy was and is.

Q2. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 13 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that racial tolerance and compassion underlie the British character and that that is reflected in the natural desire of many childless couples to want to offer a good and loving home to children, regardless of race, colour or creed? Is not it time to end the shameful political correctness of some officials who seek to discourage that?

The Prime Minister: The Government's adoption policy will be guided by common sense and the interests of the child. There will be no house room for political correctness.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Prime Minister aware of the strong feeling in Wales about the need to give the Welsh language official status alongside the English language in Wales—a policy which is supported across party political boundaries? Is he aware that a monolingual French label on a wine bottle or similar product in Wales is official in Wales? A label in Greek only is valid in Wales, but a label in the Welsh language is not valid because the British Government do not recognise the Welsh language as an official language. Will the right hon. Gentleman try to change that policy at the Report stage of the Welsh Language Bill this week?

The Prime Minister: The Government's Welsh Language Bill represents an important addition to support and encouragement for the Welsh language in Wales. I know that the hon. Gentleman has canvassed and fought hard for the Bill and I know that he appreciated the fact that it was produced. We believe that Welsh already enjoys official status in Wales. A general declaration in the Bill would have no practical effect and would probably only increase legal uncertainty.

Mr. Milligan: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the reason that there is one member, one vote in the trade union movement was that the Government gave financial encouragement for postal ballots and actively helped democracy in the trade unions? Given that the campaign of the Leader of the Opposition to introduce one member, one vote in the Labour party will clearly either be fudged or abandoned, what measures will the Government—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must resume his seat for a moment. The Prime Minister is not responsible for Opposition policies. The hon. Gentleman must rephrase his question.

Mr. Milligan: I am grateful for your correction. I am asking what action the Government will take, similar to that taken to encourage democracy in the trade unions, to encourage democracy in the Labour party.

The Prime Minister: Democracy in the Labour party would be a welcome addition to our public life. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) appears to be prepared to fight the battle for one man, one vote. He also appears to be retreating from it.

Q3. Mrs. Roche: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 13 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Roche: Will the Prime Minister break his reputation for stubbornness and listen to the Social Security Advisory Committee when it says that the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel will have a disproportionate effect on the incomes of the poor?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Lady will know—we have stated it often enough in the House—we have made it clear that extra help will be provided in advance for people who are vulnerable, to meet the costs of VAT on fuel. That help will be in addition to the automatic increase in pensions and other benefits to reflect the impact of any increase in the retail prices index. I have made that clear repeatedly and so has my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security. Perhaps the hon. Lady would either care to listen to that statement now or read the innumerable occasions on which it has been made clear.

Mr. Day: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating British manufacturing industry on the figures published today on manufacturing output? Does he agree that that is a sign that Britain is moving into recovery and that, under his strong leadership, not only will Britain's economy improve but our party will emerge victorious at the end of this Parliament?

The Prime Minister: They were extremely good figures this morning. The increase in manufacturing output reported this morning is the largest monthly increase for four years. Clearly, that is good news and it bodes well for British manufacturing. But it is only one of a large number of signs that the economy is recovering—retail sales are up, car registrations are up, confidence is up and unemployment is down.

Q4. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 13 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Has the Prime Minister seen today's leader article in The Times which refers to the instability in Northern Ireland since the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement and the unease among Unionists? Does he accept that that instability has been increased by the Labour party's so-called discussion document, Dick Spring's revelations and the talks between emissaries of the British Government and the Provisional IRA? Will we now move from parrot calls for round table talks to restoring accountable democracy in Northern Ireland at all levels by direct action, rather than diplomatic dithering?

The Prime Minister: On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I share the views that he expressed about the Labour party's proposals for Northern Ireland. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland wrote to the Leader of the Opposition about this matter some time ago, but, so far as I am aware, he has not yet received a reply.

As for talks in the future, I hope that we shall be able to reach the outcome that the hon. Gentleman has in mind as a result of the resumption of talks. We hope that they will be able to resume speadily and, once they resume, we hope that they will be successful.

Bromsgrove

Q5. Mr. Thomason: To ask the Prime Minister if he will visit Bromsgrove.

The Prime Minister: I have no immediate plans to do so.

Mr. Thomason: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Rover cars, parts of which are made in the Bromsgrove constituency, which announced yesterday that it had increased sales world wide? Does he agree that its achievement bodes well and is a good advertisement for British quality, British workers and an expanding British economy?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to join my hon. Friend in congratulating Rover, which has increased its sales in Europe significantly. To have done that in the difficult trading conditions of Europe speaks volumes for its pricing and the quality of its products. Total car production has risen by about 11 per cent. and production of computers and related equipment is up by 8 per cent. There is no doubt that British industry is becoming more competitive and that British manufacturing industry in particular is beginning to penetrate new markets in quite a substantial way.

Dr. Lynne Jones: What would the Prime Minister say to the residents of Bromsgrove and nearby Birmingham who are sceptical about his claim that the imposition of VAT on fuel is an energy tax when that tax is also to be imposed on standing charges and there is no proposal to reinvest the revenue gained in energy conservation measures?

The Prime Minister: I would say what I said moments ago to the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) about the reimbursement that would be available.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Have you received a request for a statement to be made today about the funding of the west coast main line, a subject of enormous importance to many hon. Members?

Through the device of a written reply, a statement has been put out by the Government which fundamentally changes the nature of funding for major infrastructure projects in this country. It seems that the Government are no longer to have direct responsibility for such projects and that they are to become a sideline for Hambros bank. Such information should not be given in a written reply but should be the subject of a statement made to the House.

Madam Speaker: I have not been told that any Minister wishes to make a statement today.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As you will be aware, the foundation treaty of this Parliament is the Act of Union 1707. That Act contains a number of provisions, including article 21, which protects the rights and privileges of Scottish local government.

While it is true that local government in Scotland has changed a number of times since 1707, such change has always come about by way of consensus or royal commission. Indeed, on the last occasion, in 1972-73, there was no division on either Second Reading or Third Reading of the relevant measure and the vast majority of Scottish hon. Members supported the generality of the proposals. It is unprecedented for Scottish local government to be gerrymandered, using the backing of English votes in the House of Commons.

My point of order for you, Madam Speaker—perhaps you will wish to take time to consider it—is whether the process on which, it seems, we are about to engage is consistent with the Act of Union. It is true that some of us have less confidence than have others in that Act, but only last year the Prime Minister considered the matter important enough to describe it as an issue which transcended the general election campaign.

Perhaps you will consider the matter, Madam Speaker, and give your opinion before tomorrow, when we embark on what I suspect will be the first of many debates and votes in the House on the issue of Scottish local government and the attempt of the Secretary of State for Scotland to gerrymander it for his own purposes.

Madam Speaker: I have listened carefully to the hon. Member's remarks on what seems to be a complex matter. I shall give a considered response in the most appropriate way in due course.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): On a point of order, Madam Speaker; I seek your help. Perhaps you will disclose whether the Home Secretary has asked for permission to make a statement about Sunday trading.

I appreciate from information that I have received that a paper will be published today and that it will be available to hon. Members at 3.30. As the subject is so emotive, and in view of the fact that we have debated it in the House continually since 1986—I took a long time preparing a private Member's Bill which was debated this year—I should have thought that the Home Secretary, in view of all the promises that were made by his predecessors, would at least have afforded the House an opportunity to debate the subject by way of questions following a statement before issuing four options, the details of which he has never disclosed to the House in any way, shape or form in the past 12 months.

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Member and the House that it is not for me to allow Ministers to make statements. Ministers tell me when they wish to make statements, and no Minister has told me of his or her desire to make a statement today.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Before the time of Mr. Speaker Weatherill—certainly in the days of Sir Harry Hylton-Foster, and probably before that—your predecessors were doubtless irritated by requests under what was then Standing Order No. 9. However irritated they became, however, they did not refuse to hear applications relating to serious subjects.

I do not wish to be impertinent, Madam Speaker, but some of the most experienced of us were wondering on what authority in "Erskine May" a Speaker can refuse to hear an application under what is now Standing Order No. 20. I think that it is probably a habit introduced by Mr. Speaker Weatherill.

It can hardly be denied that what Mr. Rolf Ekens is doing in Baghdad is a matter of importance; it is certainly urgent; and it is now definite. It would be indelicate to challenge the ruling preventing my colleagues and me from being heard, but we wonder what the precedent is.

Madam Speaker: The matter in question must be urgent, and it must relate to new developments, such as a change of policy. I do not wish to discuss applications made to me in the House; the hon. Gentleman is a long-standing Member of Parliament, and he knows that we do not do that.

The hon. Gentleman has submitted a Standing Order No. 20 application relating to the United Nations representative in Baghdad. The United Nations representative has not even reached Baghdad yet, and I therefore cannot consider an application under Standing Order No. 20.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to the point of order put my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), Madam Speaker. I wish to raise the embargo on White Papers that operates in the House until 3.30 pm. This morning, the Home Office briefed the press about the contents of a White Paper, setting out the options. It strikes me as extremely unfair that elected Members of Parliament should be denied information until 3.30 pm, while the press can obtain it in the morning. Surely, if there is to be an embargo, it should apply to everyone, but especially to the press. The information should be released to Members of Parliament at the same time as it is released to the press, at the very least. The Home Office should not give the press a privileged position to the disadvantage of Members of Parliament.

You represent the interests of the House, Madam Speaker. Will you make hon. Members' feelings clear to the Home Office and the Home Secretary, and support those feelings yourself?

Madam Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, it is not for the Speaker but for the appropriate Minister to determine when official papers should be made available. As the House is aware, I deprecate the making of statements to the press outside the House, and I shall continue to make my views known.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I know that you have the interests of Back Benchers at heart. I hope that you will not mind my raising the matter mentioned earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). You have said that, for an application under Standing Order No. 20 to be granted, the issue involved must be urgent; but is there not a distinction to be drawn between an application that is made and one that is granted?

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I understand that he has written me a long letter about the matter, which I have not had an opportunity to read. I hope that he will do me the courtesy of allowing me to read it so that I can respond appropriately.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Evidence will show that, before 1989, applications under Standing Order No. 9—now Standing Order No. 20—were fairly frequent. Everyone knows what happened then: as a result of the televising of our proceedings, the powers-that-be got together and decided that applications under Standing Order No. 20 should take place in television prime time. Pressures were brought to bear, and as a result Mr. Speaker Weatherill changed the system.

Today and yesterday, my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) wanted to raise a matter of prime importance. Five years ago, his application would undoubtedly have been granted. Anyone who has been around here long enough to know is aware that television changed the system. Hon. Members should understand why their applications are now being denied.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is it a similar point of order?

Mr. Faulds: Absolutely. Some of us who have been here even longer remember that in the old days there was absolutely no way in which a Standing Order No. 9—now a Standing Order No. 20—having been refused, could even have been raised within the House. I suggest, Madam Speaker, that you go back to the old practice.

Madam Speaker: I tend to be rather old-fashioned, and I would like to do that. I look at Standing Order No. 20 applications on their merits. I cannot allow the proceedings of the House to be changed because a Member makes to me a Standing Order No. 20 application which is not particularly important, on which there is no new development, and which is not urgent. I look at Standing Order No. 20 applications in those three lights, and I will continue to deal with them in that way.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to statutory instruments.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

SEA FISHERIES

That the Third Country Fishing (Enforcement) Order 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 1197) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

DISEASES OF ANIMALS

That the Diseases of Animals (Therapeutic Substances) (Revocation) Order 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 1331) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

Question agreed to.

Pensioners' Equality

3.40 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to harmonise the retirement age at 60 for both women and men; to provide for the state retirement pension to be linked to average earnings and to be universally available; and for connected purposes.

It is my pleasure to seek leave to bring in the Pensioners' Equality Bill, which is a very short and simple Bill. It is very timely because there is a great debate raging about the future of the state old-age pension and, indeed, of the welfare state itself. My concern is that this debate is increasingly being conducted on late night television shows and in the pages of the newspaper broadsheets between experts of varying degree, all of whom fundamentally agree that there should be a reduction in the level of state expenditure on the old-age pension and an increase in private provision.

My Bill moves in exactly the opposite direction. It is not about privatisation or reduction; it is fundamentally about decency in a civilised society. To my mind, that means looking at the very serious degree of poverty in which many elderly people in this country have to live at the present time. There is something deeply humiliating about people who have spent a lifetime at work, in an office, in a factory, on a farm or at home having to wait around in a supermarket to get the cheap bread at five o'clock on a Saturday afternoon, or to queue at the greengrocers for the mouldy vegetables that are sold off at the end of the working day. There is something fundamentally immoral about that.

The Secretary of State for Social Security and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are both dealing with the problem of the £50 billion Government borrowing requirement. That borrowing requirement, I hasten to add, has been brought about by a Conservative Government since 1979. It has been brought about by the deindustrialisation of the economy, by the enormous tax handout of over £20 billion to those earning more than £40,000 a year, and, in my view, also by the horrendous level of arms expenditure, including expenditure on nuclear weapons.

These issues have to be faced, but we are expected, as a country, to face them by cutting the welfare benefits of the poorest in our society. My Bill deals exclusively with the problems of pensioners, but I am sure that other hon. Members will want to bring forward similar Bills in relation to child benefit and other universal benefits.

The Secretary of State for Social Security, in his Mais lecture in the City of London, waxed long and lyrical about the problem of the aging population and the growing burden on those at work of the elderly population. He does not seem to understand that the word "burden" and the way in which he describes the growing problem of the elderly cause fear among many pensioners in this country who are forced to try to live on the state pension, plus housing benefits and any other odd benefits that they may be able to get.

The fact that there is a demographic argument is surely something that we should be pleased about. It shows the success of the welfare state and, in particular, of the national health service in increasing the longevity of so many people.

The Government's policy is a culmination of their 1985 White Paper, introduced by the present chairman of the Conservative party and piloted through the House by the current Prime Minister. The Bill which followed the White Paper reduced the value of the state earnings-related pension scheme and encouraged people to put money into private pension schemes. That has cost the national insurance fund £2 billion. In the Government's view, it has increased flexibility. Above all, however, it has compounded the breaking of the rise in the state old-age pension each year in line with earnings and put in its place a rise that is in line with the retail prices index, which has cost every pensioner at least £19 a week.

Those who believe that the solution to all the so-called problems that we face is to encourage private pension funds ought to look at the investigations carried out by the Select Committee on Social Security and the large-scale fraud that has hit a large number of pension funds. The Maxwell pension fund is the greatest of those frauds, but there are many others. I am concerned about the lack of democracy in running pension funds. I am also concerned about the promotion of private portable pension schemes. There is no democracy whatsoever when it comes to the running of such funds.

What is needed is an understanding that in a civilised society it is the duty of the state to provide a decent standard of living for those who have reached retirement age, which I believe should be reduced to 60. The Government claim that there has been a 34 per cent. rise in the real income levels of those over 65. They have calculated that figure by taking the income of all people over the age of 65, including the super-rich who made huge gains because of the way that the stock market performed, and adding it to occupational pension schemes. Therefore, the Government say that everyone over the age of 65 is better off.

The pensioners I meet at meetings of pensioners' organisations all over this country, as well as in Wales and Scotland, do not share that view. It also masks the fact that women tend not to be members of occupational pension schemes and that older women pensioners are by far the worst off, particularly those over the age of 75 who are living in real poverty.

Hypothermia is a totally preventable and avoidable condition, yet many pensioners die of it each winter. All the codes of practice that have been introduced to protect the elderly from cut-offs have been completely eliminated by the introduction of rechargeable meter keys by the electricity companies. There is now self-disconnection by many elderly people who cannot afford to get the key recharged so that the supply of electricity to their homes can continue.

In addition, cuts in health care and local authority services hit the elderly particularly hard. Two weeks ago there was an enormous rally in Central hall, Westminster, followed by an enormous lobby in this building. More than 5,000 supporters of the National Federation of Retirement Pensions Associations attended Central hall, Westminster, and heard inspirational speeches from Jack Jones and many others. Jack Jones was condemned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as being politically motivated—I am not quite sure what the Chancellor of the Exchequer is. At that rally there was a demand for decency in retirement. There was also a call for parity with the European average for the state old-age pension and for an end to the indignities that so many people have to suffer in retirement.

It is a condemnation of the television and radio channels and of most newspapers that not one of them saw fit to report anything whatsoever to do with that very important rally and lobby by people who, at great expense, had travelled to London to take part in it.

My proposals would cost a great deal of money. I do not flinch from that. I do not deny it. I am not ashamed to say it. I am also not ashamed to say where I think that money should come from. It should come from restoring the levels of taxation on the very rich which have been done away with by the Government since 1979. It should also come from cutting European Community payments, fraudulently obtained, and from reductions in the enormous level of arms expenditure. My Bill would do a lot to make life a bit more bearable for many people.

Why is that this country and a number of other countries throughout Europe are discussing raising the age at which the state retirement pension should be paid to 67, and in some cases to 70? There is a conspiracy to do that all across Europe. The retired population of Europe and of this country do not want to take part in that conspiracy. We want the retirement age to be harmonised downwards to 60. It is often very unfair that one of a couple living together should have to retire five years earlier than the other. It can be quite a miserable existence for the first waiting for the second—the male partner—to retire at 65. It is only sensible and logical that we should lower the retirement age to 60 and, thereby, bring a great deal of happiness and not a little civilisation to society.

Restoration of the link with earnings, so brutally and crudely broken in 1980, would make every pensioner £19 per week better off. I consider that money to have been stolen from the pensioners.

Finally, I am concerned that, at the moment, the Government are putting forward ideas to target the old-age pension. The word "target" sends a frisson down my spine—a feeling shared by millions of people whose experience of targeting is the indignity of the means test and a reduction in the real standards of living of many poor people. The state pension is a contributory benefit, paid for through taxation and national insurance contributions during a working life, and should be for all time and for ever—and guaranteed so to be—available universally. At the height of the 1970s, when a Labour Government were in office, the state pension was 25 per cent. of average male earnings for a couple. It is now considerably less—just over 15 per cent. That is an indictment of the way in which the Conservative Government have treated the elderly.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Who will prepare and bring in the Bill?

Mr. Corbyn: There were many who wanted to bring in the Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Alan Simpson, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. Ken Livingstone, Mr. Bob Cryer, Ms Mildred Gordon, Mr. Malcolm Chisholm, Mr. Max Madden, Mr. Dennis Canavan and Mr. Bernie Grant.

PENSIONERS' EQUALITY

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn accordingly presented a Bill to harmonise the retirement age at 60 for both women and men; to provide for the state retirement pension to be linked to average earnings and to be universally available; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 23 July, and to be printed. [Bill 235.]

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Despite the controversy created by Ministers and other hon. Members, no one has objected to the Bill. That being the case, cannot we now make progress with the Bill for the good reasons advanced by my hon. Friend?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows very well that that is not a matter for the Chair.

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Not amended (in the Committee) and as amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

[MR. GEOFFREY LOFTHOUSE in the Chair]

STAMP DUTY

3.53 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 158, leave out lines 18 to 41.

This clause brings forward by three months—from 5 August to 5 May—the date by which the Finance Bill must be enacted. It also extends from 25 days to 30 days the allowable period between the Budget statement and publication of the Finance Bill. It is not contentious to say that the purpose of the first change is to ensure—not in statute but at least in effect, given the changes being made—that the Finance Bill will almost certainly have had to complete its Committee stage before the Easter recess. The purpose of the second change is to ensure that the Government will never have to publish the Finance Bill until after the Christmas recess.

I should make it absolutely clear, for the avoidance of any doubt whatever, that the unified Budget process is a shared objective of the Government and the Opposition. The Armstrong committee recommended the process back in 1980, and the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee made similar recommendations in 1982. Both Committees highlighted two principal arguments in favour of the unified budget. The first is that if tax decisions and spending decisions are made together, the relationship between the two is thrown into sharper focus.

I had the pleasure of hearing the Financial Secretary to the Treasury speak at a seminar organised by the Institute for Fiscal Studies. He said that decisions would be better informed. That may or may not be so, but I am absolutely certain that the Financial Secretary and the rest of the Treasury team do not intend to allow us to change any of those decisions under the new unified Budget process. Better informed or not, I suspect that it is the Government's intention that the decisions contained in the Finance Bill remain in the Bill as, indeed, they almost always do from Second Reading right up to Third Reading. However, we shall certainly be better informed.

The second point made by the Armstrong committee and the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee way back in 1982 was that tax proposals are currently presented and considered in a way that makes revision and even expert consideration difficult. In our evidence to the Select Committee on Procedure we said that the unified Budget process is an important opportunity for reform and that there is a strong case for technical consideration of the Finance Bill, followed by political debate on broader issues of principle. As I understand it, those issues are currently being considered by the Procedure Committee.

As making the new procedure work is a shared objective, the Opposition are willing to co-operate in the usual way through the usual channels to move cautiously and with consent towards an improved way of dealing with such important issues. It is important that the House should get it right. As I have said many times, the Committee stage of the Finance Bill, with all its imperfections, is the only forum for detailed scrutiny of the Government's financial legislation. We have agreed in principle that we want to make the new unified Budget procedure work. Our method of doing that on issues of detail is to wait for the advice from the Procedure Committee as to how best to make progress. We believe that the whole House should have an opportunity to consider and debate the views of the Procedure Committee and then to reach a consensus around its recommendations.

The Government, however, are not responding reasonably to a wholly reasonable approach. I went to see the Financial Secretary in his very pleasant office, and I should have been warned when I went in because over the fireplace in his office hangs a large portrait of the hon. Member for Huntingdon—nothing so wimpish as the present right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), but a portrait of the famous hon. Member for Huntingdon, Oliver Cromwell. Cromwell did not muck about with a Committee stage of the Finance Bill: when the House refused to take the public spending decisions that he wanted—relating to defence expenditure, I believe—he shouted, "Colonel Harrison, fetch them in", and the dragoons marched in and brought the parliamentary Opposition debate to a close.

The Financial Secretary has clearly been inspired by that portrait and the strong leadership that it represents. I understand the Conservative party's current desire for strong leadership, and I understand how the Financial Secretary could be seduced into behaving in an authoritarian way, although it is not characteristic.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): Is the hon. Gentleman espousing the cause of the Rump Parliament as a representative body capable of analysing the details of a Finance Bill?

Mr. Brown: I remind the Financial Secretary that the mid-17th century episode ended in tears for many of the principal characters. I think that the appropriate analogy for him is the fate of Sir Thomas Wentworth, who tried to impose his master's wishes on a truculent House and came to a very sticky end, disappointed that in his final hours he did not have even the support of the master whom he sought to serve—an awful warning for others who seek to behave like him. His nickname was Black Tom Tyrant. I should hate to think of the Financial Secretary going down in history as Black Stephen Tyrant—it does not even have a ring to it. However, he is behaving heavy-handedly by insisting that we pre-empt the decisions of the Procedure Committee and legislate now for matters that should more properly be discussed, in the normal way, when we have the views of that Committee in front of us.

I understand that the Financial Secretary has a vested interest in curtailing debate, but he is pre-empting a decision of the Procedure Committee, obstructing further reforms which may be necessitated by the unified Budget process which he says he supports, and generally voting himself a quiet life, uninterrupted by vigorous parliamentary scrutiny.

In Committee, the Financial Secretary had a good whinge about the difficulties of doing his job. He told us that existed for parliamentary scrutiny, and that

"No wodge of spare time"

"Time for parliamentary scrutiny is used at the expense not simply of discussions between officials but of the time available for preparing draft clauses, and undertaking public consultations on tax proposals, which could be extremely detailed.—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 24 June 1993; c. 577.]

That was his defence of his behaviour.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): On certain occasions in Committee it was clear that the hon. Gentleman had not waited for the publication of the Finance Bill before drafting his new clauses in any event. So why the worry, given that the Opposition obviously wish to table certain amendments and new clauses?

Mr. Brown: There are well over 200 clauses in the Finance Bill, which we are also charged with scrutinising. I am sure that the hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) will do me the courtesy of admitting that we thoroughly and systematically scrutinised those clauses. Some of them, such as the clause on value added tax, are about controversial issues. Some of them are about matters of detail and are perhaps of specialist interest only. Nevertheless, in a democracy it is right that all those matters receive not just parliamentary scrutiny but informed parliamentary scrutiny. The Opposition, with limited resources, take seriously the duty of ensuring that the Bill gets such scrutiny.

When discussing the use of parliamentary time in Committee, the Financial Secretary made it clear that he regarded the time spent with civil servants, professional advisers and those who wanted to make representations about the Bill as quality time. He seemed to suggest that the time that he spent with us—the other elected representatives of the people—was at a discount and could not be extended. I almost got the impression that he did not enjoy the time he spent with us, which I am sure could not be right.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the opportunity to correct that impression. Nothing gives me greater pleasure than spending time with the hon. Gentleman, his colleagues and my hon. Friends who joined us in Committee.

I did not seek to argue in Committee that time spent with officials was high value time, or to draw a distinction between that and time spent with Parliament. I sought to argue that my responsibility to Parliament is to prepare and present proposals that have been properly worked through and assessed and on which, in many cases, outside interests have been consulted. The purpose of so doing is to ensure that Parliament does not spend its time on the minute detail of the technical aspects which, as we agreed in Committee, with one or two exceptions are not the principal interests of hon. Members. Instead, Parliament can consider the wider political and strategic implications of tax proposals which have been properly worked through and presented to the House for it to decide upon.

Mr. Brown: I am glad that that matter has been cleared up. In that case, however, I do not understand why the Financial Secretary wants to curtail the amount of time available to the House to consider the Bill. He wants the right to ensure that the Bill does not have to be published until after Christmas. As I understand it, the present structure would not guarantee that in all circumstances, which is why we have to legislate for the extra five parliamentary days.

At the same time, the Financial Secretary is putting into place a timetable that is too tight. It is not too tight in itself, but too tight because of the way in which it interfaces with the Easter recess. The pressures that will be on the Committee to finish that stage before the House rises for the Easter recess will be overwhelming. It will mean that we shall be required not, as we could do now, to sit an extra week without clashing with the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968, but either to carry our deliberations into the Easter recess—which would not be popular—or to curtail discussion. I am certain that the Government would not be willing to allow the Committee stage to hang over the Easter recess and reconvene after Easter, with Report and Third Reading still to be completed before the new date of 5 May. That closing down of parliamentary time by the interface of the new timetable and the Easter recess is one of the principal concerns of the Opposition.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman has been generous in giving way. I have listened to this comments. For the reasons that I gave in Committee—I shall go through them again later if I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I do not accept that the effect of the Government's proposals is to reduce the amount of time available for parliamentary scrutiny.

Will the hon. Gentleman turn his mind to the effect of his proposed amendment on the amount of time available for parliamentary scrutiny? His amendment suggests that we should, in effect, omit the whole clause. I should make it clear that the effect of omitting the clause would not be to leave the PCTA date that would apply to a Budget delivered in November or December as 5 August, but to revert to the generality of law, which is that under the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act, unless a Budget is delivered in March or April, the authority runs out after four months. Therefore, the effect of accepting the hon. Gentleman's amendment would be that the PCTA date of a Budget on 25 November would not be 5 May, as the Government propose, but 25 March.

Mr. Brown: The Financial Secretary has moved from what I thought was the undue exercise of tyranny to crude blackmail. It is not clear from his intervention that the Financial Secretary knows perfectly well that Opposition Members offered a whole series of compromise proposals in Committee. Our view is not that the whole procedure should be completed by April, but the absolute opposite of that. We would have been more than willing to facilitate a legislative change at the time of the Budget or before it if agreement could have been reached that met our legitimate objections about the time given for scrutinising the Finance Bill before the Committee stage and about the amount of time available for consideration of the Bill.

In case there is any doubt, the compromise that we offered in Committee was the date of 5 June rather than 5 May. That would give us an extra month after the recess —a month that we might not take, but at least we would have the option of taking it if issues arose requiring further discussion or further parliamentary scrutiny. It is not a question of parliamentary tactics. We have always tried to agree with the Government on the way in which we work through the Finance Bill. It is not a vehicle for re-fighting, in parliamentary terms, the battle of the Somme. We accept our responsibility thoroughly to scrutinise all the measures in the Bill because there is nobody else to do it. If we did not undertake that responsibility and took it seriously, Parliament would be much criticised. With the clause, the Financial Secretary is saying, in effect, that Opposition Members may discharge that duty, but only in a timetable set by him and not one that is agreeable to us. I do not want to overstate the quarrel.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Although I am a member of the Procedure Committee, I have no desire to refer to the Committee's deliberations on this subject, and it would be wrong to do so. Does my hon. Friend agree that, since there is general agreement in the House about the unified Budget and there is no disagreement between the two Front Benches about the desirability of change, it is unfortunate that this reform should bring with it some controversy because the Government are refusing to compromise? Since there is no disagreement about the unified Budget, why have a sticking point between the two sides? The Opposition consider this to be important and it is unfortunate that the Government are adopting this attitude.

Mr. Brown: I agree wholeheartedly with everything that my hon. Friend has said. We are not just in favour of the unified Budget process—we are enthusiastically in favour of it. Our concerns and resentments stem from the fact that the amount of time that will be available for the Opposition and for dissident Members on the Government side to consider these issues will be curtailed. It may be felt that dissident Conservative Members are at a discount in as much as they rarely—not never—vote against the Government. However, within the relative safety of the Committee, they often seek to explore in considerable detail with Ministers matters of specialist interest to themselves or their close friends. Although the detail with which they explore those matters rarely results in a rebel yell, let alone a rebel vote, time is taken to explore matters vigorously with the Treasury Front Bench. That is a right and, I would argue, a duty—so long as it is performed altruistically—which pertains not just to the Opposition but to Government Back Benchers as well. Therefore, I am seeking to protect their interests rather than just those of the Opposition with this amendment.

My view on this matter would be the same if the Labour party were in office and the Conservative party in opposition. It is a test of altruism that those proposing the change can say that this is the way we would like it regardless of whether we are in government. That is the test that we apply to this. As the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) made clear, I am saddened that something that should be dealt with by consensus between the two sides has been a matter of deep controversy. It is not an issue that we will let go.

Our preferred way of proceeding is to wait until the Procedure Committee has put its recommendations before the House, for the House to have a debate and then, through the usual channels, to agree on an acceptable timetable. That timetable may be on the basis of just one year, since this is the first time we shall have the unified Budget procedure. We would then wish to proceed by consensus. We are debating not the contents of the Government's legislation, but the way in which the House should deal with it.

It is not necessary to legislate in the way we are being asked to do and it is certainly not necessary to do it now. It is a gross discourtesy to the Procedure Committee. The Financial Secretary's spurious argument that if we do not agree with his construction there will be nothing available to the House except to resort to the general law of the land can be dealt with easily: we would facilitate any legislation introduced by the Government which reflected the compromise that we wish to reach with them on these matters.

4.15 pm

Mr. Ian Taylor: One of the disadvantages that you have, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is that, when the debate moves from the close confines of the Committee to the wide open expanses of the green Benches of the House, you have not participated in the excitement of the debate in which Committee members were privileged to take part. If you had been there, you might have noticed the concern of the excellent hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown). The hon. Gentleman was concerned that more all-night sittings might be needed if his greatest fears were realised and the Committee was truncated.

The hon. Gentleman seemed principally to be worried about spending more nights with his hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), who regaled the Committee more than once at great length—and with occasional wisdom—about his exploits. The hon. Member for Hartlepool included the holiday he was about to take in Majorca in those remarks. Unfortunately, he got lost at that point and forgot to give Committee members the full details. I hope that he will remedy that this afternoon. Most members of the Committee felt that the details of the hon. Member's holiday in Majorca were more interesting than the rest of the speech that he made on that occasion.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): My recollection is that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East was more concerned that he would have to spend the night with the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) rather than the hon. Member for Hartlepool.

Mr. Taylor: It is true that the Committee members were enthralled and privileged to have large extracts of a book that had been recently published by the hon. Member for Peckham read into the record. I said at the time that that was inevitably a ploy by Labour members of the Committee to ensure that the book would have a wider circulation through Hansard than it would have in its original book form, because the minutes of the Finance Bill Committee are read avidly by a large number of people. I hope that the modest expectations of Labour members of the Committee for that publication were realised.

The debate on whether Parliament will be short-changed in parliamentary scrutiny has arisen out of the principle of the unified Budget. I give full credit to the hon.

Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East. He clearly stated that he and his Labour Front-Bench colleagues welcome the unified Budget. The House should ponder on that.

In essence, the changes that are created by bringing together the expenditure Budget, or the autumn statement, and the fund-raising Budget—which has normally been in March, except under Labour Governments, when there were several a year—make a significant impact on other procedural matters. The Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968 applies in this context.

The amendments are about whether, in terms of that Act, one tries to change the Finance Bill in a way that alters the ability of Parliament to inspect and examine it, and whether the different recesses that will fall when the Bill is introduced impede Parliament's ability to look at the Finance Bill. The Minister clearly stated that the technical day count and the practical reality did not justify the Opposition's worries.

The benefit of a unified Budget is something that many hon. Members have been urging for some time. I join those on the Labour Front Bench in welcoming that. One of the problems that a member of a Finance Bill Committee faces is that he knows that the Red Book that has been previously issued in association with the autumn statement is almost out of date and certainly needs revising. It is therefore difficult to get a complete grip of the Government's expenditure plans in detail, against the taxes that we are examining in that Committee.

The Committee's discussions depend on whether the taxes are to cover last year's estimates of the Government's financial expenditure or whether they relate to the future. This unification is important. We do not usually mention the fact that there are Cabinet Committees, but it is widely known that one such committee is looking even now at the Government's expenditure plans. In a fit of openness, which I welcome, the Government have let it be known that there is a control total for expenditure of £253·5 billion—the Financial Secretary will correct me if the number after the decimal point is wrong. Nevertheless, that is the target for Government expenditure in the forthcoming year.

We do not yet know how it will be divided up. That will be revealed in the autumn statement, when, for the first time, we will simultaneously be given the Government's plans for raising taxation—before the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East jumps to his feet, I should add that I use the word "raising" in its most neutral sense; I am not recommending a policy decision—which are always part of the traditional Budget procedure, and their plans for expenditure. That will make for a much more enlightened, and hence a more effective, debate.

I wonder whether Labour Members have taken this into account when giving their rather grudging acceptance of the timetable. When we have the unified Budget—probably in November—much more information will be before the House, so the debate on it will be better.

This will benefit hon. Members on both sides of the House. When we are dealing with Government expenditure of about £253·5 billion and a Government-projected deficit of £50 billion, it is vital to understand what the Government are attempting to cover with basic taxation, what growth patterns they project in the Red Book, and what will be the likely breakdown of expenditure between structural spending and automatic stabilisers related to the recession. It will help the House when it comes to look at the expenditure side of the fiscal equation to know what the taxation side will look like.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The hon. Gentleman has obviously given the matter a great deal of thought. What does he understand will happen to the two Industry Act forecasts?

Mr. Taylor: The excitement is in the waiting. There will be a great many forecasts for the hon. Gentleman to get his teeth into. We are all on tenterhooks to find out whether he enjoys the accuracy of the forecasts or whether he wants to be the eighth wise man. I am sure that he will draw his own conclusions in his own time.

The unified Budget will give the House a much broader basis for assessing the way forward, and a much better backdrop to the eventual consideration of the Finance Bill in Committee.

Then there is the problem of the Christmas recess. My hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) almost over-excited himself with the prospect of getting the Finance Bill before Christmas. Doubtless he reads so quickly that he will already have finished all the novels that he had put aside for the Christmas period, and will eagerly start reading the Finance Bill for his post-turkey Christmas afternoon enjoyment. We all have our foibles; obviously, that is his.

But it is not the critical point to bear in mind when asking whether we properly scrutinise the Finance Bill—it does not matter much whether it is published before Christmas or immediately afterwards. Conservative Back Benchers are well aware that it takes a certain amount of time to go through all the small print of certain Government measures—for instance, to read all the Inland Revenue press releases that go out with the Budget forecasts. They are voluminous enough in themselves.

I suffer occasionally from paper indigestion, and it takes me longer to go through all the press releases and guidance notes that the Inland Revenue put out than perhaps it does the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I understand perfectly what the hon. Gentleman is saying in his capacity as a loyal Back-Bench supporter of the Government, but has it occurred to him that, when he is in opposition, he might welcome slightly more time to scrutinise the Government's proposed legislation?

Mr. Taylor: That is a double hypothetical question: first, whether it is possible for me to be in opposition; secondly, if I were in opposition, whether the then Government would have any legislation. There are double hypotheses there, and I would rather not be tempted down that avenue.

The Christmas recess is a factor, and I look forward to the Financial Secretary's comments on it when he makes his speech, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The simple reality is that the most effective job that a Back Bencher can perform in terms of the Finance Bill is to look at the issues.

The exact drafting of the amendments is less important. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, who speaks on such matters, has often said that the amendments that he has tabled are probing amendments, in which case one does not need the detailed text. One needs to know the various subjects that are likely to be covered, and they are clearly covered in the general debates on Second Reading and the debates on the Floor of the House before the Bill goes to Committee.

At those stages, various points of principle must be made. If probing amendments are tabled, it gives the House a good opportunity for debate, without necessarily assuming that the Government will accept the amendment. That is happening on the Government Benches. Quite often, if we are concerned about an aspect of Government policy on which we seek clarification and there is no question but that our amendment may be faulty in its preparational drafting, we look to the Government to satisfy us that they are considering the amendment carefully, or will table their own on Report.

I am glad to say that I have sometimes been successful in persuading the Government to do just that. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East has often supported me, particularly on employee share ownership. The system works, and I give him credit for that.

I am less sure of my ground about the work of the officials. If I can sit up all night with the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), officials can stay up all night drafting the Finance Bill. I am not too sure that I wish to give them much comfort. They will have to work even harder under the unified scheme than perhaps they have done before. So be it.

Performance-related pay would be even better, and I know that the Financial Secretary is keen on that. Perhaps brownie points will be awarded in the margin of annotated versions of the Finance Bill in subsequent years.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): We need to be sure that we look after officials, make their work easier and ensure that they work reasonable hours and are not over-straining themselves. If their work is being concertinaed into a shorter period, as will happen as a result of the change in timing, it also means that their work in other periods of the year will be that much less, so there may well be a problem of spreading their burden evenly over the year. Taken overall, their work should be no more and no less.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. I must disclose an interest in this matter. I am the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who is also the Minister with responsibility for public service and science, and who is an excellent contributor to the thinking on how our civil service should develop. If he were in the Chamber, I would pay him a tribute—[Interruption.] Oh: as he is in the Chamber, I am able to pay him the compliments that he deserves, and that he would expect me, as his PPS, to give him.

The important point about the civil service, and particularly the Inland Revenue, is that those on the Committee respect and value enormously the work they do. This year, there will undoubtedly be a much greater work load to try to get the unified Budget before the House by the due date, which will be some time in November.

The only difficulty that I can foresee is that, given that all Back Benchers had to make sure that their Budget representations were in to Ministers by the Chevening weekend—if memory serves me right, that was the first weekend in January; I have not calculated it backwards, so if an hon. Member in a sedentary position can do it better than I can on my feet, perhaps he would tell me when the equivalent time might be two and a bit months before the November Budget—the new date may well bite heavily into the holidays of officials.

Will the Financial Secretary tell us what the equivalent of the Chevening weekend might be so that Back Benchers can get their acts together and start to gear up to lobby some time in September?

Mr. Carrington: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point. On the timing that he has just given the House, the Chevening weekend will coincide with the party conference. Does that not represent a great opportunity for consulting the whole party on Budget measures at the conference?

4.30 pm

Mr. Taylor: The Conservative party, with its democratic conference, could do that. The problem for the Labour party would be that, until it gets its voting structure sorted out, it would find it embarrassing. I am sure that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East would not like me to stray into his private grief about the voting system in the Labour party. I have a suspicion, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you are not so keen yourself that I stray into the topic of democracy in the Labour party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I am keen that we debate the amendment.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for bringing me back to the core of the subject, which is amendment No. 27.

This debate is as serious as the amendment that has been tabled—the amendment having been tabled, the debate follows in character. The Financial Secretary was helpful to the Committee by pointing out some of the timing details. It is interesting, for example, that 5 August is the date in the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968. It is true that, decades ago, the House sat into August, rising just before the Glorious Twelfth. Now, it is normal for the House to rise by the end of July.

Therefore, it is inconceivable that Parliament would be able to scrutinise the Finance Bill until as late as 5 August. There is bound to be some truncation. I hope that the Financial Secretary will take us back through the argument that he gave us in Committee, looking at the effective dates of the Budget as it was in March and the likely number of days that elapsed under the old arrangements in comparison with the new arrangements.

If the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968 is amended as the Government have said it will be to incorporate the new date of 5 May, that gives ample time for proper parliamentary scrutiny without the absolute necessity of all-night sittings. Yet all-night sittings are one of the excitements of the Finance Bill Committee. Serving on that Committe is an honour for hon. Members on both sides of the House. On most other Committees, hon. Members are told to keep quiet, but on that Committee we have ample opportunity to air our views.

The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) regaled the Committee with his detailed legal and economic knowledge, to the great pleasure of most of us. Those of us who found it difficult to follow him were in a minority, but he was constructive on many of the issues before us.

In those circumstances, it was a pleasure to listen to the hon. Gentleman at 4 in the morning rather than 6 in the evening. It was much more entertaining at that stage, because the debate was mature. Those are the excitements of being on the Finance Bill Committee when it sits all night. All-night sittings enable us to dilate much more on some of the issues than we would be able to do on the truncated time scale of a Committee that felt bound to rise by 10 o'clock in the evening.

I hope that I have enlightened the House about some of the issues at stake. I know that Labour Front-Bench Members feel aggrieved. The skill that they normally show in Committee and the forensic ability of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East are almost undervalued by the amendment. The hon. Gentleman need not be embarrassed.

I have been a member of the Finance Bill Committee since 1987, when I first had the honour to enter this place. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East has also been a member of that Committee since 1987. We have become fixtures: the Finance Bill would not be the Finance Bill without us. If I continue to speak as I am doing, I am sure that I will be a member of the Finance Bill Committee for many years to come. I am sure that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East will be on the Opposition Benches for very many years to come.

The hon. Member and I will be members of the Committee when it sits early in the next new year. However, he underestimates his skills. There is no doubt that there was quality in our debates in Committee this year. There was an eagerness to examine in detail and for rapid dispatch. The Committee rose after not too many late sittings, but a sufficient number to give us the feeling that we had properly scrutinised what the Government were doing.

There was some controversy, but the Committee showed that we do not need length of time to have a quality debate. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East has almost undermined our confidence in his skills by moving the amendment. Therefore, I do not feel that I can urge my colleagues to accept it.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) has made an entertaining contribution which reflected on those who were members of the Committee. His comments suggested that the Committee was a rather cosy club. I feel slightly diffident about intruding into these private exchanges, which have obviously been repeated on more than one occasion.

However, I believe that there is a serious point behind the amendment. Looking at it from the point of view, as I do, of entering the debate for the first time and not the 10th time, it seems to me slightly strange that the Government should introduce a reform which was welcomed by Members in all parts of the House and which seemed to be a constructive way forward and a better way to present the facts of the debate and then follow that immediately with a procedural mechanism for curtailing the very debate that they appear to want to stimulate. That is certainly what it looks like from where I am standing.

The hon. Member for Esher gave a somewhat esoteric, introspective view of how the Committee conducts itself. He rather underplayed the importance of the debate for people outside the House who are seriously affected by the consequences of the Finance Act. Whether or not the Finance Bill Committee carries out its deliberations in a series of extended sittings is, to some extent for those outside this place, a matter of little concern, although one hears the passing comment that it is a strange way to run business efficiently.

People outside this place are concerned not about the number of hours that the Committee sits, but about the time available to marshal the arguments, to analyse the implications and to present a case if—and this is after all the purpose of having a legislative Committee—we are genuinely to consider the implications and be prepared to review and vary them: in other words, if the debate is genuine.

I have taken the trouble to read the interesting and constructive report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee on the Government's proposals. It seems to me that we are being asked to support a move that is primarily for the convenience of the Treasury rather than for those who are affected by the changes.

I have not been a member of the Finance Bill Committee, but I have been exercised by some of the proposals in this year's Finance Bill. No matter what side of the argument one is on, the VAT proposals have been extremely controversial. As time has passed, the implications of those proposals have been more widely discussed.

I am concerned about the changes in oil taxation. Even within the present timetable, it is instructive to note that yesterday, according to my local daily newspaper, The Press and Journal in Aberdeen, Shell announced that it would be laying off workers as a direct result of the tax changes in this Bill.

That has happened in respect of the present time scale. It will not be of much value if such proposals come after the completion of the process. The shorter the process, the more likely it is that people will not have collected their arguments together in time, I am concerned that these things are likely to be rushed through.

In many cases, the matters we are talking about are extremely technical and their implications are not always easy to understand, even by the companies or individuals that are affected by them, or by the Treasury officials implementing them.

One of the reasons why Finance Bills are so long is that a significant number of their clauses correct the errors and unexpected side effects contained in previous Finance Acts. While it is inevitable that that will happen, it should be an ambition of Treasury Ministers and officials to limit the number of clauses that fall into that category. The shorter the time in which deliberations must be concluded, the more likely it is that we will get things wrong and, as was said in Committee, the longer each Finance Bill is likely to become year by year.

The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) said that he might end up needing a trailer on the back of his car to take his reading home for Christmas. He is the only Member to think that he will receive the relevant documents before Christmas.

Apart from the question of tidiness and convenience to the Treasury, what is the purpose of bringing the income and expenditure proposals together? It seems to me that it is to ensure that there is a better informed debate about the relationship between the two. In at least the first year or two of the change, it would be better to have a longer rather than shorter period of debate to see how it is conducted. If it becomes apparent, after a year or two, that the timetable can be met, it might be appropriate to adopt it permanently. But to adopt a new procedure and then insist that the period of debate is shortened, before we have seen how it operates in practice, is wrong and undermines the change.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman has said several times that the Government are seeking to shorten the time available for debate by this clause. I sought to explain that that is not the effect of the clause. Its intention, broadly speaking, is to replicate the present arrangements. As far as it changes the length of time available for debate, it errs on the side of lengthening, not shortening, the time available.

Mr. Bruce: I understand that point, but I believe that the Minister has acknowledged that the practicalities behind the way in which the parliamentary year falls mean that there will be less time available for debate. The Financial Secretary may disagree. When a radical and welcome change is being introduced for the purposes of informing the debate, there is a case for extending rather than containing the time for debate, at least for the first year or two.

The hon. Member for Esher has said that the fact that we are bringing the two parts of the Budget debate together should make it clearer and speedier. That is one point of view. It is equally likely that we will set more hares running which will have to be considered. We should allow time for that.

The current debate is of some interest and should be taking place in the Conservative party, as well as in the Opposition parties, because it is directly affected by the political consequences. Ministers may want to say to the House, "These are the facts. This is the state of the deficit and it must be addressed." In that case we need honesty and openness so that all hon. Members and people outside can face up to the fact that we must cut expenditure and raise more revenue. In those circumstances, we need a climate of genuine and honest debate. I welcome that.

The current debate is whether there should be more hypothecation of taxes. I do not think anybody in the House would or could suggest that all taxes should be hypothecated—that would be wholly unrestrictive and overly populist. The Government must recognise that Governments who say that they will cut taxes and then increase them, and say that the reason for doing so is that they misread the calculations and that the situation is a lot worse than they thought, are pursuing the debate abstrusely.

The objective of the reforms that have been introduced is to make the debate more open, to make it clear to all sides why there is a deficit and what the shortfall is and to enable people to explore at the same time where we can cut expenditure and raise revenue. That is a welcome and constructive change, but it does stimulate more debate and not less.

Mr. Willetts: Will the hon. Gentleman reveal how his party would propose to cut expenditure and raise revenue? I am sure that the electors of Christchurch would be interested in his ideas on that subject.

Mr. Bruce: I would be happy to do that, but Mr. Deputy Speaker would tell me that the purpose of the timetable motion is not to make a campaign speech for the electors of Christchurch. I have been there, however, and I know that the electors I have met are more enthusiastic about our policies than about those of the Conservative party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now doing something that he said he should not do.

Mr. Bruce: I accept your constraint entirely, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

4.45 pm

If the Financial Secretary is unable to accept the amendment, and if he insists that it is not the Government's intention to shorten the period of debate but to replicate it, that is the minimum that should happen. At the risk of repeating myself, with a new reform such as this, it would be better to extend the debate. All the evidence that I have seen before the Treasury Select Committee shows that there is no problem about extending the debate. The only people concerned about the time scale appear to be the Treasury. The argument that the reform would create a greater period of uncertainty is one that people have lived with for a hundred years.

The argument that the tax year needs to be tidy and that all the relevant matters need to be sewn up in advance has not been a serious factor in previous practical considerations. It is a matter of absolute astonishment to me that the tax year starts on 5 April. To most people that is peculiar and it should be addressed. It has been suggested that we should at some time make the tax year begin at the start of the calendar year, as in most other countries.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): That would ruin Christmas.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman may say that that would ruin his Christmas, but the longer the time for debate, the more chance he has to leave it to one side and come to it in the new year just as happily.

The Government have introduced a welcome reform, but they should recognise that the provision of a little more time in the first two years would not go amiss.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): As I did at the beginning of the Committee stage, I will start by declaring an interest. I am an adviser to National Westminster Securities, which is the investment banking arm of the NatWest group. I am a director of Dewe Rogerson consultants and I am also the parliamentary consultant to the Institute of Taxation. None of those bodies knew that I would speak in the debate this afternoon, nor had any idea of what I would say.

As has already been said, we had a very full discussion of this matter in Committee. The House should be grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing us to discuss the matter again on Report. Some very serious issues are raised by the Opposition amendment.

I am very glad that in the fascinating interchange at the beginning of the debate between my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) quite a lot was said about the great constitutional debates of the 17th century. Those debates are pertinent to the matter that we are discussing.

The House will know that, between the 1620s and the 1640s, the great constitutional debates turned on the extent to which taxation should be by the consent of the Government—or at least by the consent of the taxpayer, if not the Government. Of course, in those days, Parliament considered itself to be the representative of the taxpaying public rather than the whole public. If Pym and Hampden were in our midst this afternoon, they might have added to that principle the need to ensure that taxation legislation, like all other forms of legislation, was comprehensible to those to whom it would apply. In the 17th century, proposed taxation legislation would always have been comprehensible. There might have been a proposal for ship money or exercise duty, but everyone understood what that was about. The provisions bringing those taxes into effect could have been interpreted by any court in accordance with their apparent meaning as debated in this Chamber.

We have moved onwards since the 17th century, but I cannot say that we have moved forwards. It is now a great challenge for this House, the general public and even those in the legal and accounting professions who spend all their time on tax matters to understand the meaning of a Finance Bill. On Second Reading and throughout our discussions in Committee, I protested about the fact that Finance Bills have become steadily longer and more convoluted, and I make no apology for protesting now because it is a serious issue. Unless Members of Parliament call parliamentary draftsmen to account and react on behalf of the public to the increasing complexity and opacity of taxation legislation, no discipline will be placed on parliamentary draftsmen and no restraint will be placed on the length and complexity of Finance Bills.

The result of that will be extremely undesirable. It will mean a loss to justice because people will not understand the law. They will not claim the allowances properly due to them and will be penalised for making inadequate declarations because they did not understand the law. There will also be considerable economic costs because we will have to pay talented people to spend hours and hours interpreting the legislation. That expense will have to be borne by industry, businesses, individuals and the economy.

How does that relate to the time to be made available for parliamentary scrutiny of Finance Bills? Clearly, if taxes are to be collected for the following year, the more time that we and the outside world have to consider a Finance Bill when it is first drafted and published and before it becomes law, the greater the possibility of our doing our job in this place and scrutinising legislation carefully. That will allow the Government to expound the legislation and justify the measures and a general consensus will develop outside the House that the new taxation proposals are sound and reasonable. That is important for the integrity and reputation of this place, the law and our tax system.

I accept my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary's argument that the Government's proposal on timing will, if anything, increase the parliamentary time available for scrutiny of Finance Bills. With the great mental agility for which he is famous, he succeeded in convincing us in Committee that another five days of parliamentary time would be made available. Although I could not follow his calculations as they seemed extremely complicated, I accept his conclusion.

However, I greatly regret that we did not take this opportunity to provide for a significant qualitative increase in the time available in this place to discuss Finance Bills in future. I say "in this place" because there are two sides to the public consent that is being given to Finance Bills: first, there is the reaction of the public, the experts who analyse Finance Bills and those who want to make representations to the Government and Parliament before irrevocable decisions are taken; and, secondly, there is the debate in this place.

We are all grateful for the detailed representations that we receive from all sorts of outside bodies on the Government's fiscal proposals in the Budget speech and subsequently in the Finance Bill. I accept that many of those representations are interested but that is perfectly right. We want to hear how individual categories of people or businesses feel that they will be impacted by those measures so that we can take account of their representations. We can discount them to the extent necessary because they are clearly self-interested and we can try to reconcile them with the Government's need for additional revenue or their need to conserve revenue at any time. That is what discussion of the Finance Bill is about.

However, we must give people the time to read the Finance Bill and to lobby their Members of Parliament, and we must leave ourselves enough time to consider those representations and do our homework. It is important that Back Benchers do their homework—the Government do theirs well—but, if we are to play our role, we must have time to do that. Debates must not be foreshortened by the Government's threat that, if we do not make progress, they will be unable to raise revenue. All sorts of obvious disastrous consequences would flow from that. We do not want to become the victims of such moral blackmail if we can avoid it.

In Committee I backed an amendment that sought to set the date by which the Finance Bill should enter law. It suggested 5 July rather than 5 August, which would have given two more months for consideration of the Bill. The Financial Secretary explained—he always makes a convincing argument—that that would cause all sorts of administrative difficulties for the Government. He said that the bureaucracy—the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise and the Treasury—must spend a lot of time preparing for Finance Bills. However, I greatly regret that the conflict between bureaucratic convenience and open government and parliamentary scrutiny has been resolved in favour of bureaucratic convenience. If hon. Members do not argue against that, nobody ever will and we shall be less able to make a meaningful contribution to the evolution of our tax law. That would be bad for parliamentary sovereignty, the legitimacy of the tax system and the tax system itself.

However complicated and technical the proposed measures are, and however high-minded and conscientious officials may be, unless they are exposed to scrutiny there will inevitably be no counterweight or countervailing discipline to proposals that officialdom decides to put forward, and we shall have worse and worse taxation law.

May I take up a remark made by the Financial Secretary in an intervention in the remarks of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown)? The Financial Secretary said that Parliament wanted to be involved in the broad strategic thrust of tax law rather than with its technical details. I wish to challenge that view, which I hope does not reflect the considered opinion of the Financial Secretary.

Of course, hon. Members are concerned with the strategic thrust of tax law and with the broad economic consequences of the Government's fiscal policy, and whether that policy is expansionary or restrictive. They are concerned about whether we should reduce our present deficit by reducing expenditure or increasing revenues. They consider where increases or reductions in revenues in the tax system and in general public spending should fall. That is the stuff of our debates in the House on Treasury matters, and there are a number of opportunities to discuss such matters in the course of the year. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East is laughing —no doubt I take advantage of those opportunities, but he never fails to do so either. I always appreciate the hon. Gentleman's interventions, which are invariably well thought through and interesting—[Interruption.] I did not hear the intervention of the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), but if he wants to intervene I shall be delighted to give way to him. I find it difficult to hear what he says when he comments from a sedentary position.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I have a soft spot for the hon. Gentleman, so I shall rescue him. He is chattering on as if he is taking part in a television quiz show where the aim is to keep talking about the Finance Bill without ever stopping. Why does he not confirm that many of his colleagues are at a royal garden party and he has been instructed to keep talking so that we do not have to vote before 6 pm?

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman is being more than a little unfair. He suggests that what I am saying cannot stand on its merits. That is wrong. I contributed to the debates in Committee when, as far as I know, there were no competing social attractions in the west end of London and I said very much the same. The hon. Gentleman cannot accuse me of speaking with a lack of sincerity or lack of consistency today. If I had a less good memory, his intervention might have saved my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary from some remarks that I was about to make in response to his observations this afternoon. It seems a little perverse of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East to intervene and deflect my comments of a mildly and respectfully sceptical nature about a Minister, and a very distinguished one at that.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): From what the hon. Member is saying, I take it that it is not true that he continues to speak because his hon. Friends are all at the palace. Perhaps he is doing so because he does not want to discuss VAT.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not aware of any activities outside the House, but I would welcome it if the debate were to relate to the amendment.

Mr. Davies: I can say with the greatest sincerity that I do not know the movements of my colleagues nor those of Opposition Members, either this afternoon or during any other afternoon. One is not the keeper of one's colleagues in this place, thank heaven, unless one happens to be a Whip, and I have never had that particular honour. I have no idea who may be doing what this afternoon. I know that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will not want me to go into the issue of VAT on domestic fuel, which has already had a generous airing, but I should like to state that I have never avoided an opportunity to stand up in public and defend the Government's decision on VAT, which I believe to be fundamentally correct, though it may be costly in the short term. Correct and courageous Government decisions often are politically costly in a party political sense in the short term.

The Government are to be more, not less, commended for taking that move—[Interruption.] It is interesting that this is, I think, the first time since I was elected to the House that Labour Members have sought to deflect me from making comments that are not of a purely adulatory nature about the remarks of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench.

Mr. Carrington rose——

Mr. Davies: Perhaps more understandably, one of my hon. Friends is now rising to deflect me from that purpose.

Mr. Carrington: I hesitate to deflect my hon. Friend from his purpose—it is beyond the reason of anyone to try to do so. My hon. Friend is a notable scourge of parliamentary draftsmen. He started his speech on that subject and raised considerable concerns among many Conservative Members on Second Reading and in Committee on the gobbledegook in the Bill. If the time scale for debating the Finance Bill was expanded next year, we would also need to be able to change the procedures for considering the Bill so that we could change the drafting. A notable factor of our discussions on the Finance Bill has been our inability to change the drafting, despite all the cogent arguments advanced by my hon. Friend on how badly drafted some provisions of the Bill are.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. I well understand the reluctance of Ministers to agree, on the spot in Committee, to changes in the Bill's drafting. It would lead to much better and more considered tax legislation if, first, there was more time between the publication of the Bill and the commencement of the Committee stage. That would allow more time for the Government to prepare for the Bill's Committee stage by discussing with their officials, the Revenue, and Customs and Excise any suggestions made about the Bill by outside interested parties.

Secondly, although it is a matter of the procedures of the House, it would be better if there were a slightly longer period between the end of the Committee stage and the beginning of Report stage to give the Government more time to consider new drafts and explore the various legal implications of any sensible changes in the Bill's wording. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) agrees that my suggestion is along the lines of his extremely positive and constructive intervention.

It should be common ground between all of us who are concerned——

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): Sit down.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman does not like what I am saying. I do not think that he cares about the quality of tax legislation or parliamentary sovereignty, although he mouths all the right rhetoric about democracy and accountability. It is a great pity that I do not receive support on such issues on which there should be consensus among all parliamentarians, irrespective of specific views on the substance or content of the policies.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): There are two advantages in changing the timetable for discussion of the Finance Bill. First, it might mean that future debates on it would not clash with Conservative Members' visits to Buckingham palace, which interfere with proper discussion of the Bill. Secondly, future discussions would take place in the middle of winter and Conservative Members might be more concerned about Government policies to impose VAT on the fuel bills of elderly people who will suffer as a result.

Mr. Davies: I gladly concede that the hon. Gentleman is ingenious in finding ways of raising the issue of VAT. He knows my views on that; I do not attempt to avoid the subject—I have not done so in the past, and will not do so in future. I do not resent the hon. Gentleman for raising the subject once again. It seems to be, not only natural and right, but a considerable privilege for Members of Parliament occasionally to be offered invitations by Her Majesty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What does that have to do with the amendment? I must insist that the debate continues purely and simply along the lines of the amendment.

Mr. Davies: I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will concede that it had nothing at all to do with the amendment but everything to do with the intervention of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts). You know that it is not my habit to run away from points made by hon. Members

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It must be the habit of the hon. Gentleman to take note of instructions from the Chair—two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. Davies: I take the view of the Chair.

I shall return to the point that I was making at the beginning of that series of interventions. Although it is important for the House to be concerned about the broad strategy of fiscal policy—which is of enormous significance to the economy and the country—it is also extremely important for Parliament to be able effectively to scrutinise the details of any legislation, including those of the Finance Bill.

Those of us who were in the private sector before we came to this place know that the devil is often in the detail. One thing that we do in the private sector when we are signing or proposing to sign a contract is read the detail. Surely that principle must apply as much to the Finance Bill as to any aspect of law making.

The Labour party has made it easy for me this afternoon because it has tabled an amendment that, by general agreement, is technically deficient or would produce a complete perversity if passed because we would end up with less time for parliamentary scrutiny, not more. Therefore, I have no dilemma at all, morally or otherwise, and I can say with great enthusiasm that I shall vote against the amendment. Nevertheless, I am glad that we have had a further opportunity to discuss the broad issues of principle that have been raised in this debate.

Mr. Dorrell: We have had a wide-ranging debate on this subject this afternoon. The question before the House is relatively narrow—it concerns the consequences for parliamentary procedure of the move to a unified Budget, which was announced by the former Chancellor in the 1992 Budget.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and other hon. Members expressed support for the principle of a unified Budget. The hon. Gentleman even let slip the phrase that he was "enthusiastically in favour of" at least this aspect of the Government's approach to budgetary matters. I am grateful for that support and I share the enthusiasm that has been expressed on both sides of the House.

As the hon. Gentleman made clear, the principal purpose of moving to a unified Budget is to ensure that debate of the budgetary proposals—whether revenue or expenditure oriented—tabled by the Government is better informed and takes place against the background of a recognition of the fiscal realities that any Government face.

It is important to be clear that we are talking about the introduction of a unified Budget. None the less, it is a Budget that will be presented to the House as the Government's proposals and for which the Government will then seek the support of the House with regard to taxation and expenditure. We are not adopting the ideas that have been discussed for many years for a green Budget. When the Finance Bill is published, it will not be in the form of a consultative document—it will be the Government's proposals, for which we shall seek the support of the House and Parliament as a whole.

Nor are we moving in the direction of splitting the traditional Finance Bill between technical measures and tax rate questions—a distinction that some people who are interested in the subject have sought to draw. That distinction is easier to describe in general theory than to recognise in precise practice. It would also lead to two Finance Bills passing through what is already a crowded legislative programme, which is not a proposal that the Government find attractive.

We are talking about a specific Government proposal that the revenue and expenditure aspects of the budgetary process should be brought together into a single process of government during the late summer and autumn of the year and a single process in Parliament that is based on the presentation of the unified Budget in late November or early December.

Against that background, I refer to the proposal tabled by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East for consideration today. He said that he did not understand why the Government felt it necessary to include in the Finance Bill specific proposals for changing the operation of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968. He asked why we had to move so quickly: why could we not simply leave things as they are and see how they work in the new world? As I explained in an intervention in his speech, simply leaving things as they are is not an option because if the existing Provisional Collection of Taxes Act were allowed to operate without amendment it would have the effect of curtailing significantly the time available for parliamentary debate.

5.15 pm

It is therefore incumbent on the Government to propose changes to the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act to preserve the scope for proper parliamentary debate. The policy steer that has led to that provision being included in the Bill is that we are seeking to replicate in the new world the provisions for parliamentary scrutiny that have existed until now. Essentially, we are replicating the status quo. As I said in an intervention on the hon.

Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), we are replicating the status quo but, in so far as we are changing it at all, we are changing it in the direction of extra parliamentary time.

I shall go through the proposed changes to demonstrate to the Committee that the effect of the changes is not, as is suspected in some parts of the House, to curtail debate but simply to replicate the existing arrangements and marginally to increase the time available for debate.

First, I shall examine this subject from the point of view of the change in the total time between Budget day and the day on which the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act authority expires. Under the old system, over the past six years we have seen Budget days vary between the latest date of 20 March and the earliest date of 10 March. Let us say that, on average, Budget day in the old world was fixed at 15 March. Although we originally said that the new Budget day would be some time near the end of November or the beginning of December, we have since refined that to place the emphasis on the new Budget day being at the end of November. Therefore, I take it as a working hypothesis that the new Budget day will be 25 November.

The difference between 15 March and 25 November is roughly three months and 20 days. We have brought forward the anticipated Budget day by roughly three months and 20 days. Our proposal is to bring forward the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act day from 5 August to 5 May. That brings it forward by exactly three months. Therefore, we are bringing forward Budget day by 20 days more than we are bringing forward the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act day, the consequence being that the gap between the two dates is 20 days longer than it is under the present arrangements. That does not lead to a curtailing of parliamentary debate.

The second stage of the argument is that hon. Members say that the calculation takes no account of the effect of recesses on the time available for parliamentary scrutiny. Let us examine the effect of recesses on the lengthened time that will be available between Budget day and the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act day. Under the existing system, between 15 March and 5 August we must accommodate the Easter recess, which normally runs for between one and one and a half weeks—let us say one and a half weeks—and the Whitsun recess, which is always precisely one week. My hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) referred to time in August which is, in reality, no longer available for parliamentary scrutiny because most hon. Members would receive extremely badly the suggestion that Parliament should sit into August.

The effect of the existing arrangements is to take out of the time available for parliamentary scrutiny one and a half weeks at Easter, one week at Whit and a further week at the end of the process—a total of three and a half weeks. Under the new arrangements, we shall continue to have to accommodate the Easter recess in one and a half weeks, and the Christmas recess, running probably to three weeks. So there will be four and a half weeks of recess time —an increase in the amount of recess time falling between Budget day and PCTA day of roughly one week. Of the 20 days extra time available, on a crude analysis one week or seven days is taken by extra recesses, leaving an additional 14 days—13 on the precise mathematics—available for parliamentary scrutiny.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Let us be clear what we are quarrelling about. Our fear is that under the new structure the Finance Bill will not be published until after Christmas and that there will be unstoppable pressure to complete the Committee stage before the Easter recess. If the Financial Secretary can say either that the Finance Bill will be published before Christmas—so that we and interested parties may study it over Christmas—or that the Government will be willing to continue the Committee stage after the Easter recess, our objections will be met.

Mr. Dorrell: I made it clear in Committee, and I repeat, that I cannot give an assurance that in all circumstances the Finance Bill will be published before Christmas. Nor can I give an absolute assurance that in all years, however late Easter falls, the Committee stage will continue after Easter. What if, for example, Easter fell at the end of March? It does not seem inconceivable that the Committee stage could continue after an Easter day falling in March. The key point is that we must leave time after the Committee stage for Report and Third Reading on the Floor of the House and due time for the Bill to be considered briefly in another place.

If the PCTA date is moved to 5 May as the Government propose, it does not seem to follow that in a normal year Third Reading in this House need be at any time before 30 April. So if the procedure in this House is to close on 30 April and Easter is in March, it is clearly possible to encompass a final week in Committee in April and Report and Third Reading in time for the process to be completed by the end of April.

I had intended to deal with that point by considering the timetable. The third perspective on the timetable is that under the existing arrangements the Finance Bill has been published in recent years roughly on 15 April. In practice, under the existing arrangements we must complete Third Reading in this House by 25 July, which is three months and 10 days. Under the new arrangements, even if the Finance Bill is published after Christmas—it would be published about 10 January—I do not think that in normal circumstances it would be necessary for us to complete Third Reading in this House before 30 April.

Under the new arrangements, therefore, the time between publication and Third Reading would be three months and 20 days, whereas under the existing arrangements the time between publication and Third Reading is three months and 10 days. On that analysis, roughly 10 days more parliamentary time would be available for considering the Finance Bill than there is under the existing arrangements.

I have not sought to argue that under our proposals there will be massive extra time for parliamentary scrutiny. I argue that they broadly replicate our present arrangements and that, in so far as they amend them, they do so by increasing the effective time available for consideration of the issues in this House by making available anything up to 10 days of extra parliamentary time. On that basis, I commend the Government's proposals to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 207

RESIDENCE: AVAILABLE ACCOMMODATION

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I beg to move amendment No. 28, in page 160, line 24, leave out from beginning to end of line 4 on page 161.

A Budget that raises taxes, extends value added tax to domestic fuel, readjusts advance corporation tax in such a way as to impose a substantial burden on charities and pension funds, places a 1 per cent. increase on employees' national insurance contributions, refrains from indexing allowances and, in particular, restricts mortgage tax relief and married couple's allowance to the new 20 per cent. tax band, especially when combined with significant increases in excise duties—most noticeably, duties on petrol and cigarettes—is a tax-raising Budget.

The House now has a rare opportunity to discuss a tax concession. Admittedly, it is one that will cost only some £10 million in 1994-95. Nevertheless, it is a reduction in the tax burden. Over and over again, the Chief Secretary has spoken about the need for deficit reduction, tax increases and public expenditure cuts. Admittedly, he says less about why we are in this position, and he did not make these points so forcefully before the last general election, but he makes them emphatically now.

Let us take the Chief Secretary at his word. Let us also take at his word the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), who said yesterday:

"If one's country is bust".—[Official Report, 12 July 1993; Vol. 228, c. 757.]

We were also told by the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) that the Budget contains serious errors of judgment. If we are indeed in such difficult circumstances, as even Conservative Members seem to allege that we are, it must be extraordinarily difficult—I think that we understand the difficulty—for the Government to give a tax break to anyone. However, after careful consideration, the Conservative Government have found a group of people who, even in these difficult times, require a tax concession.

Who are these people? I know that the most compassionate of my hon. Friends, amazed at the discovery of a group of disadvantaged citizens so deserving of relief that even this Government have noticed their plight, will be wondering if enough is being done for those people. Suggestions of food parcels, perhaps, could well emanate from my hon. Friends.

These people are not the poorest, most downtrodden in our society. This relief that the parliamentary Labour party is seeking to withdraw is to go to people who have substantial means, who are rich—people to whom the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), the former Chancellor, used to refer as the internationally mobile. This concession to them is being made at a time when the rest of the people of this country are being urged to tighten their belts.

The clause weakens the available accommodation test for residency. It is a relief that, were he to return to this country—if only to ask for his money back from the Conservative party—would be available to Mr. Asil Nadir. There are those who think that the Conservative party has already done enough to help Mr. Nadir, but that is clearly not the view of Treasury Ministers. Indeed, his plight—not his flight—and that of those like him was given extra special consideration by the Financial Secretary before the clause was inserted in the Bill.

In Committee, I was able to make reference to the script for a first-rate Granada Television "World in Action" programme that dealt with tax avoidance and evasion. There was a scene in it—to which I did not refer in Committee but which, I am sure, will inform the debate on the Floor of the House—that included a very familiar landmark, and the commentator said that this was another of Asil Nadir's tax havens. You will be astonished to hear, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this was a shot of the fountain in Trafalgar square. The commentary went on as follows:

"WORLD IN ACTION has discovered that UK tax rules allowed Nadir a privileged status known as non domicile. So although he was one of the richest men living in Britain he paid comparatively little tax here. But our tax laws allowed Nadir to acquire several homes in Britain. Through an offshore trust he owned a country mansion, Baggrave Hall in Leicestershire."

The commentator went on to quote a tax partner from Moores Rowland, a Mr. Eastaway, who said:

"To have a non UK domicile is one of the great secrets of turning the United Kingdom into a tax haven."

5.45 pm

I am not sure that the House wants to turn the United Kingdom into a tax haven. I am certainly not sure that, in this time of stringency, when substantial imposts are necessary for all our other fellow citizens, we should be making an albeit relatively modest relaxation in the rules to give money to people who already seem to have rather large sums of money available to them. I do not understand why we should do that, especially in the present economic climate.

The Financial Secretary, in fairness to him, tried to explain it in Committee. As an explanation of why the clause was in the Bill, he said:

"It was represented to me, very persuasively, that"—the clause——"has dissuaded business men—and, indeed, tourists, though my principal concern is business men—from including this country in the range of options that they consider when making business decisions."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 24 June 1993; c. 592.]

The words that stick in my mind from that speech are "very persuasively". I am not certain what the Financial Secretary meant by those words, but "Business Age" magazine draws our attention to some £71 million worth of unexplained money in the Conservative party's accounts. "Business Age" has provided a helpful guide to the big donors and their possible motivation, on the assumption that that motivation extends beyond disinterested public spirit.

The reason most frequently cited for giving these large donations to the Conservative party is that it is in recognition and support of the Government's retention of favourable tax breaks for United Kingdom overseas subjects. Those donors are just the sort of people who could benefit from the changes that we are now discussing.

What sort of an argument is £71 million? To borrow an expression from the Financial Secretary, it is a very persuasive argument. It is my contention that if, in difficult times, it is necessary to increase the tax burden on our fellow citizens, any concession has to be very carefully considered. This is a concession to very rich people who do not, in any event, pay their fair share of tax in this country. We make this concession at a time when we are being asked, in the same Finance Bill, to make the most regressive changes to the value added tax regime that it would be possible to devise.

Let me make it clear that I would not give these tax-dodging scoundrels the benefit of this clause in any event. It is a handout from the public purse that cannot be justified. In the present circumstances, it is positively grotesque.

Mr. Beith: I share the view of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) that this is a worrying aspect of the Finance Bill. Like him, I studied the "Business Age" list of a series of donors to the Conservative party and was very struck by the way in which the motives were listed. There appeared again and again the motive of supporting the maintenance of tax breaks for United Kingdom subjects overseas. There were one or two large donors whose motives were described as completely unexplained. But there was a very large group —it includes people who, I believe, would say this quite clearly, and probably publicly, if asked—who were grateful to the present Government of the United Kingdom for maintaining a situation in which they felt that they were relatively favourably treated under United Kingdom tax laws. The sort of concession which is at the heart of that is the ability to take advantage of the residence rules.

It is difficult for Ministers to detach themselves from these issues when explaining them to the House. It is particularly difficult for the Paymaster General. When he was the Conservative party's vice-chairman and working at Conservative central office, I think that all these things must have passed him by. I cannot imagine that he was involved with any of the mysterious, undisclosed accounts that were published by river companies. I think that they just stuck him behind a desk, that it all passed him by and that it was handled by other people. I suspect that a lot of that goes on in Conservative central office.

What is becoming increasingly clear, however, is that a large number of people overseas are now prepared to put very substantial sums of money in the way of the Conservative party, if it is considered appropriate to do so, by way of accounts held overseas whose purposes are unidentified. Some people and some groups are prepared to do that because they like the tax treatment that is afforded to United Kingdom subjects who are resident abroad.

There are other motives. There are those who want a favourable regulatory regime for their companies. Others are concerned about foreign policy issues. The single largest group, however, appears to be those who find this kind of tax treatment advantageous to them. When the Minister seeks to explain this, he will be judged not simply by his explanation but against the background of the substantial donations that have been made to his party by people who like this sort of thing.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) sounded more than mildly implausible when whipping themselves into a synthetic fury over this question. If it were true that the Government were interested in finding ways of safeguarding nefarious activities of the kind about which they are both concerned, it is profoundly improbable that it would have been this Government who tabled a proposal in 1988 to revise precisely the rules that apply now to the taxation of United Kingdom residents who are not domiciled in this country.

The issues that the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Gentleman have hinted at are on the table and in the public domain at least in part because the Government published a consultative document in 1988 that launched public discussion of exactly the issues that they raised. Neither of them, however, chose to tell the House about the results of that consultation. Virtually with one voice, the representations to the Government on that subject, from those of all political persuasions, were that it would be damaging to Britain's interests to go down the route that had been suggested in the consultative document, a document tabled on the authority of Ministers of this Government in 1988.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Most of the representations—not all of them, I accept—were from people who would be disadvantaged if the changes were made.

Mr. Dorrell: That hardly distinguishes this representation from any other representations in which the Government are engaged. My point is that the overwhelming majority of the representations were hostile to the ideas that Ministers of this Government had tabled.

Arguments were advanced in principle against the proposals. The arguments that were advanced—by, I stress, people of all political points of view—were precisely from the perspective of the disadvantaged citizen, the perspective that was espoused so eloquently by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East. The argument was—I find it persuasive—that to go down the route envisaged in the 1988 consultative document would make this country a less attractive place in which internationally mobile business men, whom the hon. Gentleman correctly identified as a legitimate target for consideration, could do business.

It was for that reason that the proposals in the consultative document were dropped. The announcement was made in 1989. As far as I know, there was no great outcry from either the Labour party or the Liberal Democrats when the decision was announced, because it was recognised to be in response to public concern.

The clause is motivated by precisely the same perspective and the same thought processes as those that led to the dropping of the 1988 proposal—that when considering who should pay tax in this country, the Government ought to pay regard to the proper priorities if we are to attract internationally mobile business activity to the United Kingdom. It was for that reason that we dropped the 1988 proposal. We did so in response to public consultation. Precisely the same reasons led us to table the clause; therefore, I oppose amendment No. 28.

I want tax to be raised fairly from people who are resident in this country. I also want there to be a tax system that is friendly to internationally mobile businesses. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East made it clear that he regards that as a secondary objective. I regard it as a primary objective.

Amendment negatived.

VALUE ADDED TAX: PENALTIES ETC.

Amendment made: No. 16, in page 167, line 13, leave out 'and' and insert—

'(aa) in paragraph (b) of subsection (5) of that section, for the words from "have power" to the end of that paragraph there shall be substituted "have power under section 15A below to reduce a penalty under this section,"; and'.—[Sir John Cope.]

Schedule 5

REMOVAL EXPENSES AND BENEFITS

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 200, line 26, leave out '6th April 1993' and insert '4th April 1994'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 13, in page 200, line 28, leave out '6th April 1993' and insert '4th April 1994'.

No. 11, in page 200, line 30, leave out '6th April 1993' and insert '4th April 1994'.

Mr. Beith: This group of amendments is all about relocation expenses and their tax treatment. The amendments would delay the implementation of the new regime for taxing relocation expenses.

The issue was dealt with fairly extensively in Committee, but we were unable then to persuade the Government to raise the cap that they have placed on those relocation expenses that are non-taxable. We proposed that that tax threshold should be very much higher to reflect the real relocation costs. We propose in the amendments that there should at least be a transitional period.

The Government have just told us how important it is to provide favourable—indeed, generous—tax treatment to internationally mobile business men, yet they have failed to accept the case put to them by British industry that there should be more favourable tax treatment of those who are forced to move if business in this country is to be successful and efficient.

We are talking about firms that need to relocate people, if they are to succeed. We are referring to firms that have to cope with major changes in their industry and in their markets. We are referring also to firms that are having to adapt and to firms that are feeling the consequences of the recession, yet they are trying to keep people in employment. Often, the only way in which they can keep people in employment and avoid redundancy is by relocation. They may relocate a whole plant to another site, or they may strengthen, through importing skilled people, a plant that would otherwise go to the wall. Relocation of this kind is important if businesses are to be flexible and able to adapt.

Relocation is difficult to achieve in the United Kingdom context, because of our housing problems. The rented housing sector is largely dominated by local authority housing, which makes it very difficult for people to move from one area to another. The private housing sector has been severely affected by the consequences of the recession. When, therefore, a company says to somebody, "We want you to move," he is likely to reply, "I can't afford to move on my wages." The company then has to construct a package that makes it feasible for that person to move.

The package will often involve help with removal expenses, but that is only the beginning of the story. It may be some time before the person concerned can sell his house or buy a house in the area where he has been relocated. All sorts of additional ancillary costs that affect families may be involved. Most of the firms involved—for example, Barclays bank, which does a great deal of this, estimate that the cost of relocation is between £20,000 and £30,000. That is the average cost of many of these removal and relocation packages. The Government, however, have set their face against accepting that that is the average cost of relocation packages. We seek to persuade them at least to make provision for a transitional period.

I have said that the Government have set their face against relocation expenses at this level. That is not quite the case. Among people in the public sector, there has been considerable concern about how, given the provision, they will relocate. Several Government Departments are involved in substantial relocation activity. Indeed, hon. Members of all parties have been trying to persuade the Government to relocate some of their work—to transfer it from the south-east to the areas of highest unemployment, for example.

Other factors are involved in the relocation of Government Departments. Am I right in thinking that the Treasury has approved the grossing up of relocation expenses above the £8,000 limit paid to civil servants? Is it true that Departments know perfectly well that £8,000 is well below the real figure? I believe that they know perfectly well that much larger relocation packages will be necessary. It seems to me that Departments have been told by the Treasury that £8,000 is a figure plucked out of the air to be put in the Finance Bill. It appears that the Treasury is saying, "If you find that it is necessary to pay people £15,000, £20,000 or £25,000, you must gross up the amount. You must pay that amount plus what is necessary to bring it up to the amount originally intended." It is nonsensical if the Treasury itself—the very Department responsible for the Bill—has already admitted that the amount is too small and if Departments are already being told to get around the rules so that people may receive the much larger amounts that they know are involved.

It is likely that the Government's proposal will be harmful to industry. Firms will have difficulty with relocation packages unless they adopt the strategy that the Treasury is suggesting to Government Departments. Labour mobility will be harmed and relocation costs will be increased. Firms will have to gross up, as the Treasury suggests. There may be even harm to inward investment, which often involves foreign firms in the relocation of personnel in order to have key people at a new plant. Firms already struggling with relocation because they must concentrate operations on a single site will face higher costs. Training will be undermined as firms lay off partially trained people and re-employ to save on the expenses of relocating skilled people.

In these circumstances, the very least we must ask of the Government is that they provide a little more time for industry to adapt to the new and very restrictive regime. The proposals extend to a 12-page schedule, so they will clearly be quite complicated to implement. A period of grace would at least be of some help. If a new system were started on 6 April, there would be a period of notice of only two weeks—the interval between the Budget and the beginning of the financial year. No business plans relocation on the basis of a two-week period. Relocations are planned on a time scale of months or years. Many relocations already in progress have been planned long ago. In some cases, employees will be liable to tax on, say, £25,000—or £25,000 minus £8,000—while in others they will not, depending on the removal date. Some people in a firm will be adversely affected. If there were a period of notice—if this provision did not have to be implemented until next April—firms could plan around the scheme; thus, we could avoid a situation in which some people involved in a particular relocation exercise were much more favourably treated, from a tax point of view, than others.

Industry ought to be given some time to adapt. I hope that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury will not further distract the Financial Secretary as this is a matter that industry regards as very important. A period of grace would at least help us through the worst of the aftermath of the recession. The Government's view—we all hope that they are right—is that recovery is under way. A further year before the falling of the axe on tax-free relocation expenses would give a little more opportunity to firms still adapting as a direct consequence of recession, so that they would not have to abandon relocation packages on the ground that they could not afford them, or gross up at considerably greater cost.

It is clear that Departments recognise that the Government's £8,000 is inadequate. Obviously, the Treasury is aware of that fact. Industry feels very strongly about the matter—I have in mind the Confederation of British Industry, the Engineering Employers Federation and many other organisations. This is a last chance for the Government at least to provide a little more time before implementation of their proposal.

Mr. Dorrell: The right hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he favours a system that encourages flexibility where it is necessary for a business to move its operations. He agrees that unnecessary obstacles should not be put in the way of such mobility. I agree. It is important that the system be sufficiently flexible to facilitate mobility where it is clearly in an employer's interests to move an activity from one part of the country to another. But that is rather different from the notion that mobility is a public good, that employers should receive tax treatment to encourage them to make some of their activities mobile. When an employer decides to move an activity from one area to another, he should not have to deal with unnecessary obstacles. However, the tax system should not in any way encourage such a decision. In this regard, the system and the public interest should be entirely neutral.

The changes that we are introducing remove what has amounted to a mild tax subsidy for a particular type of activity. The right hon. Gentleman has suggested that some people regard £25,000 removal packages as the norm. I simply do not believe that that is the normal cost of moving an individual from one part of the country to another. If it is the average, how is it that anybody ever moves house other than when paid by his employer to do so? Hon. Members ought to bring their critical faculties to bear on questions that we debate. Representations from interested groups to the effect that the average removal cost is £25,000 should be subjected to critical analysis. If they were analysed critically, they would be found to be wanting. The right hon. Gentleman asked me about grossing up in the case of public sector employees. That is not unknown, although we examine cases critically. When grossing up takes place, whether in this or in any other context, it is for Departments to decide what they need to do within the resources available to them. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary made the position very clear in the Standing Committee: he said that he would not entertain a suggestion that extra resources should flow to a Department that wanted to move people and to pay individuals' tax associated with the removal. Indeed, this flows from the policy stance that the Government have consistently adopted in respect of grossing up in the case of civil servants' tax bills.

Mr. Beith: I accept that no additional resources will be provided to enable Departments to gross up, but I should like to ask the Financial Secretary to confirm that Departments are examining, or have had to examine, relocation packages of more than £8,000, for which grossing up must be considered.

Mr. Dorrell: If a Department chose to gross up, it would be because it had decided that it needed to make a payment to a civil servant in respect of a removal in excess of £8,000. It is not a question whether the figure in excess of £8,000 includes an amount that is properly defined as betterment and, therefore, properly taxable. Spending Departments make payments to civil servants all the time, which are subject to tax. The question is not whether the payment is exceptional but whether it should be subject to tax. Against that background, we recognise that in order to move civil servants, or to encourage people in other walks of life to move, grossing up payments will be made. The principle is that the payment includes an element of betterment which is properly subjected to income tax. That principle underlies the provisions.

The Government have tabled what we believe are sensible proposals for transition. I cannot commend the amendment. The House should be aware that its practical effect would be not to extend the transition period but to abolish it. The Government have already withdrawn the extra statutory concessions with effect from 5 April this year, which were the arrangements whereby removal expenses were previously exempt from tax. It is only by allowing the Bill to be passed in its present form that the transitional provisions would reach the statute book. Although the right hon. Gentleman may have preferred a longer transitional period, I hope that he will recognise that the effect of the amendment would be not to lengthen but to abolish the transitional arrangements proposed by the Government. Against that background, I hope that he will feel able to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Beith: I do not accept the Minister's technical argument. We know that the matter proceeded on the basis that the extra statutory concession was withdrawn after a decision by Ministers. The extra statutory concession could have been used and could still be used as a vehicle for concession.

I do not accept the Minister's rather cavalier approach to grossing up. In this context, as in most others, grossing up is a device to ensure that what the employee and the employer—in this case, the employer being the Government—think might reasonably be a tax-free payment is still treated as if it were a tax-free payment and that the sum that the person involved receives in his hand is the same as if the payment had been tax free. It is a device, and one that should not be commended by the Treasury. The fact that the Treasury commends it suggests that the Treasury recognises internally that it has gone too far in setting the £8,000 limit.

For the Minister to argue that the issue should be dealt with in a tax-neutral way, and that it is wrong to treat relocation as a public good and therefore to allow any sort of concession, is an argument against having even a £8,000 limit. The logic of his case is that there should be no concession at all.

Ministers should be cautious about using the public good argument in matters of mobility. As they are transported to work in their chauffeur-driven cars on journeys on which they pay no tax, unlike other people, I hope that they will recline in their leather-covered seats —if they qualify for cars that have such seats—and ask themselves whether there is really any public good in their journeys being tax free. They should realise that other people have been told by their employers that if they want to keep their jobs they must move to the other end of the country, when the most that employers can put together to make such a move feasible, and without their paying tax, is £8,000. Otherwise, all the costs that employers find it necessary to subsidise, such as the cost of keeping two houses going until one can be sold, will be treated as a taxable benefit and the person involved will be taxed on it. That is not reasonable, and it is a perfectly sound argument for carrying the protest to a vote.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Portillo): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

[Mr. Michael Portillo]

It is some time since the Budget. We have been involved since then in detailed discussion of the Bill in Committee, and it is perhaps timely to set the Finance (No. 2) Bill once more in its strategic context.

Recently, there has been a lot of good news about the economy. We have had growth in the gross domestic product for the past three quarters and encouraging statistics on inflation and industrial production. We have seen the latest figures for retail sales rising by 3 per cent., and there has been good performance on exports. Business optimism is at its highest level for 10 years and today's figures for manufacturing output show that it rose by 1·8 per cent. in May. In the first five months of the year, manufacturing output recovered by more than half the total loss it sustained during the recession. In the past four months, even the figures for unemployment have been encouraging, very much against the expectations of many commentators.

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development forecasts that Britain will have the fastest growth of any major European Community country in 1993, and that that will be repeated in 1994. Those are all encouraging statistics. The principal threat to our economic prospects now comes from the size of our fiscal deficit.

The threat posed by the size of the deficit is not removed by the series of good figures that we have had, although recovery is now clearly established across a range of indicators in the economy. Part of our deficit is caused by the cycle, by reduced receipts to the Government, and by extra money that the Government have to pay out in benefits to the unemployed. None the less, the Government have made provision in their new public spending plans to count separately those elements that are due to the cycle, and to focus upon the new control total.

Whatever the extent of the cyclical elements within the present fiscal deficit, to say that some elements are cyclical is not the same as saying that they will unwind automatically at the end of the recession. If one went to one's bank manager and said that one's large overdraft did not matter because it was merely cyclical, the bank manager would not be impressed, and would not let one off paying the debt interest.

That is the position in which the Government find themselves. The burden of debt interest is rising sharply and, over the next few years, it will rise by £10 billion a year. That is money that cannot be devoted to the public spending programmes that many of my hon. Friends and other hon. Members might regard as desirable.

There are important reasons why the Government should maintain control of the public sector deficit. I do not believe that the people of this country who have had to make great sacrifices during the recession, or those in business who have had to retrench during the recession, have any desire to see their Government living beyond their means on a sustained basis, and there can be no moral case for doing so.

That is why the Government have developed a medium-term strategy for dealing with our public sector borrowing requirement. We have also embarked on establishing a rhythm of good decision making, which is a vital ingredient for the restoration of confidence.

The autumn statement was made in November by my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont). It set out for three years ahead the Government's public spending plans. In March this year, the Budget set taxation policy in a medium-term context, setting out the tax increases that will occur over the next three years.

That has been translated into the Finance (No. 2) Bill, consideration of which we are completing today. I believe that the rhythm of decision making—of decisions well thought out, well presented and stuck to—is a vital ingredient in restoring confidence. Its effects can now be seen in growing confidence, in the business optimism survey, which I have already quoted, which is the best for 10 years, and in the performance of the markets, with recent pressure on the pound being, if anything, upward rather than downward.

Mr. Betts: Of the £50 billion deficit this year, will the Chief Secretary tell the House how much he regards as cyclical, which will unwind naturally as part of any recovery, and how much is structural and will not unwind? Does he accept that there could be considerable damage to the unwinding of the cyclical element if the Government acted at the wrong time in the cycle to tackle the structural element?

Mr. Portillo: I should make it clear that to say that something is cyclical and that it will unwind is not the same thing. For example, the increase in the burden of debt interest is clearly cyclical, inasmuch as it is caused by the fact that the Government are borrowing more because they are spending more and receiving less. The fact that we have made those extra borrowings will not lead, at the end of the recession and when recovery is well under way, to our being let off the debt interest payment. The debt interest payment will still have to be made on the borrowings that have been incurred. So that which is cyclical and that which will unwind are not the same.

That is why, although one could make guesses about the cyclical element within the PSBR, the Government are rightly wary of pursuing that argument too far, because they recognise that not all the elements will unwind at the end of the period.

The Government are headed in the direction of reducing the public sector borrowing requirement by three routes: growth in the economy, which will help to reduce the cyclical elements to which the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) referred and which will mean that there will be less to spend on social security and that the Government's receipts will increase; the constraint of public spending; and the tax rises announced in the Budget.

I recognise that some of the measures in the Bill are unpopular with my hon. Friends and in the country. That is why I should like to thank my hon. Friends for the support that they have given to the measures in the Bill. It is in no way satisfying to me to have to propose tax increases to my hon. Friends, but I hope that at least it has dealt with the myth that, in some way, to raise taxes is an easy option, whereas to constrain public spending is not.

Both constraining public spending and raising taxes are extremely difficult. My hon. Friends have been willing to support the difficult measures proposed in the Bill because they value the objective of achieving, above all, sound public finances. They are committed to restoring the Government's finances. They recognise that the Government must not live beyond their means, and that that is what is expected of us by the people we govern.

Fairness is extremely important in the package that we put together. My hon. Friends have found difficult the proposals to extend VAT to fuel and power. I remind them that we have taken care in the Budget and the Bill to ensure that the extra taxes that we have to raise fall proportionately across the various divisions of income.

In the full year of the effects of the Bill, we will be raising an extra £10·5 billion of revenue. Of that, only £2·3 billion comes from the extension of VAT to fuel and power. The money will also come from the changed taxation of dividends, the change in taxation for the married couples allowance for those on higher tax rates, changes in taxation on company cars and the different treatment of mortgage interest relief, again confined to 20 per cent., and therefore affecting in particular those people on higher rates of tax.

Therefore, I believe that we have produced a package that is fair to people across the income ranges and I think it has been recognised as such by independent commentators.

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): Since the Chief Secretary says that fairness is important, can he tell the House, and in particular his hon. Friends whom he will ask to vote to impose VAT on gas and electricity, how much money he will put into the compensation scheme to ensure that it does not disadvantage the poor, the elderly and those with disabilities?

Mr. Portillo: No, I cannot give an exact answer. The appropriate time to make that announcement will be in the autumn. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security is under an obligation to make an uprating statement to the House in the autumn, and when he does so he will take into account all the factors which at the time affect his judgment about what the appropriate uprating should be. I do not believe that it is right to try to prejudice the decision that is best taken at that time.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): The Chief Secretary said that there were three routes for controlling the Budget deficit—restraining spending, increasing taxes and growth. He did not give any idea of the proportions that he thought would be contributed by each of those avenues. Can he give us a broad-brush idea of, for example, how much of the PSBR he expects to be dealt with by increased growth?

Mr. Portillo: The present prospects for the course of the PSBR and all the assumptions on growth and on other matters are set out in the Red Book. They show a declining path for the PSBR over the next five years. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to study those assumptions, he will find them all set out. What can be answered with absolute precision is the contribution to be made from taxation, which is an extra £6·5 billion in 1994-95, and £10·5 billion in 1995-96.

The Government are concerned not just with borrowing, important though that is, but also with the level of public spending. That has now reached a level of around 45 per cent. of GDP. The Government believe that the burden imposed by public spending on the wealth-creating sector should be kept to a minimum. If that burden is allowed to grow too much, it will choke off the wealth-creating sector.

We believe that those who create the wealth in our society should be left with the lion's share of that wealth. We do not believe that the state has a pre-emptive right to help itself to more than half of what is produced by the people of the country.

The Government are wary of the burden that is imposed by the state, and we have therefore now embarked upon a new public spending round. We confirmed, following last month's Cabinet meeting, that the new control total figures in cash that we intend to achieve for 1994-95 and 1995-96 are the same as those that were announced at the time of last year's autumn statement and which were confirmed in the Red Book, published at the time of the Budget.

The targets that we have set ourselves are challenging —perhaps more challenging than my hon. Friends realise. They assume virtually no growth in real terms, either between this year and next year or between next year and the year after.

Within the total of public spending that has been so restricted, important pressures have been set up by programmes that are demand-led. In particular, I think of education; many more students are predicted to go into higher education in the years ahead. There are also the demands from social security, which is far and away the largest public spending programme.

The task that faces us is to find ways of reducing the trend rate of growth of programmes. If public spending is limited as a total to zero growth in real terms, but some programmes within it, such as social security, are growing by 3 per cent. in real terms, that obviously sets up a problem. We must reduce the trend rate of growth of those programmes, and probably make savings in other programmes.

I have been gratified by the support that my hon. Friends have given to the Government's objectives for the control of public spending. Their support makes the task a great deal easier. I hope that, when we come to propose specific measures to the House, we shall find the same support for the specific measures which are necessary to deliver those totals which have the support of my hon. Friends. Public spending control is important, because it plays a vital part in establishing Britain's competitiveness.

During the 1980s, Britain's proportion of GDP that was taken up by public spending moved from close to and sometimes above the EC average to a level well below the EC average, and much closer to the American average, although still some way above the Japanese average. That is still true today.

The amount of public spending within GDP is an important component in the competitiveness of this country. It has enabled us to run low rates of taxation that are attractive to investors and to people who want to do business, and has also provided good incentives to people in this country who are doing business. We forget the attraction of low rates of direct taxation at our peril.

The Bill is crafted to impose the minimum disincentive upon our economy, and to maintain incentives to help industry to keep costs low. Of all the recent statistics on the British economy, the improvement in competitiveness has been the most satisfying and perhaps the most important. We have seen productivity grow by 8 per cent. in the past year to its highest ever level. Unit labour costs have fallen by about 3 per cent., whereas German unit labour costs rose last year by 10 per cent. The wage increases in British industry today are lower than at any time for 25 years.

I pay tribute to British management for many of those achievements. One would not expect productivity to rise during a recession. One would expect businesses to find it difficult to cut their costs as fast as they are losing orders. But British business has improved productivity to a record level and, as a consequence, we expect that competitiveness will improve by 20 per cent. in a single year. We also expect British business to improve its share of world trade for the first time in three decades.

Exports are at a record level, up by 6·5 per cent. on a year ago. Competitiveness should concern not only this country but the rest of the EC. The Community has been out-performed in economic terms by Japan in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s. The EC was also out-performed by the United States in the 1980s. The prospect, I am afraid, is that the EC will continue to be outperformed by both the US and Japan.

That is why it is important to maintain competitiveness and protect incentives in the way that the Bill does. It is also important, of course, that we remain firmly outside the social chapter of the Maastricht treaty, which would drive up our costs to the highest levels in Europe, and would affect our competitiveness.

Mr. Beith: The Minister pays tribute to British management. What about the British workers? They, after all, have shown great flexibility and have adapted to new technologies. A fair proportion of their colleagues and friends have now found themselves out of work as part of the process of bringing about lower costs for some manufacturing companies.

Mr. Portillo: I agree that the costs of the recession have been felt by everyone in Britain. That is one of the reasons why the Government must not be the only institution in Britain not to feel the effects of the recession.

I recognise that immense costs have been paid by those who have become unemployed. I also recognise the flexibility of the British labour market, which is and will continue to be one of its great strengths in the years ahead. It may be too early to tell, but one of the reasons why the unemployment figures have turned may be the greater flexibility of the United Kingdom labour market. If so, I pay tribute to both management and to work force.

I also pay tribute, if I may, to Government policies, which have, in the face of opposition from the Opposition parties, created a more flexible and more responsive labour market, which has enabled Britain to be competitive and unemployment to fall.

I hope that unemployment falls more quickly, as the recovery comes upon the economy, than it did in the 1980s. All the strategies that I have talked about are clearly exemplified within the Finance Bill, and demonstrate the Government's clear medium-term policy for the British economy.

I am bound to ask myself, "What has been offered to us by the Opposition? What have they put up by way of reasonable alternatives during discussions on the Bill?" First of all, I turn to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman). Ideally, a Chief Secretary to the Treasury should be flinty-faced, stony-hearted and odious. I believe that I fit the bill. But the shadow Chief Secretary also should be flinty-faced, stony-hearted and odious. To what extent does the hon. Lady fit the bill? Is she flinty-faced? No, she is kind and radiant-faced. Is she stony-hearted? No, she is open-hearted. She is generous to a fault. She wants to spend money on any good cause that is put her way. Those are not the natural instincts of a Chief Secretary.

Is the hon. Lady odious? Do Opposition spokesmen tremble over their pens when writing their speeches, worrying that they may inadvertently commit the Labour party to a new promise on public spending that has not been approved by the shadow Chief Secretary? I fear that they do not fear the hon. Lady. Indeed, I am afraid that they could not fear the hon. Lady. I am tempted to say that she has fragrance, and fragrance is not something which any Chief Secretary or shadow Chief Secretary should have.

My hon. Friends may protest that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) may appear better qualified for the job of shadow Chief Secretary. He is Grim Gordon, Gloomy Gordon, Glowering Gordon—indeed, anything other than Gay Gordon. He probably would make an admirable shadow Chief Secretary. Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman is shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it is incumbent upon him to come up with an economic policy. What have we had from the hon. Gentleman? He wishes to spend the receipts that are held by local authorities. He wishes, he says, to bring down unemployment to bring about a recovery. Both those aims demonstrate such complete economic illiteracy that I want to share it with the House.

If one were to spend the receipts of local authorities, which have after all been set aside against their debts, one would increase public borrowing and public spending. To say that one would be able to bring about recovery by reducing unemployment is nothing but a fudge. The House knows perfectly well that a recovery produced by the economic policies that we follow can reduce unemployment. It is not possible to reverse the process and say that one can reduce unemployment and thus bring about recovery.

The economy needs sound finances. It needs policies for sound finances. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East offers sound-bite finances. His policies were described by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) as sound bites strung together, and they do not constitute an economic policy. Unfortunately, that is all that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has to offer.

Moving up the scale, we come to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the Leader of the Opposition. He is the man who stands at the Opposition Dispatch Box and amuses the House. He is the man who makes speeches about hotels falling off cliffs and the grand national not starting properly, blames that on the Government and gets a laugh. One would think that he was auditioning to be the host of "Clive Anderson Talks Back". He is supposed to be auditioning for the role of Prime Minister. It is an extremely sad reflection on him that he is unable to come up to scratch. All around the country——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am sorry to sound like a spoilsport, but, before the right hon. Gentleman continues, I must ask what this has to do with the Third Reading of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Portillo: The connection with the Finance Bill, Madam Deputy Speaker, is that, during the passage of the Finance Bill, we had hoped to hear an exposition from the Opposition spokesmen about the Labour party's policies. Unfortunately, and to conclude this section, we have instead found a complete failure by the Opposition to put themselves forward as a reasonable Opposition and an alternative Government.

There is not a boardroom, factory floor or council estate in the country where any confidence is felt in the policies of the Opposition, even when people have read carefully the proceedings of the Finance Bill upstairs.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): So that the House can get him off the hook of that last passage, will the Chief Secretary now turn to serious matters and discuss the situation that will arise in the autumn when we will have the combined Budget? He has decided so much of the public expenditure that is settled for the next few years, much of which cannot be changed during the autumn Budget. What he can do in that Budget is raise taxation. He cannot adjust the balance between expenditure and revenue, because so much of the expenditure is already settled on.

Mr. Portillo: The right hon. Gentleman, by his tone, puts that forward as a criticism. The Government established a medium-term strategy for public spending, which is set out in the Finance Bill, and in all logic it will now bring together in a single statement both our plans for public spending—the details of how those totals are to be achieved—and our plans for taxation—any changes that may need to be made from the plans set out in the Finance Bill.

The right hon. Gentleman is criticising, apparently, the medium-term clarity that has been established by the Government. That clarity is, in my view, one of the great underlying strengths of our approach. That is also the view of the markets, which have shown their confidence over recent months.

Our economic strategy, as shown by the Bill, is clear. It extends beyond the three years covered by the public expenditure survey and beyond the years covered in the Bill. It clearly tells the nation what the Government want to achieve over the medium and long-term. We have a strategy for low inflation, and a clear medium-term framework to restore public finances. We have set fixed spending ceilings, above which we will not go. The Bill contains further measures for tackling the deficit in future.

We look forward to the unified Budget on which the right hon. Gentleman has just questioned me. In it, we will continue the steady and purposeful progress that we have made in achieving our economic objectives of low inflation, restored public finances and sustained growth. We shall make our choices. However difficult they may be, we shall make them. There will be many difficult decisions to take, but they will be taken well. We shall confirm that rhythm of good decison making about which I have spoken and which now underpins confidence.

A party that does not choose, or a party that cannot choose, is a party that does not govern. We are not afraid to choose, and that is why we now govern. When the critical economic decisions ahead have been made, the Government will present their package to the House, and we will then look to my right hon. and hon. Friends to support that package—as I know they will support the Finance Bill which is before us.

7.5 pm

Ms Harman: The Finance Bill makes it clear beyond all doubt that, because of the Government's failure on the economy over the past 14 years, the Conservative party is now the party of high taxation, high borrowing and high unemployment. Although the rhetoric is still there—we heard it again tonight—and although it was in the election addresses of Conservative Members and in the Tory manifesto, the Government's economic failure has led to a situation in which the rhetoric is wholly separate from reality. Conservative assertions about low taxation and sound public finance are now nothing more than an old aspiration that they have proved completely incapable of achieving.

It was clear from last night's debate that the Conservatives are divided, the Government are on the defensive and, worse than that, they have no strategy. Having failed to make the economy work properly, they are now—partly through desperation but also partly through dogma—planning this autumn to dismantle the welfare state. The autumn battle to defend public services will be a battle to defend the very heart of the welfare state.

The Chief Secretary said that there was good news on the economy, but the Finance Bill is dealing with the consequences of economic failure. If one looks at the measurements that matter—the growth of manufacturing output, gross domestic product and the change in manufacturing employment—the story is the same all round. We are way behind Japan. We are behind the USA. We are also behind Germany, Italy and France.

The Finance Bill does not contain any measures to help industry, but the Government have insisted on measures that threaten the North sea oil industry. Already today Shell has slashed exploration, which affects jobs.

Mr. Portillo: I am intrigued by the hon. Lady's comparison with Germany. I told her a moment ago that manufacturing output in this country had risen by 5 per cent. over the first five months of this year, while industrial production has fallen by 7 per cent. in Germany. How does she equate that with Germany being way ahead of us? Is she using a negative scale?

Ms Harman: I am not. The problem with Ministers is that they twist the baseline in order to present something that people know is completely at variance with reality. If we hear about the pound replacing the deutschmark, or of an economic miracle in this country, people will know that the Government are refusing to face reality. Therefore, there is no chance to put the economy right and deal with the deficit, and with investment in skills, in our infrastructure and in our industry.

The statement that the right hon. Gentleman has just made shows that he is more interested in presentation and trying to cover over the cracks of the Government's division than he is in having a serious economic policy to put right the deep problems in this country. He is not prepared to recognise the situation, so it is welcome that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) described the reality.

Last night, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West said that the Government were "near bankrupt". The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) described the country as "bust". However, it is not only the Tory Back Benchers who have been describing the Government's economic failure. We have had a Conservative analysis of the economic failure of the past few years which I would like to quote to the House.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): As the hon. Lady will not pursue the point made by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, can she explain how, when she makes an incorrect statement about German and British industrial production, that is perfectly fair, but when my right hon. Friend produces the correct figures, that is just a matter of presentation?

Ms Harman: The Chief Secretary to the Treasury did not produce the correct figures. If we consider the growth of manufacturing output in the G7 countries between 1979 and 1992, Japan had 50 per cent. growth; the United States had 32 per cent. growth; Germany had 23 per cent. growth; Italy had growth of 16 per cent.; France had growth of 7 per cent; and Canada had growth of 8 per cent. Would the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Milligan) care to volunteer the growth figure for the United Kingdom? I will give way to the Chief Secretary if he can tell us how we compare.

Mr. Dorrell: Perhaps the hon. Lady would like to tell the House what happened to manufacturing output under the last Labour Government.

Ms Harman: Against a figure of 50 per cent. growth in manufacturing output in Japan between 1979 and 1992, the United Kingdom had growth of barely 5 per cent. I am glad that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has intervened because I was about to quote from his analysis of the Government's economic failures. The Financial Secretary said:

> "Think back six years. The yuppie revolution was in full swing. It had a lot going for it. It encouraged young people to regard wealth creation as a benign activity. It broke class barriers. It embraced change. It exuded confidence. All of that was positive. But it was built on sand."

How right he was. In this Finance Bill, the country is paying the price of those years of economic failure.

The Financial Secretary went on to say that "the resources that were attracted, like moths to a lamp-bulb"— and to property development and to what the hon. Gentleman described as "the lure of easy money"— were wasted resources. He said:

> "Resources are scarce, and we cannot afford the luxury of"— and he then described his own Government's economic policy as "waste and distortion." I have to agree with the hon. Gentleman about that.

Mr. Dorrell: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Harman: No, I will not let the hon. Gentleman intervene.

Mr. Dorrell: Would the hon. Lady like to change her mind?

Ms Harman: No, I would not. I am afraid that I am going to be flinty-faced on this occasion.

This Finance Bill pays the price of economic failure, unemployment and the soaring cost of unemployment. When we consider the public sector borrowing requirement and the cost of unemployment, it is clear that the figures are enormous. The cost of unemployment in London and the south-east for one year is £8 billion. That is £8 billion just for one year to finance idleness, waste and forcing people to be on the dole.

That is why we have said all along that the reduction of unemployment should be at the heart of the Government's economic policy so that we can end the high dole bills and lift the fear of unemployment which, to this day, still hold the economy back. However, still lurking in the Government's view is the idea that the first objective is sound public finances, although the Government have failed to achieve that, and that somehow high unemployment is "a price worth paying".

Having failed to tackle unemployment, the Government are now turning on the welfare state.

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): By how much does the hon. Lady believe that the public sector borrowing requirement could be lowered by reducing unemployment?

Ms Harman: It is clear that the PSBR is too high. That is the price that has been paid for economic failure and for high levels of unemployment. Economic failure has been the result of failure to invest in training, skills and our infrastructure. We need to invest in those areas to set the economy to rights.

It is no longer any good for the Conservative party to posture as the party of sound finances. The Conservatives have ripped the finances of this country to pieces through the failure of their economic policy. Having failed to tackle unemployment, the Government are now turning on the welfare state.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Harman: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman cannot be trying to intervene on my point about the welfare state because clearly he has no connection with it. However, many people have.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury has said that the growth of the social security budget is "a sort of cuckoo in the nest."

He also said that

> "Prescription charges is only one of 100 different things to look at."

We have heard of a secret letter from the Secretary of State for Social Security referring to cutting and taxing invalidity benefit. He recognised in that letter that that would cause an outrage. The Government are turning on single mothers, complaining that they are on benefits and a drain on public finances. However, the Government deny them the child care and job opportunities that would enable them to work and be independent and able to support themselves and their children. That is what they want to do.

The Government have broken their promises. The Prime Minister said:

> "We have no plans and no need to extend the scope of VAT."

But that is exactly what the Government have done. The Government have said:

> "We are the only party that understands the need for lower taxation", but in this Finance Bill they have raised taxation. The Prime Minister has also said:

"I have no plans to raise . . . the level of national insurance contributions."—[Official Report, 28 January 1992; Vol. 202, c. 808.]

But that is exactly what he has done.

The Finance Bill raises taxes £17·5 billion over the next two years. It freezes personal allowances and puts 1p on national insurance contributions and it affects VAT. Even now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is warning that further tax increases are in the offing.

Tory Members cannot justify those tax increases on the grounds that they are the only way to raise public money. During this Finance Bill, we proposed 14 separate measures that would raise money, deal with tax abuses and plug tax loopholes. Not only did the Government reject them all—they would not even allow them to be debated.

The Tories would rather freeze personal allowances than abolish tax relief for private medical insurance. They want to subsidise people using private medical insurance and give them tax relief while freezing everyone else's personal allowances. The Government would rather put 1p on national insurance than tax the share options given to top executives. That is the Government's sense of priorities. In addition, of course, the Government would rather put VAT on gas and electricity than make the gas and electricity companies pay their fair share of corporation tax.

Treasury Ministers will no doubt claim that this Budget —this Finance Bill—has been a success. But it has cost the Government a Chancellor. It has cost the Government 400 Tory county councillors. It cost them the Newbury by-election and it will cost them the by-election in Christchurch.

How can the Government call it a success to increase taxes for the low paid and cause dismay among the elderly? The Chancellor is setting the scene for cuts in the welfare state and tax increases in the autumn Budget. But the country wants to see an economic policy that begins the task of putting our industry and economy back on their feet.

The Chancellor and the Chief Secretary, possibly over a bottle of champagne, might congratulate themselves on getting the Finance Bill through Parliament, but for the people of this country fear of this Bill will be followed by dread of the bills that they cannot pay. Parliamentary proceedings on the Bill may be drawing to a close, but the political fallout has only just begun.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): We have just heard the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) make some wild assertions. In particular, she mentioned the subject of tax relief for private medical insurance. She will remember that such tax relief is available only to those over the age of 60. When the proposal came before the House in an earlier Finance Bill, I did not vote in favour of it because I prefer not to increase the tax breaks that are available as a reduction of income tax. It will not be lost on the voters of Christchurch, 30 per cent. of whom are over the age of 60, that the hon. Lady is advocating, on behalf of the Labour party, that that tax concesson should be withdrawn.

I should like to consider three matters contained in the Bill which, as you reminded my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, Madam Deputy Speaker, is the subject of the debate.

I always look back on Finance Bills with a mixture of pleasure and disappointment. On Second Reading, I referred to the changes in the regime for petroleum revenue tax, and urged my right hon. and hon. Friends to improve the transitional relief offered. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary brought forward some further limited measures of transitional relief which the industry welcome, particularly the smaller companies towards which they are targeted. My hon. Friend knows, however, that I believe that those transitional measures do not go far enough.

The amendments which I tabled in Committee and which, with my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Sir C. Onslow) and others, I sought to table on Report, could not be debated on either occasion for technical reasons.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he had a meeting last Thursday with the Financial Secretary? Will he further confirm that he told the oil companies' representatives that same evening that a deal had been stitched up and that the Government were going to accept his amendments Nos. 40 and 41?

Mr. Watts: No, I cannot confirm that. I can confirm that there was a meeting between my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, representatives from a number of oil companies, myself, my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking and myself. At the conclusion of that meeting I certainly did not suggest to any representatives of the oil industry that any deal had been stitched up.

Mr. Hughes: Can the hon. Gentleman explain why I was telephoned on Friday morning, by a representative of an oil company who attended that meeting, and was asked, "Please will you make sure that no Labour Back Benchers sign the motion because, if they do, it will screw up the deal"?

Mr. Watts: I would have been very happy if I had been able to conclude a deal with my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, but that is not what happened. There may be some confusion in the mind of the person who spoke to the hon. Gentleman. At the conclusion of our meeting, we explained the way in which the amendments had been framed and why there were two separate sets of amendments.

We considered that one set of amendments would be technically in order for selection but would not produce the desired solution. The other set of amendments would have achieved our objective of a three-year relief period, but we understood that if the amendments were tabled by Back Benchers they could not be selected for technical reasons. They would be in order only if they were tabled by the Government.

Our amendments were tabled on Thursday, which is normally the last day for tabling amendments to be considered on Report. It was our outside hope that, if my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Treasury were convinced of the force of our argument, they could be persuaded to adopt our second set of amendments as Government amendments and provide a vehicle for them. It was not my intention, or that of any of my right hon. and hon. Friends, to convey to the representatives of the oil industry that any such deal had been struck. Indeed, as late as last evening, we discussed the matter further with my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had just returned from Brussels and we were grateful to him for making time to discuss the matter with us at such short notice. Sadly, the vehicle that we hoped to provide was not one that my right hon. and hon. Friends chose to ride in.

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that this is a very important point, especially as Shell has announced that it is going to cut back on its drilling because of the changes that the Government intend to introduce.

Mr. Duncan: That is not what it said.

Mr. Darling: It is what it said.

The hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) has mentioned that he had a private conversation with the Chancellor. Will he tell us whether the Government now accept that far more generous transitional relief must be offered to stop an even greater decline in exploration than that anticipated? That will have disastrous long-term consequences for the country's balance of payments.

Mr. Watts: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will answer for himself. It is not my understanding that my right hon. and hon. Friends are yet persuaded that there is a need to go further than the measures introduced in Committee.

The purpose of the amendments that I tabled, in Committee and on Report, was to obtain relief, in a tax neutral way, over a three-year transitional period. That would have been financed by restricting the reduction of PRT to 55 per cent. for that period rather than going immediately to the 50 per cent. rate mentioned in the Bill.

I am persuaded by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary's argument that the 50 per cent. rate of PRT will have the effect of stimulating further investment in existing mature fields, and that that will be beneficial to the future development of the North sea. I am not persuaded, however, that we will see such new investment in the near future. Any substantial investment will take two or three years to be productive. I believe that in that intervening period, exploration and appraisal activity will be subject to a marked decline before any major new investments come on stream.

Our proposals have been put in a number of different guises, but our intention has always been to smooth that transition. We want to give those parts of the industry that have been hardest hit by the tax changes more time to adapt. That would enable a high level of activity in the North sea to be maintained in the intervening period, and ensure smoother progress for our North sea oil industry.

Mr. Salmond: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify what happened at last week's meeting because I was given the same information as the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes)? It may be a question of who is misleading whom. Were the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends misleading the representatives of the oil companies with unwarranted expectations of success, or were he and his hon. Friends being misled by Ministers promising concessions that did not materialise?

It is to be regretted that the hon. Gentleman's amendments were not tabled on an all-party basis. If they had been, the issue could have been put to the test yesterday. Presumably, all-party amendments stand a better chance of selection than those tabled by Conservative Back Benchers.

Mr. Watts: I am clear in my own mind that neither I nor any of my right hon. or hon. Friends was misled by Ministers. It was not our intention to mislead any representative of the oil industry. I have tried to explain how I think some confusion may have arisen. I certainly did not give any indication to anyone in the industry with whom I was in contact that I believed that a deal had been done. I was certainly trying my hardest to bring about a solution, but we have failed. That is why I referred in my opening remarks to looking back on the Bill with a mixture of pleasure and disappointment. That failure is one of the disappointments.

Even at this late stage, I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Treasury to look again at what has happened in the North sea. Perhaps they will be proved to be right and that the anticipated dramatic reduction in activity will not occur or, at least, will not be sustained—activity in the North sea has already markedly declined.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) referred to the announcement by Shell UK Exploration and Production yesterday that it was reducing its manning levels by 30 per cent. I understand that there have been some denials about whether that was directly related to the change in the tax regime, but there is no doubt that it intends to reduce its exploration activity.

Mr. Duncan: Do not the statements that Shell UK Exploration and Production has made to the press make it explicit that its decisions were made a long time ago and that its decision to reduce its activity has nothing whatever to do with the change in the PRT regime announced in the Budget?

Mr. Watts: That may be what the company maintains, but it is reducing its activity and, not surprisingly, some people will link the changes in the tax regime with that fact.

Mr. Dorrell: This is an important point. Opposition Members were shouting "No" when my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) intervened. My hon. Friend is right. The statement issued by Shell UK Exploration and Production on 12 July says:

"The cost cuts in the exploration division of Shell ExPro are not due to the proposed budget changes in PRT."

Nothing can be more explicit than that.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Financial Secretary has unwittingly—no doubt not intentionally—misled the House by his intervention. The memorandum written by a responsible person at Shell says clearly:

"Doubtless you are aware . . . some very significant changes in petroleum revenue tax regulations will be implemented this year by the Government. The main effect that this will have on exploration is that our net costs will go up by a factor of four. In these circumstances, our exploration programme will have to be reassessed carefully."

That is at variance with what the Financial Secretary said.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That may be an important point, but it is certainly not a point of order for the Chair. It should be raised by means of an intervention if the hon. Gentleman is able to have the Floor.

Mr. Watts: The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) asked whether orderly amendments could have been tabled on an all-party basis. To achieve a tax-neutral package of transitions, we would have needed to propose that the rate of PRT be maintained at more than 50 per cent. We wanted the transition to be a three-year period, which is longer than that provided for in the Bill. However, any such amendments tabled by mere Back Benchers would have been ruled out of order. I understand that the orderly amendment that we tabled was not selected because it was considered that the matter had been adequately debated both in Committee of the whole House and in Committee upstairs.

Mr. Robert Hughes: In attempting to explain the position, the hon. Gentleman is simply causing further confusion. Why did he and his right hon. Friends table an amendment which they knew in advance was out of order, and tell the oil companies that they knew it was out of order, if they had not believed that something would happen to it? Surely that was the worst thing to do because it was kidding the industry along.

Mr. Watts: The hon. Gentleman clearly did not hear my explanation. Two sets of amendments appear on the amendment paper today. The first deals with an enhancement of the 18-month transition period and could have been selected had it not been deemed that the matter had been adequately debated. We knew that the second set of amendments was not in order. It was tabled by Back Benchers and set out what we considered to be the proper solution to the problem. The Government could have adopted it as a suitable vehicle had they been persuaded of our argument but, sadly, that was not the case.

Mr. Darling: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Watts: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman for the last time because I said that I would refer to three matters.

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way because I was the first hon. Member to raise the question of Shell. I have seen the text of the memorandum to which my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) referred. It says that the changed tax regime had made exploration four times more expensive. Shell has subsequently denied it, but companies do that sort of thing.

Our difficulty is that many Tory Back Benchers, including the hon. Gentleman, have unwittingly been sold a pup by the Government. Exploration and appraisal will suffer, and the oil companies may do better next time if they remember not to bother dealing with Tory Back-Bench Members or consultants, because that is throwing good money after bad.

Mr. Watts: Nobody has thrown money at me. I am not a consultant but I took an interest in the issue because it seemed to be a valid argument to pursue. I have financial interest neither in an oil company nor in a business representing an oil company. If I had such an interest, I would have declared it at the beginning of my speech. My understanding of the Shell memorandum is exactly as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) just stated. As he said, the company has now put a different gloss on the matter.

I was about to conclude my remarks on PRT by saying that I am still convinced that a substantial and damaging reduction in activity in the North sea could have been prevented had a three-year transition been provided. I hope that, if those of us who take that view are proved right and the Financial Secretary's more optimistic assumptions of what will happen in the next few months are proved wrong, even though it is too late Ministers will be prepared to reconsider the matter when preparing the November Budget and the next Finance Bill.

Lest it should be thought that I speak merely to pour condemnation on my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, let me say that he also gave me pleasure in Committee because, for five or six years, I have been arguing for a more favourable tax treatment of unit trusts selling into other European countries. The gist of the argument is that if unit trust companies could pay dividends gross to residents of other European countries, their export performance would be much better. Evidence suggests that that is so. Ten years ago, Luxembourg had virtually no such funds under management. It now manages £86 billion worth of funds and has outstripped the funds under British management.

I was therefore pleased when, in responding to the debate in Committee, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary said that suitable measures would be proposed in the November Budget and incorporated in the next Finance Bill following consultation with the industry in the intervening period. That was welcome news, not just for the industry but for the financial services industry in this country. To avoid doubt, may I confirm that I am not a consultant for the unit trust industry, although it kindly sent me a crate—12 bottles—of wine earlier this year. We excel in the financial services industry and could increase our earnings on exports to the European Community. The Bill's measures will be greatly welcomed.

The third and final measure to which I wish to refer is the abolition of the business expansion scheme. It was probably right for the Government to propose that the existing scheme should be brought to an end. However, faced with the loss of my legislative programme for the Finance Bill now that my proposals on unit trusts have been taken up, and needing to look for another cause, that new cause may be "Son of BES".

I am convinced that we need to provide a means of encouraging equity investment, particularly in small manufacturing companies and other small companies. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Treasury will consider how that might be done. If they do not make their own proposals, I may argue the case for the next five or six years until, in the fullness of time, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary or his successor—I expect that my hon. Friend will be in a more exulted position by that time —concedes that it is a good argument and introduces his own measures.

Overall, this is a good Bill, although the measures relating to PRT are unattractive. It presents a balanced approach to improving the state of the national finances, and it is a good foundation on which my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor can build as he prepares his Budget for presentation in November.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East) The Chief Secretary said at least one thing with which I agree: that on Second Reading, in Committee and on Third Reading, the main issues have remained the same. Those issues are the reneging on election promises, the failure to address the underlying problems in our economy, and the nature and effect of the huge tax increases that have been proposed and are to be introduced in the measure.

I think that all hon. Members will recall the clear commitments that were given before the general election. They were that there would be no extension of VAT, no increase in national insurance contributions and—a commitment given in the clearest of terms—tax decreases year on year. The excuse with which we have been repeatedly presented is that the circumstances that we now face have changed and were totally unforeseen when those honest commitments were given to the electorate before the general election.

However, the Chief Secretary said tonight that there was a lot of good news in the economy. He talked about the success in the last three quarters, the fact that unemployment was down, and forecasts that showed that we would have the highest growth of the nations of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. What on earth should we believe? If those success stories are correct, what are the unforeseen events that have happened since the Government gave those clear pre-general election commitments that there would be no tax increases?

Last night, I heard Conservative Members say that one can, in certain circumstances, renege on election pledges, but there has to be some honesty of intent. If the Government have honesty of intent, why are they boasting about the wonderful news in the economy? If there is wonderful news in the economy, where was the honesty of intent in those pre-general election promises? The Government cannot square the circle. One or the other of their claims is not true. The nation is getting sick of the Government's slick presentation and wants them to give the facts about the problems that face the country.

A couple of years ago, when we were enjoying a huge budget surplus, the Government took the opportunity to decrease taxes, and they gave those decreases to the better-off in society. The biggest single adjustment they made was the abolition of all tax grades above 40 per cent. That act alone gave more than £2 billion to those who are better off.

Now that we are picking up the cost of those foolish measures and the inability to sort out the long-term problems in our economy, we have a huge £50 billion deficit in public finances. There are two major proposals designed to deal with that deficit. The first is to increase national insurance contributions. That policy was deliberately chosen rather than an increase in income tax, because it hits those on average and below-average earnings, while protecting those in the highest income tax bracket. The second and far and away the worst proposal in the Budget is the appalling proposal to impose VAT on fuel.

There has been much disquiet about the election promises and the proposals. In the past few weeks, that concern has centred on the issue of VAT increases. Almost all the representations which I and, I think, others have received have been on the VAT issue. Almost all the representations that I have received have been from pensioners.

I do not believe that pensioners are the only people to have realised that they will be affected by the VAT proposals in the Budget; I do not believe that they are better informed than the rest of the population. The pensioners' representations have been made for one simple reason: fear. There is fear among ordinary pensioners living on, and just above, income support levels about how they will pay the increased fuel bills and survive.

We are told that the policy is not designed merely to raise revenue, but involves the environment. Does not the environment of those pensioners count? Is it not their world? Is their environment of no concern to those people who say that the measure is an environmental policy?

A recent survey conducted by Age Concern showed that already—without the implementation of the Budget proposals—30,000 to 40,000 more people die in this country in winter than in summer. It also discovered that 18 per cent. of pensioners had no insulation on their hot water tanks, 26 per cent. had no loft insulation, and 64 per cent. had no double-glazing on their windows.

If anyone—whether members of the Conservative party or supporters of Friends of the Earth—wants to support the measure on the grounds that it is a green policy, they should address the problems relating to pensioners. We are talking not about a green measure, but about a hypothermia enhancement measure—that is the effect that it will have on pensioners. That is the reason the pensioners have made representations, and the reason for their fear.

The people who have made representations to me fall into two categories. First, there are those who are already on income support, who are dependent on means-tested benefits and who do not believe that they will receive full compensation from the Government for the costs imposed on them by the proposals. They have no reason to believe that they will receive adequate compensation when they look at the Government's track record of deliberately and repeatedly reneging on their commitments.

The second category of people are those living just above income support levels, who receive no state benefits because they have struggled all their lives to make some small extra provision by paying into an occupational pension scheme or something similar. They now find that their prudence and the struggle that they have maintained throughout their lives by paying taxes and national insurance contributions has resulted in their being pushed into the poverty trap. The proposals will bring them no benefits.

The Chief Secretary said that he hoped that he had established a rhythm of good decision making. What sort of rhythm of decision making will the pensioners have to take up when they try to balance their water bills, council tax bills, rent bills and fuel bills? What sort of rhythm of good decision making does the Cheif Secretary suggest that the pensioners should adopt?

Undoubtedly, the Government are proposing deliberately and cynically to make the poorest people—the most vulnerable in the country—pay for their own mishandling of the economy over not only the past three or four years but the past 14 years.

The Conservative Government told the nation that they were the Government of prudent economic management. However, they have got themselves into such a mess that we are now imposing these appalling measures on pensioners. It is disgraceful. I hope that the Government are never forgiven for deliberately reneging on their election pledges. I shall do everything in my power to ensure that they are not forgiven.

7.50 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): It is almost four months since the Budget statement was read to the House. Since then, we have studied it in great detail, on the Floor of the House and in Committee.

As we reflect on our deliberations, it is important to recall the mood that prevailed when the Budget was read. Spending was admittedly high, and we knew that that matter had to be addressed. There was a strong feeling that any severe attack on public spending could jeopardise what was seen to be a fragile recovery. My hon. Friends were wary of doing anything too severe so as not to put into reverse the small signs of progress that could already be observed as the economy crept out of recession.

On Budget day, I said that the Budget could have been tougher on the public sector borrowing requirement—I still hold that view—because I felt that the most attested economic phenomenon is probably the business cycle. However fragile we might think the recovery is, the business cycle has a momentum of its own which we expect to perform.

When I study research papers on economic indicators in the Library, I am always struck by how steeply the graph is pointing upwards to reflect the increasing size of the public sector borrowing requirement. That must determine our decision on whether the Finance Bill tackles what needs to be tackled.

A lot has happened since Budget day. Of course, we now have a new Chancellor. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), who drafted the Budget. He is an economic radical. The Budget definitely had his personal stamp on it. Setting aside all the political problems that have beset him since he spoke in the House on 16 March, he can feel justly proud of the way in which the Budget is shaped, and the economic prosperity that it will deliver in due course.

We must put the Budget in the context that, because the United Kingdom was the first country to go into recession we are showing that we are the first to come out of it. That puts us in a unique position to take advantage of the improved competitiveness in the British economy as we emerge from recession while our partners are still suffering.

Only a cursory look at Germany and France shows that, in contrast to our economic fortunes, they are facing severe difficulties. A visit to Germany shows that, in Stuttgart, 25,000 people have been laid off at the Mercedes-Benz factory, the production of Porsche cars has gone down by about 80 per cent., and the machine tool industry is all but in a state of collapse.

The German economy, which depends heavily on the motor industry, is facing severe difficulties. Effectively, having bought a bankrupt country, the Germans must now support the debt that they took on to do so. Having invested so much pride—and rightly so—in sustaining the value of their currency, they face a severe conflict between deciding how to protect the parity of the deutschmark and reducing interest rates to stimulate economic activity. I do not envy them that problem. Indeed, we had the same problem. None the less, it will shape the economic behaviour of our European partners over the next few years.

The problem in France is not quite so severe——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman continues his tour of Europe, I must remind him that we are debating the Third Reading of the Bill. Although it is in order to take some general economic policy as background, it must not turn into a debate on policy that is unrelated to the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Duncan: I am grateful for your guidance, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I will abide by it. I was merely setting the Budget in context. The judgments contained in the Bill can be justified. In making such judgments, we must increasingly examine our European competitors to assess whether the judgments made in the House can be supported.

In reverting to the details of the Bill, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames will be vindicated in the details that he injected in the measures by having a delayed clawback in the structure of the public sector borrowing requirement for the future. To retrieve £6·5 billion in 1994-95 and £10·5 billion in 1995-96, it is necessary to build economic confidence, but at the same time not severely to attack a fragile recovery.

We are in a good position as a result of the Bill. Inflation is now below the EC average, and our interest rate is the lowest in the EC. At 6 per cent., it is the lowest rate since December 1977, and the fifth reduction since we left the exchange rate mechanism. As a result of the Bill, unemployment has shown an unexpected improvement, costs and earnings are increasingly contained, car registrations are up, and industrial production and exports are up.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): Can the hon. Gentleman explain how unemployment has fallen as a result of the Bill when it has not yet been enacted?

Mr. Duncan: People are well aware of what the Budget contains, because the Bill has been discussed in detail in the House and in Committee. Indeed, giving the Bill Royal Assent merely confirms that the House wishes to see it enacted.

The Finance Bill sets the foundation for sustainable growth. We still have certain structural problems and a certain bias to housing, which has been addressed by ensuring that mortgage interest relief at source is at the lowest rate. There are many things that we will have to discuss in the November Budget.

The Finance Bill has brought us back to reality. It will ensure that we entertain realistic expectations of what the economy can deliver. It does not suggest that there is any good sense in making a dash for growth. Rather, we will see growth of 1 or perhaps 2 per cent., plus 1 per cent. and then another 1 per cent. The Bill will ensure that we have the sustainable prosperity for which we must aim.

During the passage of the Bill, we have listened in vain for any constructive alternative from Labour Members. The speech of the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) was completely bereft of any alternative proposal for or commitment to what she thinks the upper rate of tax should be. She did not say why the Labour party dropped its election policy of imposing an investment income surcharge on savers.

If she was still here, I would ask the hon. Lady whether she agrees with the shadow Chancellor that to raise income tax would be a mistake, and would probably take demand out of the economy. How would she fulfil her party's pledge to increase Government spending without raising taxes? What does she think is the correct level for the public sector borrowing requirement? We missed all that from Labour Members.

I commend the Bill to the House for the Third Reading that it so properly deserves.

8 pm

Mr. Beith: I will not attempt to answer many of the questions that the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) put to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), because I would be ruled out of order. We are supposed to be discussing what is in the Finance Bill.

The Chief Secretary sketched in the economic background, which it was reasonable for him to do, and I do not quarrel with the main elements he quoted as favourable and positive in the current economic climate, although he was inclined to leave out some unfavourable elements.

For example, the construction industry is still not showing the signs of recovery that are vital in that crucial sector of the economy. The unemployment news cannot give the Government ease and comfort. We have very high levels of unemployment, and most commentators expect them to persist, even if there are some offsetting job improvements through gains achieved by British exporters in world markets.

Hon. Members point out that many countries are going deeper into recession as we are coming out of it. They talk about that as good news, whereas it is really bad news for exporters, who must sell into markets which are in recession. Other countries being in recession acts as an inhibition on our recovery. We should not be pleased about their plight. No more should we be pleased about the continued high import penetration of our domestic economy, which remains a worry for industry.

I was tempted to intervene in the speech of the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) to say that he was pouring petrol over the Government but not putting a match to it. On the other hand, the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) last night poured domestic fuel over the Government and put a match to it by pointing out —[Interruption.] I am not sure whether political self-immolation was a necessary part of that—that the Christchurch by-election, and, by implication, any other by-elections that may occur in the near future, is likely to go against the Conservatives because of the provisions in this measure.

The Bill includes the hated and feared VAT on domestic fuel, imposed without adequate compensation or channelling of revenues into measures that will help people to pay for it by making their homes more energy-efficient. That alone is sufficient reason to oppose the Bill.

The Budget, of which the Bill is a part, contains in effect an income tax increase, even though it is not to be found in the Bill in that form. The 1p increase in national insurance contributions represents an income tax increase for the low-paid, because all higher levels of income are not subject to the 1p charge. Perks, which are subject to income tax but not to national insurance contributions, escape. In other words, it is a back-door income tax increase, and we were not able to discuss it at earlier stages of the Bill because it is being done through the national insurance system.

The Bill imposes substantial additional burdens on charities, through VAT and changes in advance corporation tax, both of which will hit them hard. Hon. Members are still receiving extensive representations on the issue from charities.

The Bill's petroleum revenue tax regime is costing thousands of jobs. That cannot be denied, because, whatever is happening at Shell, thousands of jobs will be lost in the oil industry and in many others which that industry supports and from which it buys. I was struck by a revised Shell statement, quoted in the Financial Times today, which bears the hallmark of some careful drafting. A company spokesman is reported as having said:

"The PRT changes have underlined, and given focus to, what we were already looking at in the North Sea".

Those were carefully crafted words. They put into sharp relief the fact that one of the only two companies which welcomed the new PRT regime is shedding a vast number of jobs. The other company is also shedding many jobs.

Mr. Dorrell: For the sake of completeness, the right hon. Gentleman will want the House to know that the sentence which he quoted finishes with the words:

"without further affecting the drilling programme."

Mr. Beith: Even so, it significantly affects the exploration programme, which is the complaint that everybody is making about the new PRT regime. Many companies, particularly those committed on the exploration side, are devastated by the new regime.

It is a bitter blow that, after all the pleas that they received, including many from Conservative Members, the Government have still not gone nearly far enough, even in transitional provisions which would have helped the industry with the difficulties that it is facing. The Government cannot be oblivious to the severe job impact that the regime is having, not just in Scotland but throughout the United Kingdom.

I urge the Government to realise that oil exploration workers live in all parts of Britain. One need only go to Newcastle airport on a Friday night or to Leeds station or Teesside airport to see people going home to all parts of the United Kingdom, particularly to areas down the east coast, from areas of oil activity. That is not to mention the many companies supplying the oil industry.

The Bill will unfairly tax people who are forced to move because of their work. In particular, it will tax van drivers unfairly, and what a group of people to pick on. Instead of imposing a scale of charges in a field of activity that increasingly has been taxed by the Revenue, when the Revenue caught up with it, the Government have imposed such a high scale charge that, for example, people on modest incomes who drive vans and take them home so that their tools will be safer overnight, rather than leaving the van on site, will be subject to an unfairly high tax charge.

There are serious faults in the Bill—right from large aspects to the micro-elements of its provisions. In many respects, it takes a wrong attitude to the tax system. That attitude is not based on fairness. The Government are too fond of direct taxes, they are too fond of national insurance contributions as a means of raising the equivalent amounts by way of income tax, and they are too hostile to rises in standard and higher rates of income tax, which would be a fairer means of increasing taxation, if it is necessary to do that.

Had the Government wished to introduce provisions to achieve an extremely large increase in taxation over, say, the next two years—the Bill does precisely that—they should have addressed fairer means of achieving that objective. They would have been subject to much less criticism from the Opposition had they done so. They would still have been criticised for creating a situation in which such tax increases were necessary, but they would at least have placed those increases on the population on a fairer basis.

The Budget and the Finance Bill do not square the circle. There will remain a large public sector borrowing requirement. The Government must have regard to the PSBR and seek to reduce it, but I warn them not to be mesmerised by it. To do so could lead them into some extremely mistaken decisions. As well as a substantial budget deficit, there is in Britain a substantial investment deficit. There has been a considerable failure to invest in areas of crucial importance to the economy.

Historically, we have not in recent years had a high PSBR. We do not have a high level of existing national debt. We have a large and worrying PSBR which could have marked consequences, so we cannot ignore it, but if we were to rein back severely on investment as opposed to taking action on current expenditure, we could be adding to, rather than ending, the damage. We would be bringing about a situation in which the long-term problems of the British economy that have helped to get us into the present mess would persist into the future, and perhaps even get worse. So the Government must draw a distinction between current and investment expenditure in their attempts to deal with the PSBR. They must not be so mesmerised by the PSBR that investment and capital expenditure are severely damaged into the future.

The Chief Secretary set the Bill in the context of what he described as "steady and purposeful progress", and "good decision making". His use of such phrases surprised me, because we have been on a roller coaster. We have gone from the most ridiculous heights of boom into the most desperate depths of depression. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton knows that, because he has delivered a critique of Thatcherite economics, of which we shall hear more on an appropriate occasion.

Yet the Chief Secretary—the man who gave us the poll tax—talks about the considerable costs and other elements of Government that will have to be reined in. He has been an expensive man for the Government to have around—he gave us the poll tax and all its costly consequences—so he will find it hard to convince some of us that his credentials are sound when it comes to making sensible cuts in public expenditure.

The Chief Secretary may talk about good decision making, but I cannot recall another Finance Bill during my 20 years in the House when the Chancellor who delivered the Budget has been sacked before the Bill had completed its legislative course. Not only has he been sacked, but he comes before us in the midst of our considering the Bill and says that there has been "too much short-termism, too much reacting to events".

He added:

"We give the impression of being in office but not in power. Far too many important decisions are made for 36 hours' publicity."

When we read the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman's words ring in our ears. He went on:

"I believe that in politics one should decide what is right and then decide the presentation, not the other way round. Unless this approach is changed, the Government will not survive, and will not deserve to survive."—[Official Report, 9 June 1993; Vol. 226, c. 283.]

We saw an instance of that last night, when, in a vote on a crucial part of the Bill, the Government had a majority of only eight. Their majority is shrinking, and it will shrink more after the Christchurch by-election: they will be increasingly unable to get Bills such as this through the House, and increasingly required to respond to the House's demands. Moreover, that will apply at a time when—as the Government themselves point out—difficult decisions must be made.

The Government cannot simply go for what is popular; I accept that. They must present the House with tough packages, which—while dealing with the current deficit, and the urgent needs of the economy—are at the same time seen to be fair. That, in my view, is where the Bill fails. It is seen not as a fair Finance Bill, but as an unfair way of inflicting the price of the Government's mistakes on the people.

Well may it be called a Bill: it is the bill that the people must pay for those mistakes. It is the sort of bill that arrives in a brown envelope through our constituents' letter boxes. It does not provide for constructive investment in the future, or for the easily definable good things that the country needs; it is the bill for the mistakes that the present Government have made. I well understand why so many people resent having to pay it, and resent the unfair distribution that it represents.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): One of the aspects of the way in which the House deals with legislation is the fact that, by the time we discuss the Finance Bill, some time has elapsed since the Budget statement: it seems a considerable time to those of us who served on the Standing Committee.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) said, however, it is clear that recovery is now under way. We are seeing increased manufacturing output and more housing starts—an increase of 18,000 this year—lower inflation and more employment. At the time of the Budget statement, we wondered whether the recovery was sustainable; now we know that it is.

In a lucid intervention, the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) asked how the Budget could be taking effect when its provisions had not yet been passed. As the Chancellor said at the time, the important feature of the Budget was that any tax increases would come later so as not to choke off the recovery at its outset. His important statement that there would be no tax rises this year has made it possible for the recovery to take root as strongly as it has.

Dr. Reid: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Fox: Many others wish to speak, but, as it is the hon. Gentleman, I will.

Dr. Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy. Does his logic suggest that, when the tax increases are introduced next year, the recovery will be undermined?

Dr. Fox: Given his knowledge of economics, the hon. Gentleman should understand that, by that time, the recovery will be so well under way that the greatest threat will be not a lack of consumer confidence, but the need for sound public finances. The Government's overwhelming duty will be to tackle that task. In this context as in others, the Government will ultimately be judged on whether what we leave behind is better than what we inherited. That means not only improving living standards and lowering inflation and unemployment, but reducing public debt. That is the point that I made to the hon. Gentleman earlier.

Some hon. Members seem to believe that the Government will make short-term decisions. Several have already mentioned the Christchurch by-election. I trust that my ministerial colleagues will make no decisions that might be influenced in any way by the thought of a forthcoming by-election, but will do what the Conservative party was put in office to do—make the correct decisions, however unpopular they may be in the short term.

One fundamental principle must guide us. As we go for growth—as we undoubtedly will—the value of money should not be up for grabs in our economic policy. That means that we must reduce spending.

I praise the efforts of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in the spending review: it is surely right to consider welfare spending as part of overall spending. The welfare state was originally intended to be a genuine partnership between Government and those who needed help, rather than a perpetual Santa's grotto that would deliver money to anyone who happened to pass through it. That surely must still be the right approach.

It would also be wrong to suggest that the current recovery is based solely on the short-term measures that we have announced since the Budget. Surely that recovery is also due to the supply side reforms of the 1980s, not least the reform of the labour and trade union movements. The flexibility that we now enjoy will lead to faster falls in unemployment than we could otherwise have expected—and those supply side changes would have been possible only under a succession of Conservative Governments. We must resist the temptation to rewrite history as having begun in 1989 or 1992; the Government's economic policy goes back to 1979.

The lesson of the policy of the late 1980s is that growth is sustainable only if inflation is kept low. It gives Conservative Members no great pleasure to admit the mistakes of the monetary policy of the late 1980s—a policy that advocated over-loosening of a money supply that the Opposition urged us to loosen even further. At least their economic policy is consistent in one respect: they demand interest rates that are perpetually 1 per cent. lower than the Government want at any given time, whether the requirement is for a tightening or a loosening of the money supply.

We must not return to the house price inflation of the 1980s. We must be willing to tax consumption, and we must not be willing to tax earnings. That surely is one of the fundamental differences between Government and Opposition.

I am disappointed to note that the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) is not present. She talked of 14 years of Conservative economic mismanagement; yet unemployment was reduced from 3·2 million in 1986 to 1·5 million in 1990, despite the arrival of 1 million more people on the jobs market. That is a record that we would gladly repeat. We repaid £14 billion of national debt in a year—the very national debt that the hon. Lady was keen to see repaid as soon as possible. But our monetary policy was too loose.

It is sad that, in a debate that lacks the fevered atmosphere of a more packed Chamber, the hon. Member for Peckham could not bring herself to accept the basic truth. She could not even accept that, while the German economy is now in recession, the British economy is growing. It is indeed sad when that level of maturity cannot be achieved on the Opposition Front Bench.

Even worse, the hon. Lady revealed that—as all of us who served on the Standing Committee already know—she does not know the numbers. When my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) asked by how much the public sector borrowing requirement would be reduced if unemployment fell, she was—as ever—unable to give a figure. It is a remarkable feat for a shadow Chief Secretary to make a speech in a finance debate without mentioning any figures. I suppose that Opposition Members must be very careful when the shadow Cabinet elections are approaching, even if three women have to be elected.

Mr. Salmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Fox: No, I will not.

I was also disappointed to hear the accusation that the Government were not willing to tolerate debate on the Opposition's amendments to the Bill. The simple truth is that, if those on the Opposition Front Bench had been remotely competent in drafting the amendments, the Chair would not have ruled them out of order.

Our prosperity ultimately depends on sound public finances, honest money, individual and corporate incentive, and export-led growth in an increasingly deregulated market. I believe that this Finance Bill sets us well on the road, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): This Finance Bill is very long; if my memory serves me aright, it runs to 312 pages. As I recall, the Chancellor's speech also set records for its length—it certainly felt like that sitting on these Benches listening to it. But long speeches and long Finance Bills do not add up to much, certainly not to a strategy for economic recovery. Indeed, any prospect of a sustained recovery will be undone by the legacy of 14 years of gross economic mismanagement and the inadequacies of this Finance Bill. The deep-seated problems of the United Kingdom's economy, which hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise, are left untouched by the Bill and, arguably, are compounded by it.

Take the long-promised consumer-led recovery about which we have heard so much this evening, and from the Government Front Bench over the last year or so. Even if it is accepted that a personal consumption boom rather than an investment-led recovery is necessary to get the British economy back on its feet, the personal sector debt remains too high and confidence remains too low to promote a new consumer boom.

The threat of unemployment continues to deter too many individuals from taking major investment decisions. Since the general election, 8,000 people in Darlington have experienced unemployment. Unemployment remains the single biggest social and economic problem faced by this country. It is a sure sign of the Government's priorities that the new Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his first Mansion House speech, did not even utter the word "unemployment". He does not recognise the problem; he has no solution for it; and I am afraid that the Finance Bill is a direct reflection of that failure.

The Finance Bill threatens to make matters worse by imposing higher tax rises on people on low and middle incomes. Those people are still struggling with the effects of falling property prices; they are still suffering from having mortgage debts around their necks; and they still face the threat of redundancy. Any consumer upturn will be snuffed out by this approach.

The real failure of the Finance Bill—I believe that this is recognised, in all honesty, by hon. Members on both sides of the House—is that it turns its back on measures to plug the investment gaps that hinder Britain's ability to compete. With Europe already heading into a deep and damaging recession, and accounting for some 60 per cent. of United Kingdom exports, the prospects for an export-led recovery are difficult in any case; in this situation, it is surely doubly incumbent on the Government to act to help Britain's competitive position.

What has been the Government's response? The Bill introduces a special 40 per cent. capital allowance scheme, presumably because it is recognised that it will help to speed industrial investment. But the Government have ignored the pleas, not only of the Opposition but of the Confederation of British Industry and other business organisations, who have all called for the maintenance and extension of that special capital allowance scheme. Indeed, in the Red Book, the Government recognise that business investment this year will not remain stagnant, but will fall.

Mr. Dorrell: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to remind the House also that business investment in plant and machinery, which he says will fall this year, is now 50 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1979, and that total business investment, as the recession is coming to an end, is still higher than it was at any time during the 1960s and 1970s measured as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Milburn: If business investment has been so successful, the Minister might like to explain to the House why, even in the middle of a recession, British companies still cannot meet even weakened consumer demand, and hence the massive increase in Britain's imports bill. I notice that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, when he spoke earlier, lauded Britain's export performance, but he totally failed to mention the dreadful state of our imports bill. I am afraid that, once again, the Government's priorities and, indeed, their double dealing on economic statistics have been laid bare before the House and the country.

The parlous state to which our manufacturing base has been reduced by the Government requires more than rhetoric from the Prime Minister; it requires action, and it certainly requires more than a one-year, one-off, headline-grabbing investment incentive. British industry now receives less financial support from the Government than its competitors in any other European country. We are even falling behind the newly industrialising countries of the Pacific rim in terms of investment, training, and research and development.

The Finance Bill could have represented a turning point in the Government's approach. Instead, it is business as usual: it is free market, hands off, non-interventionist. The short-termism that has so characterised the last 14 years of Conservative economic policy has rarely been made more explicit. It will be the whole country that, in the medium term, will pay the price. The writing is already on the wall. The fact that the imports bill continues to boom in the middle of a recession is a sure sign that British manufacturing has been seriously weakened by the Government's performance. Whole sectors have simply been wiped out, so that even a modest recovery will precipitate a balance of payments crisis far worse than that envisaged by the former Chancellor when he delivered the Budget. The real results of the Government's economic mismanagement will be realised only when and if recovery finally arrives. It is then that their failures will be most clearly exposed.

Quite simply, the Finance Bill does nothing to tackle the economic mess created by the Conservatives. Instead, it asks the country to foot the bill for the Government's failures. Inevitably, it will be the people on low and middle incomes who will be asked to pay the price. They have been betrayed and let down by a Government who promised the earth—recovery, tax cuts and a new boom—and delivered precisely the reverse. The Finance Bill means the biggest rise in British history.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury outlined the figures—some £17 billion to £18 billion in just two years. The Bill makes a mockery of Tory claims from the last general election, but it is at least consistent in one respect: 14 years of Tory tax policy have increased, not cut, the tax burden, and it has weighed most heavily on those least able to pay. Meanwhile, the wealthiest people in society, representing a fraction of all taxpayers, have had the benefit of a veritable tax bonanza, paid for by the rest of us. The regressive nature of the tax rises, the imposition of value added tax on fuel, the freezing of personal allowances and, of course, the increase in national insurance contributions affect every taxpayer, but they particularly affect the low-paid.

The Finance Bill, interestingly, also hits those on middle incomes. In a parliamentary answer dated 22 April, the Financial Secretary admitted that, as a result of the freeze on personal allowances, there would be 120,000 more higher rate taxpayers. Similarly, restricting the married couple's allowance to 20 per cent., as proposed for the next financial year, would increase the number by a further 210,000. Like the poorest people in society, people on middle incomes are being asked to dig deeper to pay for the massive tax handouts to the very rich over the past few years.

I remind the House that top-rate tax cuts have earned the wealthiest more than £10 billion since 1988, when Lord Lawson, as he now is, introduced his tax-cutting Budget. They have done very well out of the Government, and they continue to do so. The Government's failure to tackle tax evasion and abuse earns the wealthiest people in society a pretty penny. Why should a person earning, say, £20,000 a year have to pay tax on his income, while a person who receives a bequest of, say, £100,000 pays nothing because he can afford to pay tax advisers and thereby avoid his inheritance tax liabilities?

The Government could have done something about that in the Finance Bill, but they refused to do so. The result is that we have a financial scandal on our hands. The nation's coffers are being plugged by increases in national insurance contributions and income tax and, of course, by the VAT extension. By contrast, the very wealthiest are getting off scot free.

The Bill continues to give inherited wealth an enormous tax break. The very richest are subsidised while the very poorest are penalised. So much for the Prime Minister's classless society. This Finance Bill is a con. It aids the wealthiest by affording enormous tax loopholes to them. It stings the poorest and those on middling incomes with swingeing tax rises. It does nothing to promote lasting recovery because it fails to promote investment in jobs or in industry. That is why the Bill deserves to be rejected by the House.

8.30 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies: For the second time this afternoon I should remind the House of my interests which are declared in the Register of Members' Interests, in particular of my connection with NatWest Securities, Dewe Rogerson and the Institute of Taxation.

We had a characteristic performance this afternoon by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman). It was certainly long on charm and on what my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary rightly called fragrance. On substance, however, it was short, I fear, to the point of superficiality. [Interruption.] As the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) says from a sedentary position, that is what I always say. Yes, that is what I always say, precisely because it is always justified.

The Labour party's economic policy consists of saying, in the most mindless fashion, that the answer to unemployment is to spend money and that everything else will follow on from that. It is far from clear that that would happen. No coherent argument has been advanced by the Opposition showing why the sudden expenditure of public money would reduce unemployment. Very much the reverse would occur.

Even if we were to suppose that the spending of public money was the way automatically to reduce unemployment, the Opposition ought, if there were any economic rigour about their thinking or any reality at all about their plans, to tell us by how much they are prepared to increase taxation, or by how much they are prepared to see the public sector borrowing requirement increase in the short term in order to bring about the so-called reduction in unemployment over the medium or longer term that the model that they hawk about predicts. To that we are never given an answer. A so-called alternative Government who are not prepared to face the costs of their own policies deprives them automatically of the right to be taken seriously. The performance of the hon. Member for Peckham has done nothing even to begin to fill the enormous credibility gap that the Labour party has consistently opened up.

I pay sincere tribute to the Government's determination to reduce the PSBR. A year ago, I admit, I was less concerned about the rigour of fiscal policy. We were then part of the exchange rate mechanism. We are no longer part of it. Things have changed considerably. No country can with impunity afford for long to have a reduction in interest rates, a relaxation of monetary policy and a devaluation as well as an increase in the deficit, or a relaxation of fiscal policy. In present circumstances, therefore, it is particularly important that we should make a vigorous and, if necessary, a ruthless attempt to cut public expenditure and reduce the PSBR.

I pay tribute to the courage of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) and the rest of the Treasury Bench in putting together this Budget which has laid the basis for increases in public revenues next year and the year after that. I thoroughly agree with the revenue-raising measures that have been selected: the increase in the taxation of company cars and the application of tax to allowances at the 20 per cent. rate, which seems to me to be right and proper. I thoroughly agree, too, as I said earlier this afternoon, with the extension of VAT to domestic fuel.

When the combined Budget and public expenditure statement is made in November, I hope that those measures will be accompanied by a demonstrable effort on the part of the Government to cut their own spending—I hope to below the level of the control totals that were published last year for this year, next year and the year after. It is a necessary move. Therefore, I hope that it takes place.

As for VAT, I know that the Government will not be discouraged by the fundamentally synthetic agitation of the Opposition, none of which was accompanied by an explicit commitment by the Labour party to abolish VAT on domestic fuel should the Labour party, by some mischance, be returned to power. [Interruption.] Well, we shall see, but we are used to the Labour party accusing the Government of spending too little, of taxing too much and of having too large a PSBR.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): The hon. Gentleman sat with me throughout the Committee proceedings on this Bill and knows full well that European legislation will not allow this change to be revoked. Is he suggesting that the Labour party would defy European law, or is he suggesting that his own party would be in a position to do so?

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman has put forward an absolutely splendid excuse.

Mr. Mandelson: That is true.

Mr. Davies: Indeed.

Mr. Mandelson: The hon. Gentleman should therefore sit down.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman clearly wants me to end my remarks, which encourages me to feel that I may be scoring a few hits.

I hope that the Government will go further and extend VAT to other things as well—in fact, to everything, with the sole exception of food and children's clothing, for which we have negotiated, with some difficulty, a derogation from Community rules. What I hope that the Government will not do and what they have correctly not done in the Finance Bill, which I hope we shall send on its way this evening, is to increase direct taxes—income tax, capital gains tax and corporation tax. Those are the three——

Mr. Betts: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: No, I am not going to give way, and I shall tell the hon. Gentleman why. On several occasions this evening the hon. Member for Peckham refused to give way to me during her speech. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am normally very generous in giving way to the Opposition. I did so earlier today when I was on my feet. There must, however, be some reciprocity. Therefore I propose not to give way but to continue with my speech.

It seems to me to be absolutely right not to increase the rates of those three direct taxes. I hope that the Government will continue on that course when they present their next Budget at the end of this year. They are the most economically damaging taxes. Perhaps the most economically damaging of them all is capital gains tax, for it has a direct impact on risk taking in the economy. All three of them, though, have a direct impact on incentives to work, on incentives to invest, on the location of industry and on the choice of residence.

It is tempting and popular to say that the rich should be clobbered and that we ought to introduce a new higher rate of tax of 50, 60 or 70 per cent. for higher incomes or, alternatively, that the 40 per cent. rate ought to be increased in respect of those categories of income to which it currently applies.

But that would be very damaging. The more attractive, in political and demagogic terms, it is to increase the rate of income tax as one moves up the income scale, the more economically damaging it is to do so. We are talking about people who are relatively more and more internationally mobile—well paid lawyers and financiers, as well as the pop stars and tennis stars, who could pursue their activities equally well in Paris, New York, Geneva or any other one of a whole variety of places. It would be very foolish to drive those people away. In this context, I hope that the Government will be very careful indeed not to mess about with the residency and domicile rules. Were they to do so, many of the people to whom I have referred would not be here.

Over the past few years, there have been great advantages—in terms of inward investment, the location of industry and the residence of people—in our acquisition, for the first time since the second world war, of the reputation of being, by international standards, a lower-tax area. Previously we had the reverse reputation. I hope that nothing will be done to damage this very considerable achievement—one of many—of the Conservative Government over the past 15 years.

It is a pity that the Government have not taken the opportunity afforded by this Bill to iron out some of the anomalies that result from the differential taxation of certain benefits. I hope that they will do so next time round. As hon. Members know, some non-means-tested benefits, such as the old-age pension, are regarded as income—which, indeed, they are—and are subject to tax in the normal way, whereas others, such as child benefit and invalidity benefit, are not regarded as income and are not subject to tax. There can be no rhyme or reason in that. Taxing all those benefits would not in any way constitute an attack on the poor. People whose income consisted entirely of benefit would not be liable to tax. However, there is no reason why anyone receiving benefit on top of another significant income should not have to pay tax on it. I hope that the Government will address this matter.

The hon. Member for Peckham, among others, said much about the future of the welfare state. It is true that the welfare state does a wonderful job in the protection of many vulnerable people. It prevents a great deal of misery among families. All parties in the House are united in believing that a welfare state is necessary to a humane society. However, the present system is riddled with anomalies and perversities of all kinds and requires thorough examination. For example, it is absurd that teenagers receive housing benefit at public expense although they come from loving families that want them back. There have been some very tragic cases in my constituency. Why should children be paid to stay in some hostel in an inner city, such as Manchester or London, where they run all kinds of risks? In fact, public money is being used to support the unnecessary break-up of families.

I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would not want me to stray into the general area of welfare state and social security policy. I should like, however, to refer to a number of very clear taxation implications in this field. For example, the Bill makes provision for the so-called protection of people in receipt of income at or below income support level from the effect of the extension of VAT to domestic fuel. It must be realised that every time we "protect" certain categories of people below the benefit level against such price increases but do not do the same for others, we produce a perverse social and economic situation. We reduce the gap between what people earn by way of income support and what they would earn if they were in work. As a result, we reduce the marginal return to work. We reduce, at the margin, the willingness of people to go back to work and, thereby, run a higher level of unemployment than is necessary. That is very dangerous.

If old people have a little income in addition to their pension, if they have worked all their lives and have made a great effort to save a little—perhaps a few hundred pounds a year, amounting to £10,000 or £20,000—out of a modest income, why should they be deprived of benefits on the ground that help is being targeted at people whose income is below a certain arbitrary poverty level? Such a policy would send to society as a whole the signal that work and thrift are not to be rewarded and that people who work and save will be made fools of. Clearly I am referring to those whose incomes are not much above the level that would entitle them to income support and other benefits such as assistance with mortgage interest payments. We would pay a price, in terms of employment and of the propensity to work and save—indeed, the whole culture of society—by going down that road. I hope that the Government will be very cautious.

This has been a good Budget in extremely difficult circumstances. No Chancellor could produce a block-buster, popular Budget in the present climate. Indeed, it would be wrong and irresponsible to do so. The Government have been quite ingenious in putting together a package that will enhance revenues. If ingenuity in this respect can be matched with ingenuity and equivalent effort in the reduction of Government expenditure, we shall show the world that we mean to bring our fiscal deficit down. We shall lay the basis for the confidence that our economy needs if the very encouraging upturn that we have seen in recent months is to be sustained in the 1990s, as happened under the Conservative Government in the 1980s.

8.47 pm

Mr. Salmond: As several hon. Members who have sat through the debate want to participate, I shall be brief. The magic carpet that mysteriously transports Conservative Members into the Chamber has some time to operate.

As I listened to the Chief Secretary's speech, I had a strange feeling of déjà vu. I was trying to place the quotation that the right hon. Gentleman used at the climax of his address—the one about governing and choosing and choosing to govern. I knew that it was from a resignation speech, but we have had so many of those over the past few years that I could not quite place the valedictory address that was the source. Then it came to me. The speech was that of the noble Lord Lawson addressing the House as Chancellor. As on this occasion the idea came from the Government Front Bench, I thought that it must mark the rehabilitation—or at least the reconstruction and development—of Lord Lawson's position in the Conservative party. That must be very refreshing for the noble Lord after so many years of having the finger pointed at him for all the ills that have befallen the economy. However, it will be some time before the latest fallen Chancellor—who at half-past seven appeared like Banquo's ghost and took a long look at the Government Front Bench—reaches the stage of rehabilitation. I do not know which Minister would play the part of Macbeth, but I would not recommend an overnight stay in the house of any of them.

In an intervention during the speech of the Chief Secretary, I referred to growth in the economy. The Red Book forecast is 2·5 per cent.—exceptionally modest indeed. A growth rate of 2·5 per cent., on average, over the next few years is not just exceptionally disappointing—it will come nowhere near closing the fiscal deficit in the economy. Thus the Government's hard choices between tax increases and spending reductions will be very severe indeed. It also means that the structural weakness in the United Kingdom economy has been laid bare for all to see.

We have experienced the longest recession in living memory. Yet the recovery from recession is not so much a bounce back as a clawback. We are not engaged in a dash for growth; if anything, it is a crawl for growth, and the so-called economic miracle of the 1980s has been exposed for what it was—if, of course, the Government's forecasts for growth over the next few years are accurate.

If I were a member of the Government Front Bench, I would be worried not only about the £1 billion per week deficit in the public sector borrowing requirement but in particular about the £1 billion per week deficit on the balance of payments because, as sure as eggs are eggs, that deficit will ensure that the faltering recovery is aborted in a balance of payments crisis sooner rather than later.

It was interesting that, apart from a brief mention of the success of exports in recent months, at no point did the Chief Secretary show any appreciation of the extent and inevitability of the enduring problem of the balance of payments, especially when oil forms less of a protection for the United Kingdom's balance of payments. I should have liked the Bill to contain a realisation of the key underlying problem of the economy.

With the Budget, the Government visited a double whammy on the people of Scotland. The first blow was the changes to petroleum revenue tax. For the sake of completeness, I shall read into the record an internal memo distributed to Shell staff in Scotland. It gives what may be called the private company view of the effect of the oil tax changes as opposed to the public view which was hastily cobbled together when the private view was unfortunately released to the newspapers. The internal memo reads:

> "Doubtless you are aware . . . some very significant changes in Petroleum Revenue Tax regulations will be implemented this year by the Government . . . The main effect that this will have on exploration is that our net costs will go up by a factor of four. It will be clear that, under these circumstances, our exploration programme will have to be reassessed carefully.
> Strong reductions in this activity will force us into corresponding reductions in staff. In total we are looking at a reduction in manpower of approximately 20-30 per cent. of the present workforce in exploration between now and the end of 1994."

It is clear and unambiguous that the internal company view, at least of the exploration side of the business, is that the PRT changes will mean the loss of fairly massive numbers of jobs. Let us remember that that is the view of one of the handful of oil companies which were in favour of the PRT changes; one can only imagine what the consequences will be for the vast majority of oil-related companies which were strongly against the PRT changes.

We should be grateful to the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) for trying to enlighten us about the process which ended in something like a farce yesterday when the out-of-order amendments tabled by Conservative Back Benchers were not selected for debate. The hon. Gentleman probably left us none the wiser about the tactics of that group of Conservative Back Benchers, and I should have thought that in-order amendments tabled on an all-party basis may have had a better chance of selection than out-of-order amendments signed only by Conservative Back Benchers.

My constituents were this morning treated to the sight of the right hon. Member for Woking (Sir C. Onslow), on the front page of The Press and Journal, holding a copy of the newspaper and saying that he would fight on against the PRT changes and would be trying to speak in the debate tonight. It must be especially disappointing to them that that particular knight in shining armour has been notable by his absence.

I do not know if there is still a backroom, back-stair strategy to try to get a concession from the Government to mitigate what will otherwise be a calamity for jobs in the oil industry, a calamity running into the loss of thousands of jobs. To judge from his current demeanour, I do not think that the Financial Secretary is going to enlighten us. It was a great mistake that the issue could not be forced to a vote yesterday because there is clearly all-party concern about the impact of the PRT changes, just when the oil industry is in a cyclical downturn. It is probably one of the most significant matters in the Budget in terms of an immediate effect on jobs.

The second aspect of the double whammy is the well-ventilated increase in fuel tax. I and my colleagues have for many years campaigned for a cold climate allowance, a recognition within the social security structure of the fact that there are different climatic conditions in various parts of the United Kingdom. Often, especially when there are only faltering changes to the current social security provision, we despaired of getting any reasonable concession, but never in our wildest imaginings did we think that we would end up with a cold climate surcharge through the imposition of value added tax on fuel. People who pay 30 per cent., 40 per cent. or 50 per cent. more a year on fuel than the United Kingdom average will be infinitely worse off. Let us be clear: the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel will not save the world from environmental damage, but it will sacrifice pensioners and low-income families, especially those in areas with poor climatic conditions.

In summary, this Budget was introduced by a failed Chancellor and it is being ushered by a failed Treasury team.

8.55 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to catch your eye despite my discourtesy in not being in the Chamber to hear at least two speeches. I was attending an extremely important event elsewhere. You will understand that when the chairman of one's regional television company is hosting an event on the Terrace, and when he is a constituent, a certain priority attaches to being there, especially as the occasion was to say goodbye to the political editor of Central Television, Jon Lander, who has served this House so well in so many ways through the years.

This is a historic occasion because it is the last Finance Bill that we shall discuss separately from the public expenditure statement. I for one look forward to the new unified structure for presenting the national accounts, which we shall receive in November or early December this year. I suspect that the Treasury team has had an especially difficult battle in Committee trying to remember what is going into the next Finance Bill and what is in the current Bill. The House owes the team a debt of gratitude for the skill with which it negotiated the Bill through its Committee stage.

I look forward to the fact that in the combined expenditure statement there will be a splitting of capital and current expenditure. It is a long overdue measure which will allow for much greater clarity in the presentation of our national accounts and will enable the House to take a more enlightened and informed view of the true state of the public sector borrowing requirement.

I welcome the fact that the House recognises that the public sector borrowing requirement is the fundamental issue confronting the Treasury team and the Government. Even the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) seems able to agree with that. Having heard her remarks earlier, however, I am still not sure what the Labour party believes to be the right level for the PSBR. I have heard what Treasury Ministers and others have said about the likely relative weight of the cyclical and structural elements of the PSBR, but I regard the £15 billion to £20 billion structural element as being too high. I welcome unreservedly the steps taken in the Finance Bill to narrow that gap, raising about £6·5 billion of revenue in the next financial year and about £10·5 billion in the year after.

I cannot, however, unreservedly welcome the Bill. Sadly, certain things that I should have liked to see in it are not. Perhaps those omissions are, at least in part, a product of that first year fixation which seems to have mesmerised the Treasury down the years. I am afraid that, just as in business it is sometimes necessary to invest to generate revenues in later years, so it is necessary for the Treasury occasionally to take a view about what sums of money might sensibly be spent in year one to ensure that there are revenues to spend in years two, three and later.

Before mentioning two or three of those matters, I must declare an interest. For several years I have had the privilege of advising first the General Council of British Shipping and now the Chamber of Shipping, and my work with the shipping industry has persuaded me of the imperative need to do something to help that industry. I am disappointed that nothing in the Bill helps the shipping industry. In Committee on the Floor of the House we had a useful and constructive debate on an amendment when in a series of speeches Conservative Members expressed the concern that the party feels about the future of the shipping industry. It was something of a disappointment to me that Ministers were not able to be more generous in their response to that debate, for the shipping industry would derive special benefit from a more informed and enlightened approach to the first year fixation to which I referred earlier.

I am in no sense questioning the Chair's selection of amendments, but I regret that new clause 19 was not selected for debate on Report, as that would have enabled us to debate another aspect of the investment needs of the shipping industry. I think that I speak for the shipping industry when I say that I am grateful for the intelligent, informed and constructive debate with Treasury Ministers and officials that has been possible in recent months. As a result, we are at least beginning to build some kind of general agreement about the costs likely to be incurred as a result of the measures that the industry seeks. That is at least a step forward.

The House will be aware that two principal issues relating to investment in shipping would have been welcome in the Bill: 100 per cent. capital allowances for shipping, the subject of the amendment in Committee, and roll-over relief, the subject of new clause 19. Those measures alone will not produce the revival of the British shipping industry that all hon. Members want. Other measures relating to employment are necessary, but they are not matters for the Finance Bill.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary for his recent answer about relative corporate tax regimes as they relate to shipping industries in the European Community. That answer showed that, even on the Treasury figures, the relative advantage to the British shipping industry is much smaller than is sometimes claimed from the Dispatch Box. The answer did not deal fully with many of the important nuances that apply to shipping company taxation in other EC member states. The combination of those effects is to make the British taxation regime for the shipping industry the most unfavourable in the EC. I, for one, cannot accept that as a permanent state of affairs.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London recently stated from the Dispatch Box that he intended to seek to phase out other countries' state aid. His view is widely shared by Conservative Members. We do not want shipping, or any other industry, to be subsidised unreasonably, but when other countries provide advantages to their companies through the tax system, we should seek the same treatment for ours. My hon. Friend said that his policy was to seek to phase out those other state aids, so I am disappointed that the Government are not making much progress with the increases in aid being given by the German, French and Dutch Governments to their shipping industries. All those countries are doing more, and I am afraid that at present our Government seem reluctant to do anything.

We are in danger of throwing away an industry in which we enjoy real competitive advantages in the international economy. I understand that there is a problem with the way we do our public accounts. Who should pick up the bill? The Department of Transport obviously would not be happy with an increase in its budget provision for that sector without receiving some additional total funding from the Treasury, although it is worth recalling that only 2 per cent. of Department of Transport expenditure goes on air and sea combined. The Ministry of Defence, which ought to have a vested interest in picking up the bill because of the enormous bonus that a strong British merchant fleet provides to the country's defence, is also reluctant. The Treasury, because of the first year problem that I mentioned, seems to be equally reluctant. If I were an entrepreneurial member of the Cabinet I would beseech the Treasury to be allowed to pick up the bill in year one, so long as I could have the profits in years two, three, four, five and six, because I would have a lot more money to spend if I took that approach.

I especially agree with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) about residence and domiciliary rules. London remains the maritime centre of the world, and that is in large part due to the presence of foreign nationals engaged in shipping activities. It has been a long-running obsession of the Inland Revenue to try to tax those people on the same footing as British residents, which would kill the goose that lays the golden egg and drive those residents elsewhere, causing a great loss to the British economy. So I am glad that at least we seem to have resisted that temptation in the Bill.

Another industry that might have looked for slightly more sympathetic treatment in the Bill is the British beer industry. There must be concern about the effects of steadily higher rates of duty on beer, the effect that those rates have on depressing sales in the United Kingdom and especially the encouragement that that provides to personal and even illegal imports with the completion of the European single market. I hope that as Ministers approach the next Finance Bill they will look carefully at the price elasticity of those increases in duty and decide whether they generate additional or less revenue for the Exchequer, either through the port of Dover or in the loss of sales at the local pub.

The Government have recently taken a number of welcome steps to benefit the car industry, such as the abolition of the special car tax. One has only to look at the increase in car registrations that has occurred as a result. The Government have also benefited the scotch whisky industry. Speaking as someone who intends to holiday in Scotland this year, I am glad of the warm reception I shall get for that measure. The Government have even looked after the horse racing industry. All those measures are good and I hope that a similarly enlightened view will prevail in relation to brewing and shipping.

It has been said that the Bill contains hard thinks, and it does—especially the matter of VAT on fuel and power. I cannot pretend that I welcome that tax, but I recognise it as essential and one that I will definitely support. It is important to remember that fuel prices have fallen in real terms since 1986. Electricity prices are broadly level, but they are going down this year. Gas prices have fallen by 20 per cent. because of the tough regulation that the Government introduced to accompany the privatisation of those industries. Despite the phased increase in VAT over the next few years, many people will be paying less in real terms for gas than they would have been before the imposition of VAT and before the privatisation of those industries. We must remember that that compares sharply with fuel bills under the previous Labour Government, when electricity prices rose by 30 per cent. in real terms. What was done then to help the poorest members of society?

I believe that the imposition of VAT is important to raise revenue. That is its clear objective. I also have no hesitation in supporting it on environmental grounds. At Question Time earlier, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister explained the hypocrisy of the Opposition parties on that issue. We heard then of their policies. We heard what the Opposition said was necessary to protect the environment by reducing carbon dioxide emissions. I especially welcome the endorsement by Friends of the Earth of our attempts to increase measures taken to control carbon dioxide emissions.

It is right, though, to sound a small warning. I am sure that those on benefit will be fully compensated and I welcome that unreservedly. However, there is the question of those just above benefit levels, especially single elderly people. I hope that the next Finance Bill will not increase the burdens on those with modest incomes who are not eligible for benefit, especially those living on their own. A number of recent measures have had an adverse impact on that group and I hope that the burden will not increase in future Finance Bills.

The Bill has had a reassuring effect on foreign exchange markets, which has in turn affected interest rates. We should be careful before further reducing interest rates. I hear no great calls from companies in my constituency for a further reduction and we should recognise the implications that any reduction would have for those on fixed incomes.

I welcome the stability that the Finance Bill and the promise of future levels of revenue that the Government plans have brought to foreign exchange markets, and the beneficial effect that that has had on interest rates as a result.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) earlier accused the Government of not facing facts. I believe that the Bill shows that the Government are all too prepared to face the facts. I would remind her, were she still present, of the rise in manufacturing output. I would also remind her that in my region, the west midlands, manufacturing output and business optimism are running at the highest level for many years—according to one survey, the highest level since the survey began eight years ago.

The production of Land Rover Discovery vehicles is up by 44 per cent. and 300 more jobs are sought for the production line. Unemployment is down for the fourth month in a row, inflation is at a 29-year low, decades of decline in our share of world trade have been halted, exports are up by 6·5 per cent. in the first quarter of this year and manufacturing investment is up by 5·4 per cent. in the same period.

Those are the facts that the Opposition should be facing and I hope that they will have the courage and honesty to do so, though somehow I doubt it. It is no wonder that in reflecting on the economic strategy of the Labour party and what it might have introduced through the Finance Bill if—God forbid—it had been the party in power, Tribune said on 23 April:

"Dissatisfaction with Labour's hopelessly unconvincing economic policies . . . is widespread within the Shadow Cabinet".

The success of this Finance Bill has been proved. There is growing recovery, a strengthening pound, falling unemployment and falling inflation. The broad strategy of the Bill is essential to our continued economic success. There are no sins of commission in the Bill. In a mildly critical passage, I have highlighted some sins of omission. I hope that the second 1993 Finance Bill will begin to address those sins of omission, but I have no hesitation in commending this Bill to the House.

9.9 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South-East): The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) referred to the improvement in the economy, and he referred specifically to the west midlands. I should remind him that there are still about 250,000 unemployed people in the west midlands. In my constituency, there are still redundancy announcements at companies such as GPT, which has announced 300 more redundancies over the past three or four weeks. The same thing is happening at Dunlop in Coventry. I should like to know where all the signs are that the economy in the west midlands is improving in the way in which the hon. Member for Worcester suggested.

There is no doubt that the Bill does not deal with the hidden time bomb of the balance of payments problem, to which many hon. Members referred. If we analyse the balance of payments, we may find that the industrial base of many of the wealth-creating industries—manufacturing industries—has been eroded. That has an effect on the creation of wealth in the national economy.

I was interested in the Prime Minister's statement yesterday in which he referred to the talks on the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The Government and their partners have not resolved the agricultural problems involved in GATT. Also within that statement—it is relevant to the Bill—the Prime Minister did not hold out any hope that there would be any major reduction of unemployment in the western economies. We must look at the Government's measures, particularly in the Bill, to tackle the balance of payments problem, unemployment and wealth creation.

Only a fortnight ago, together with a number of colleagues, I met the old-age pensioners' lobby. Some hon. Members have referred to the concerns of old-age pensioners and I do not want to dwell too much on that. When old-age pensioners apply for state benefits, their meagre savings are taken into account; as a result, the pensioners do not accrue any interest on them, and that affects their planned budgets. As we know, most old-age pensioners have some form of planned budget to run their homes, so they will be hurt by the increases in VAT and the changes in their state benefits. There is a double whammy which should be minimised.

Some Cabinet committees are looking at Government expenditure outside the Bill and as part of it. They are looking at cuts in the national health service and there has been talk about charges. About a fortnight ago, thousands of people outside the House expressed great concern about possible post office closures. Therefore, we are not just looking at the Bill in relation to the economy as we understand it. There are hidden factors at work within the economy that the Bill does not necessarily address. I hope that the House will give serious thought to those issues.

The Government have said that they have a medium-term economic strategy. They have not spelled out to the House what they mean by "medium-term". Do they mean 10 years down the road, three years or 12 months.

Over the past 14 years, we have had a succession of Budgets that it was claimed would put right all the economic ills of Britain. They have dismally failed to do that. It is no good going back 14 years and making comparisons with the last Labour Government. The economic policies that are practised by the Government are those of the ancient Britons rather than of the modern Britons.

The Chief Secretary's opening remarks certainly alluded to my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms Harman). I interpreted his remarks as a job description for the position not only of Chief Secretary but of shadow Chief Secretary. I could not help but think that that job description might have applied in an ideal world; in other words, his words showed the wishes and visions of a Don Quixote rather than those of a strong Government determined to tackle Britain's economic problems and equally determined that sacrifices should be made on a fair basis. The Bill does not address those matters.

9.15 pm

Mr. Betts: The Budget is almost exclusively about the Government's obsession with curing the Budget deficit that they have created. The previous Chancellor of the Exchequer talked in his resignation statement about the absence of long-term policy thinking from the Government. He could also have said, had he been more objective, that the Government's economic policy had been based on a number of obsessions.

The Government's obsession in the early 1980s was with dealing with inflation, and that obsession caused the disastrous collapse of our manufacturing industry. The Government were then obsessed with financial deregulation, which created the credit boom and the debt overhang with which the Government must now cope. Their obsession with inflation at the end of the 1980s caused the longest recession in Britain since the war. Now the Government's obsession is with the public sector borrowing requirement.

The Chancellor's one policy statement since his appointment—if one can call it that—said, in effect, that if the recovery is stronger than the Government think, tax incomes will go up. There will then be less of a need for the Government to act by making public expenditure reductions and further tax increases. Unfortunately, the reverse is also true: if the recovery is slightly less strong, there will be a greater need for the Government to impose more tax increases and cut expenditure further. The worry is that the Government are obsessed totally with the PSBR. The recovery comes as an afterthought in that process.

The recovery and the appalling problems of unemployment should be the Government's prime objectives. I do not mean simply short-term unemployment, when people have been out of work for two or three weeks; I mean cases such as the young man to whom I talked in Sheffield recently. He is aged 27 and has never had a job in his life. He has moved from one training scheme to another. He has had the misfortune to spend the whole of his working life—or, in his case, non-working life—under the Government and their policies.

It is not true for the Government to say that the recovery is under way and that it is all right for them to deal with the PSBR by raising taxes or reducing expenditure. A recent survey of Sheffield industry was carried out by The Star and a local firm of accountants. The results showed that

"despite the recent spate of news concerning recovery, businesses believe the effects of the recession will be felt into 1994 and beyond and that the real recovery will be delayed until then."

More than half—62 per cent.—of business respondents "thought the recession would end in 1994 and beyond."

A similar figure—68 per cent.—thought that "Government policy was not working for the benefit of UK businesses".

That is what businesses in Sheffield feel about the Government's claims about the recovery.

Despite the Chief Secretary's analysis of the PSBR, the problem is totally the Government's fault. Cyclical PSBR problems are the fault of the immediate recession, but the structural problems of the PSBR are the fault of the Government's long-term economic policy and the underlying weakness of the economy.

It worried me that the Chief Secretary did not answer my earlier question. The Government do not understand the difference between the cyclical and the structural problems of the PSBR or how to deal with them. If they get it wrong and attempt to tackle the structural problems at the wrong point in the economic cycle, they will squash any faint hope of recovery. That will cause damage for years to come. The Government have not faced up to that issue and are not prepared to answer questions about it. They have not seen the need for action, and their idea is that one can somehow mirror the national economic situation as an aggregate of household budgets.

The Chief Secretary talked about a bank account. That is a throwback to the neoclassical economics idea that macro-economics is merely micro-economics writ large. Let us learn some lessons from the past. Wynne Godley, one of the seven wise men appointed to help the Chancellor, said in a submission to the first round of the Chancellor's review that he believed that eventually the PSBR would "add enough to national output to generate enough tax revenue . . . to cover not only the addition to public expenditure, but also the interest payments which have been generated by the additional public sector debt."

That answers the Chief Secretary's point about the problems of a cyclical recovery reducing the PSBR by the full amount.

I agree with my hon. Friends that the real problem for the Government is not the PSBR but the balance of payments crisis—a £12 billion debt at a time of economic depression. That boils down to a lack of economic and industrial capacity, caused by the Government's economic policies. The real problem for the Government is that there is a limit to the amount of recovery that can be generated without creating an even bigger balance of payments deficit. There is also a further restraint in the shape of how the cyclical element of the balance of payments can be dealt with during the recovery, and the Government have not come to grips with it. For an answer, they should go to the Bank for International Settlements, which recently said:

"Growth above the current rate will be required to reduce the budget deficit but could increase the current account deficit. On the other hand, growth compatible with a stable current account deficit might lead to an unsustainable rise in the public sector imbalance."

The Government are not facing up to that dilemma. It is no use Conservative Members saying that fiscal restraint is not the answer—that the Government can deal with the problem by relaxing monetary policy. We have not heard what the Government's monetary policy is. Do they have one? It is all very well saying that we have left the exchange rate mechanism so there are now no international restrictions; there is every evidence that the Government are merely shadowing the deutschmark at DM2.5. Is there an internal, domestic policy governing the money supply? It is certainly unclear how the Government see monetary and fiscal policy.

The Government have an obsession with the PSBR to the exclusion of all else. One objective does not make an economic policy. We know from the previous Chancellor that the Government have no long-term policies: in my submission, they have no short-term economic policies either. They have created an appalling economic mess. They should be condemned for that, and doubly condemned for the fact that they have no coherent economic strategy to get the country out of the mess that they have created.

Mr. Hoon: The Bill is based on a lie told to the British people at the time of the general election—the lie that a Conservative Government had no need and no plans to raise taxation, and that people could vote Conservative in the expectation of tax cuts to come. That was the essence of the Conservative appeal to the electorate in the election campaign.

Within 12 months, the Government brought in the Bill, imposing a series of tax increases and changes on the British people—not only VAT increases and increases in national insurance contributions but alterations in allowances and reliefs against income tax for almost everyone, increasing taxes right across the range of measures that are available to any Government. When challenged repeatedly about that, the Chief Secretary defends each tax regime measure almost cheerfully. He cheerfully admitted this evening that this was a revenue-raising, tax-increasing Budget. He did that in Committee and he has done it again tonight. It is necessary, he says, to fund the £50 billion deficit at the heart of the Government's finances.

What is curious about the right hon. Gentleman's approach to the deficit is the fact that he has consistently failed to deal with its causes. Where does the deficit come from? It is almost as if it arrived one day from another planet and was nothing to do with the Government, who have had, rather distastefully, to deal with it. Yet throughout the election campaign and parliamentary progress on the Bill Conservative Members have attacked the Labour party's spending plans even though a Conservative Government are forecasting a £50 billion deficit. They are therefore not in the strongest position from which to criticise.

Apart from admitting to a newly discovered enthusiasm for raising taxes, the Government have provided us with little analysis of how they got into such a sorry state. Instead, they continue to try to face both ways, claiming to be the party of tax cuts just as they significantly increase the burden of taxation on the British people.

In Committee, the Financial Secretary pointed to the limitation on reliefs to 20 per cent. as a sign of the Government's so-called commitment to reducing taxation. It is a remarkable exercise in double-speak for a tax-raising Government to try to claim credit for their so-called commitment to reducing taxes by increasing income tax for anyone with a mortgage, yet pretend that it was a sign of better things to come.

There is little doubt that the measures are designed to deceive and defraud the electorate—big tax increases now with a view to smaller tax reductions later. Some Conservative Members may ask what is wrong with that. The answer is clear: it is making the British economy and the British people subservient to the interests of the Conservative party in being re-elected. It makes them subservient to the interests of Ministers who want to keep their jobs, ahead of the real interests of the country.

Anyone who has any doubts about that argument should consider the history of the past two Budgets. The 1992 pre-election Budget was designed to win votes at a time when serious economic commentators were pointing to the dangers of the growing size of the public sector borrowing requirement. When asked about that during the general election, what did Ministers say? Minister after Minister stated that he saw no difficulty with the PSBR, that he had no need to raise taxes, that he had set the right targets for public expenditure.

Twelve months later, those same Ministers are standing on their heads, their forecasts and promises empty of content and meaning. Are we really to believe that they were genuinely caught out by some apparently unforeseen growth in the PSBR? Those same Ministers, in the 1992 general election campaign, confidently forecast recovery for the British economy. They predicted that their assessment of the country's needs for borrowing and taxation could be contained within the guidelines set out in the 1992 Budget. They had access to all of the relevant Government figures when they said last year that their assessments in April 1992 were accurate. They were either incompetent or dishonest. Which is it? It is important that we and the British people know the answer.

I have little doubt that the Government plan to make most people's lives more miserable this year, next year, and perhaps even the year after. By 1996, the likely Tory target date for a general election, they can start easing back. They can look for tax cuts and handouts going into a general election campaign, paid for by the tax increases in this year's Finance Bill. That is their real policy. It is not so much an economic policy as a re-election policy. By then, as electricity and gas bills start to hit the doormats with their 17·5 per cent. Government surcharge, the British people will be looking for change. The Government will no doubt introduce proposals to reduce the level of income tax, not for the benefit of the British economy, but simply to boost their prospects of re-election.

The Government cannot expect that deception to work yet again. It is time for them to stop playing politics with the British economy and to face up to the fundamental problems that their policies have created.

Mr. Mandelson: It is no secret that Opposition Members hate the Budget, which is being implemented by the Bill. We hate it for what it does not do about unemployment, which has dramatically increased in so many regions and is still chronic in regions such as mine. We hate it for the unfairness of its measures and the savage impact that it will have on so many of the needy and most vulnerable. We hate it for the distance that the Government have travelled from the glossy gift-wrapped prospectus that they presented to the electorate in the election campaign last year, notwithstanding the fact that Opposition Members will be the political beneficiaries of the betrayal of so many of the Tories' supporters last year.

We wanted to see in this Budget ideas to get the young people in our constituencies and communities back to work, to get the long-term unemployed back to work, or at least on proper quality training schemes where they can pick up skills in readiness for the recovery, whenever it occurs. In no sense have we seen a Budget for jobs. That is undoubtedly the greatest indictment of the Budget and the Bill, the effect of which will be felt by so many people in our constituencies.

The Bill is grossly unfair and unequal in its impact on different sections of the community. It is ironic, although perhaps not surprising, that those of us who served on the Committee considering the Finance Bill spent many hours sorting out problems and making things better—but, tragically, not for the people in real and desperate need. Throughout, the Government cared most about their friends—for example, the Lloyd's names, for whom they have created what will probably turn out to be a highly beneficial tax shelter. For large oil companies, there is massively reduced petroleum revenue duties. As speaker after speaker has reminded us, this measure will destroy jobs in exploration among the medium-sized and smaller oil companies as well as the onshore activity that is so important in my constituency and others in Scotland and in the north-east.

The Committee even took time to create a tax break for wealthy foreigners so that they could buy homes here without running the risk that they might be caught for tax. Tory Members may say that that was worth only £10 million, but was that £10 million used for the poor, for the low-paid, for struggling businesses? No, it was for the friends of the Tory party. It was particularly symbolic for that.

It was noteworthy, but probably predictable, that nothing of equal value requiring similar effort was done throughout the proceedings of the Committee to close the loopholes and stop the abuses that offer such opportunities to the already wealthy and well-off, and other friends of the Conservative party. The Government know how to look after their friends. They have not even bothered to chase up those missing millions—the £1·7 billion—in last year's uncollected taxes. That is twice the sum that went uncollected in the previous year and possibly, most significantly of all, twice the expected revenue from VAT on fuel that the Government are intending to claim next year.

In Committee, we should have spent our time implementing a straight quid pro quo, ensuring that there were measures in place to collect the uncollected taxes from the most wealthy and privileged, rather than extending VAT on fuel—a tax on warmth, light and heat. It is not surprising that that is seen as the most notorious, nefarious and objectionable feature of the Bill, which will haunt the Government from here to Christchurch and back via Newbury.

The contrast between what the Government promised that they would do for the low-paid, the typical taxpayer and the middle-income earner and those whom they are actually helping goes to the heart of what is so damnable and objectionable about the Bill. It has laid bare the whole cynical, fraudulent case that the Conservative party put to the voters at the election last year. The Tories said that it would be safe to reduce taxes and possible to lower borrowing and that it would not be necessary to increase costs or impose new charges. They said that economic growth would square the circle and deal with the details, yet the Budget and the Bill have put up taxes. The Bill has done nothing to get people back to work, enabling borrowing to be reduced; instead, it has increased the cost of living, of mortgages and employment and provided not a single new policy or fresh initiative to create new jobs or to spur enterprise and growth.

Overwhelmingly, people recognise that the country is in a hole. Everyone knows it and the Chancellor has even said it. Hardly a soul does not realise that, in the long term, we cannot live with the public sector financial deficit we have now. People know that difficult decisions have to be taken; they do not expect anything else. However, they do expect the Government to accept responsibility and to take action to get the economy moving. They expect the Government to respond vigorously and imaginatively to the crisis of unemployment. Above all, they expect the Government to be fair on the tax measures that they take. On all those counts, the Government have failed and the Finance Bill deserves to fail as well.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Chief Secretary to the Treasury opened this debate by referring to the views of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. He treated us to a fairly partial run through the OECD's views of the British economy before describing himself as odious. In returning to those aspects of the OECD's review of the British economy which the Chief Secretary overlooked, I should like to draw the attention of the House to the OECD's review, which it instigated and reported on in its publication "Economic Outlook", in which it considered the health of the public sector in all OECD countries.

One would not have learnt this from the Chief Secretary's contribution to the debate, but the OECD found in its review that the United Kingdom compares very unfavourably with other OECD countries. Between 1989 and 1993, the United Kingdom's deficit widened by more than 9 per cent. of GDP, and that is more than that of any other G7 country. That point puts the Chief Secretary's remarks in context.

The unique depth and duration of the United Kingdom's recession are clearly partly responsible for that state of affairs, although I know that it is fashionable—and probably obligatory—for Conservative Members to blame the world recession for the shrinkage of the British economy.

The OECD estimates that 2·6 per cent. of GDP—about one third of the deficit—is a result of the recession. However, when the Chief Secretary was asked to quote even the broadest of estimates for those figures, he declined to do so. He could at least have quoted the OECD in that respect as he was keen enough to quote it on other matters. The OECD estimate would leave a PSBR of 5·7 per cent. of GDP which is structural. That means that the borrowing will remain even when the economy recovers. That structural deficit is a measure of the health of public sector finances, purged of the effects of short-term economic cycles. That is worse in the United Kingdom than in any other G7 country bar Italy. That is the problem which the Budget attempts to address.

Conservative Members always ask what Labour would do in such circumstances. I will answer that not by saying what Labour would do in the future, but by saying what Labour has done in the past. The problem has been made substantially worse by tax cuts of £6 billion given in 1988 and tax cuts of a further £2 billion to which we were treated in 1992 before the general election. Labour believed then, and we believe now, that those tax cuts were beyond what public finances could afford, and the blame for that lies with the Government and with no one else.

If people want to know what we said at the time, I can tell them that we voted against those measures. That is a matter of public record. A Labour Government would not have got us into the position into which the present Conservative Government have got us.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) pointed out, before the last election the Government said that the economy would grow by 2 per cent. in 1992-93, by 3·25 per cent. this year, by 3·75 per cent. next year and by 3·5 per cent. in 1995-96. The Red Book this year showed that the economy was stagnant for 1992-93. It forecast growth of just 2 per cent. this year, 2·5 per cent. next year and 2·75 per cent. for each year after that.

The Government boast of recovery and revise the forecasts down. The Government promised recovery and they now show that the economy did not grow for a year. The Government promised vigorous economic growth for the next five years, but they now say that the economy will be just 2 per cent. larger this year rather than the 5·25 per cent. promised last year. The Government have cut their forecast for the size of the economy in 1996-97 by 7 per cent., or some £55 billion.

That £55 billion means that the economy will be poorer by the equivalent of £1,000 a year for every man, woman and child in the country. Those are not short-term forecasts subject to the inevitable uncertainties arising from the vagaries in economic cycles. Those changes reflect a fundamentally different view about the capacity of the United Kingdom economy to grow and to improve living standards and pay for public services.

Last year the Government's figures showed a public sector borrowing requirement of £32 billion for the current year; the Red Book shows that the Government now expect to borrow £50 billion. Last year, the Government showed the deficit declining to £6 billion in 1996-97. The Government said that there would be no need to cut spending or raise taxes and that the public finances would return to balance as the economy followed the recovery that I have just outlined. It has already been revealed that the £6 billion was massaged downwards on the orders of the former Chancellor, but now we are told that the borrowing required will be £46 billion if the Government do not raise taxes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) has pointed out that the Government painted a false picture last year. The Government said that the economy would recover; it did not do so for another year. The Government said that recovery would be vigorous; now they take a significantly gloomier view of growth prospects. The Government said that taxes would not need to be raised. Now, in line with the new realism about economic growth that the Chief Secretary treated us to earlier, he has said that taxes need to be increased.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) pointed out, the Conservatives were not content with lying about our tax policies before the general election; they comprehensively lied about their own.

The Chief Secretary, in opening the debate, asserted that the Budget was broadly distributionally neutral, with the average proportion of income lost equal across income deciles at around 2·5 per cent. But 2·5 per cent. of income is of differing importance to the poorest and richest groups in society. Is it not disproportionate to ask the rich and poor alike for the same proportion of their income to reduce the deficit?

Contrasting the distributional effects of what happens when the Government need to raise tax rather than cut it, surely it is right to assert that they have increased national insurance contributions when they have cut income tax. Individuals start to pay national insurance contributions on earnings at least £1,000 lower than those on which income tax is paid. The Government have frozen income tax allowance, which raises money from people on the lowest incomes, when they have cut the higher rates of tax.

All in all, the richest 10 per cent. of the population are now £4,500 a year better off after the tax and benefit changes since 1979, and the poorest 10 per cent. of our fellow citizens are actually £50 a year worse off.

None of this is popular, but it is typical of this Prime Minister's decision making that, when he was faced with an unpopular Chancellor and an unpopular Budget, he got rid of the Chancellor and kept the Budget.

My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth) has pointed out that the Government have cynically dressed up the extension of VAT to domestic fuel as an environmental measure. The truth of the matter is that it is nothing more than a large tax rise. VAT on fuel is the most regressive extension of the VAT base. Before knock-on effects and compensation, it will raise 2 per cent. of net income from the poorest 10 per cent, and less than 0·5 per cent. from the richest 10 per cent. I ask even Conservative hon. Members, how can that be fair? At least some Conservative Members realised last night that it was not fair, and, very bravely, they voted with us in the Lobby to assert what one of them described as social justice. I noticed that his colleagues stared at him as if he had said something peculiarly offensive. Perhaps the Conservative party does regard social justice as something peculiarly offensive, but I bet that the electors of Christchurch do not.

Mr. Dorrell: They are not voting for the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Brown: I am not standing in the election. I prefer the climate in Newcastle.

As domestic heat and light are necessities, fuel consumption will not be cut by much as a result of this tax rise. If anyone is still giving the argument about the environment any credence, he cannot plausibly argue that the tax increase will do much to reduce the emissions of CO_2 in line with the United Nations climate for change convention. As my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) has pointed out, the changes hit the poorest the hardest.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) asked who gains and who loses in this year's Finance Bill. If the Government decided to have their legislation financially sponsored rather than the arrangements that pertain at present, this could be known as the British Petroleum Finance Bill. The petroleum industry would be happy to acknowledge sponsorship of this year's measures.

The heads of foreign states have also gained from the Bill. Those with an interest in foreign affairs will be pleased to learn that they remain relieved of any obligation to pay tax on their British income. The hereditary rulers of Brunei, Saudi Arabia, Dubai and Oman are now treated more favourably than our sovereign, but they gave large sums of money to the Conservative party and our sovereign did not—[Interruption.] Is the Chief Secretary trying to assert that Her Gracious Majesty gave money to the Conservative party, because I cannot believe it? I must have misheard that sedentary intervention.

The Bill makes a small concession to wealthy foreigners with tax-exempt status. If Asil Nadir were to return to this country, he would benefit from that little £10 million change to our tax regime. The British people, who have not contributed generously enough on a voluntary basis to Conservative party funds, are subject to a massive tax rise.

In a previous Third Reading speech on the Finance Bill I said that discussing the Finance Bill without the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) would be like discussing Hamlet without the ham. This will be the last Bill where we discuss the Budget with the right hon. Gentleman. Personally, I regret his passing. It is probably worth pointing out that that is the first nice thing that has been said about the right hon. Gentleman in the entire debate. What an astonishing legacy for a former Chancellor that not a single Conservative Member has said something nice about him.

Mr. Duncan: I did.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman protests his innocence, although I am not sure that it would be regarded as innocence by his colleagues in the Treasury. I hope that he will be rewarded with being forgiven with the passage of time.

It is sad that hon. Members who followed the Chancellor loyally through the Division Lobbies on the Budget could not find a decent word to say for him when discussing the legislation that he has brought to fruition.

[Mr. Brown]

His epitaph is not a single kind word from Conservative Members, even from his loyal deputy, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

The Bill includes value added tax on fuel; ACT changes hitting charities and pension funds; a 1 per cent. increase in employees' national insurance contributions; the non-indexation of allowances; restricting mortgage tax relief and married couples allowances to the new 20 per cent. band; and significant new increases in excise duties, notably on petrol and cigarettes.

Tonight we are invited not just to acknowledge the extent of the Government's mismanagement of the economy but to pay for it. I suggest that my hon. Friends reject that invitation.

9.48 pm

Mr. Dorrell: First, I wish to respond to the comment of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) about my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont). The most eloquent testimony of my hon. Friends' support for the Budget introduced by my right hon. Friend is for them to support the Third Reading tonight. I have not the slightest doubt that they will all take the opportunity to record their support for the Budget proposals tabled by my right hon. Friend on 16 March.

The Third Reading debate is the end of a long process in which the House and the Standing Committee considered the proposals tabled by my right hon. Friend on 16 March. My hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) spoke about the petroleum revenue tax—one of the major tax proposals contained in the Budget. It has properly detained the Committee of the whole House and the Standing Committee as we have ensured that the issue is properly addressed. The concerns expressed within the oil industry and oil supply industries were also properly discussed.

It is true to say of my hon. Friend the Member for Slough and my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Sir C. Onslow), who has also taken a keen interest in the subject, that they accept, as do the vast majority of those actively involved in the oil industry, the objective of seeking to remove the distortions that the existing system of high rate and narrow base imposes on the oil industry through petroleum revenue tax. That objective is common ground.

As the Bill has proceeded, we have had considerable discussions on the nature of the transition arrangements which secure the transition from where we are now to where we all want to be. In the course of the Bill's consideration, the Government have sought to respond to the concerns expressed about the transition arrangements, not least by my hon. Friend the Member for Slough. The time has come to record the fact that, as the House has decided matters and the Bill has proceeded, it has become clear that there is a difference of opinion about the desirability of any further action on transitional arrangements. The House has made a decision in favour of the transition arrangements contained in the Bill.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Does the Minister understand the deep sense of betrayal felt in the oil industry this morning about the events over the weekend? Can he give a clear answer to the following question: at his meeting with his right hon. and hon. Friends on Thursday night, did he give a hint that he was likely to change his mind? If the answer is no, the placing of the amendments on the amendment paper was duplicitous, and if the answer is yes, he was being duplicitous.

Mr. Dorrell: There is nothing duplicitous about placing amendments on the amendment paper. I listened to the representations made by my hon. Friends and undertook —as I should in the circumstances—to report and discuss those representations with my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. After the argument on the issue, it is important for us to be clear about matters.

The Government believe that the position set out in the Bill, on both the transition arrangements and the final objective, will endure in the long term. I can think of no perception more likely to undermine exploration and appraisal activity in the short term than the perception —if allowed to develop—that the Government may be about to reconsider the issues. That would be a powerful incentive for oil companies to delay exploration and appraisal until a future date when exploration and appraisal relief may be available. The Government have no plans to revisit the issue. We believe that the proposals contained in the Bill will endure, and when the results are clear our judgments will be vindicated.

We have agreed to look again at the narrow issue of the treatment of pipelines. We make no commitment, except in the broadest sense of maintaining the tax system—which is our continuing duty—to look again at any of the other issues relating to that subject contained in the Bill.

Mr. Salmond: The Minister knows all about undermining confidence in the oil industry. He said a few seconds ago that the House had made a decision on the subject. The House has had no opportunity, subsequent to the Government's refusal to make a concession in Committee, to make a decision on the subject, other than to vote in a few minutes' time.

Mr. Dorrell: The House has considered the matter both in Committee of the whole House and in Standing Committee.

As the Third Reading of the debate has unfolded, I have listened to speeches from right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House. One factor which has become clear to me, particularly from the speeches of Opposition Members, is that not a single Opposition Member has made any serious reference to the fact that there are clear signs that recovery is under way in the British economy, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary made clear in his opening speech on Third Reading.

That perspective was almost totally lacking in the speeches made by Labour Members. One listened in vain to their speeches to hear a reference to the survey of the Confederation of Business Industry, which records the best sentiment among British business men since April 1983. One listened in vain to hear about the increase in retail sales of 3 per cent. over the past 12 months. One listened in vain for a reference to the increase in car registrations, which are up by 6·5 per cent. over the past 12 months.

Despite Labour Members' protestations of interest in the manufacturing sector, one listened in vain to them for a reference to the fact that manufacturing output has been increasing for 12 months but has now reversed in the first five months of this year to more than half of the total loss of manufacturing output in the recession. Despite all the occasions over the years on which Labour Members have said that unemployment is the key factor, one listened in vain to their speeches for a single reference to the fact that unemployment has fallen in the past four months. That is good news, but reference was not made to it by Labour Members. I have further bad news for them——

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I will not give way.

The further bad news is that we intend that the recovery which is under way, and to which Labour Members did not refer, will be sustained because the Government are determined to deliver the disciplines that will ensure that it is sustained.

I refer to the discipline of sound money. The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) has taken to quoting my speeches back at me. That is great flattery. Because she repeatedly quotes from my speech about the dangers of inflation, I can only assume that she agrees with those dangers. For example, I assume that she agrees that inflation causes economic waste by giving inaccurate signals and introducing short-term planning horizons.

I assume that the hon. Lady agrees that inflation causes social injustice, which ensures that the system does not reward those who produce—it rewards those with the sharpest elbows. Inflation is a tax on the unsophisticated, to the benefit of the sophisticated. I am pleased to welcome her support for those propositions.

The hands of Labour Members are not clean on the subject of inflation—far from it. In the 1970s, the Labour Government were responsible for an average inflation rate of 15 per cent. during their years in office. What were they doing from 1986 to 1988 when the misjudgments which we acknowledge were being made led to an excess inflation rate? They were busy winding the handle that distributed the seeds of the harvest that came later.

In those years, what was Labour Members' formula for interest rates? They travelled the country telling us that interest rates should be fixed by a simple formula—X minus 2 per cent. when X was the prevailing interest rate. Whatever the interest rate, they wanted to see it cut. They did not see the dangers of inflation. If we had followed their nostrums, we would have made the matter worse.

In sharp contrast to that world, the Government have delivered the sound money and price stability objective that is the necessary precondition to sustainable growth. We have also made it clear that we will deliver sound public finance. That is the second discipline, which Labour Members talk about but on which we act. How would a Labour Government deliver sound public finance? It would not be through tax increases. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) shut and locked that door before the Budget when he said that to raise income tax, national insurance or VAT at that time would be a mistake. How would a Labour Government close the Budget deficit? Would the hon. Gentleman look to the hon. Member for Peckham? Would the whole burden rest on her? She wants more money for hospitals, schools, training and overseas aid. Under her, a spending round would be not so much a spending round as an auction.

The Bill lies at the heart of the difference between the parties. Others talk about the deficit. They recognise that it threatens sustainable recovery, but when asked what they would do about it, answer comes there none. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) said of his party:

"We have failed to come up with an alternative analysis."

That is the luxury of opposition—sound-bite populism, the opportunity to be all things to all men. Labour Members have forgotten the dictum of Aneurin Bevan:

"The language of socialism is the religion of priorities."

The modern Labour party has lost its faith. The world in which Labour Members live is not the real world. The House knows it and the British people know it, which is why the British people have consistently rejected the plausible blandishments of the Opposition.

The Bill represents the Government's continuing commitment to deliver the disciplines which are the precondition of economic success, and I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Education (Assisted Places)

10.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools (Mr. Eric Forth): I beg to move,

That the draft Education (Assisted Places) (Amendment) Regulations 1993, which were laid before this House on 29th June, be approved.

As hon. Members will know from debates in previous years, these draft amendment regulations are quite specific in their purpose. They are simple amendments to the principal regulations, which are the Education (Assisted Places) Regulations 1989. As such, I shall restrict my comments to these amendments only and will briefly explain their purpose to the House.

The amending regulations provide for the uprating of the parental contribution tables, which we have done on an annual basis since the inception of the scheme, and set out how much parents must pay towards their child's assisted place. There is also a small number of other technical amendments. I am sure that the House will find that the amendments I shall describe are quite straightforward.

Regulation 1 of the draft regulations deals with citation, commencement, application and interpretation. The regulations are to come into force on 27 August 1993.

Regulation 2 of the draft regulations increases the allowance made when calculating parents' total relevant income for each dependent child other than the assisted place holder. The amount is raised from £1,105 to £1,125 —that is, by the same percentage which applies to the uprating of the parental contribution scales, to which I shall return in a moment. This allowance is helpful to parents with larger families, and uprating it will ensure that their position is not worsened.

Regulation 3 deals purely with technical amendments. They are necessary in order to keep the definition of "total parental income" for the purposes of the scheme in line with tax legislation. They also update the wording of the regulations to reflect current terminology—hence the need now to refer in the regulations to the new Child Support Agency.

I come now to the main purpose of setting these regulations before the House today. Regulation 4 sets out the income bands used for assessing parents' contributions towards fees. These bands have been uprated to take account of the movement in the retail prices index to April of this year—that is, by 1·9 per cent. The threshold at or below which parents pay nothing towards fees is raised from £9,056 to £9,225, with corresponding increases in the thresholds for higher percentage contributions from income. The effect of this amendment is that parents will not be asked to increase contributions above the rate of inflation. They will continue to contribute roughly the same proportion of their income as they did last year.

I believe that the House will find this to be an equitable measure, taking into account the fact that parents in the scheme earn considerably less than the national average income. Assistance under the scheme follows the principle that the lower the income, the greater the Government assistance should be. The threshold for full remission of fees, to which I have just referred, is set deliberately low so that the least well-off families benefit most. The scale then rises by a fairly steep curve so that better-off families get reduced, and eventually no, assistance. I believe this to be right and in keeping with the aims of the scheme—to open doors of opportunity to those who would otherwise never be able to contemplate paying fees.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): How many children in Great Britain are now benefiting from the assisted places scheme?

Mr. Forth: Approximately 27,000. I can give the hon. Gentleman a more precise figure later, if he wants one.

The provisions and amendments that I have just described are necessary technicalities to ensure the continued smooth running of the assisted places scheme, which is proving to be increasingly popular with parents, as is evidenced by the unprecedented rate of take-up in schools. Nevertheless, the Government continue to take steps to ensure that the scheme provides for a realistic contribution from both the taxpayer and the parents and, by restricting the level of fees that can be applied by schools to assisted pupils, a continuation of the part played by individual schools as partners with the Government in this very successful scheme.

I commend the regulations to the House.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): These amending regulations provide us with an opportunity to look again at this running sore on the body educational. There is no doubt that this scheme remains wrong in principle. It is quite simply a subsidy to the private sector, as is recognised by many people.

This year, there are 21 private schools receiving more than £750,000 each, and seven receiving more than £1 million each. There are 63 schools with more than 20 per cent. of their pupils on the assisted places scheme: 13 have 30 per cent. of their pupils on the scheme, and in two schools the proportion is more than 40 per cent. The position was made quite clear as long ago as 1986, when the headmaster of King Edward's school, 200 of whose pupil—if my memory serves me well—are on the scheme, said:

"It will not, therefore, surprise the reader if I defend the assisted places scheme. I believe that it is a good scheme. But I must be honest: it is a good scheme partly because it helps independent schools . . . While a very small minority of schools on the scheme—the Winchesters and Sedburghs—may indeed have no need of state support, the majority will have benefited considerably."

So the headmaster of an independent school sees this as a specific subsidy to his school.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, contrary to what he has just said, this represents a saving to the state sector? The vast majority of children who take up the scheme would otherwise be educated in the state sector. The amount that the Government have to pay is smaller than the sum that would be involved if those children were being educated in state schools.

Mr. Griffiths: That is not true. Some years ago, even the Independent Schools Information Service drew attention to the fact that a place in an independent school cost over £200 more than one in a state school. Later information put the figure at £400. It is indeed a costly scheme, and a subsidy to the private sector. It is also a blatant attempt to cream off very able children from the maintained sector.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): The hon. Gentleman mentioned King Edward's school. I presume that he means the one in Birmingham, which appeared on a list produced by one of his hon. Friends. The real point about schools such as King Edward's and Haberdashers' Aske's in my constituency is that they could fill the places with pupils whose parents were prepared to pay the fees. Certainly, Haberdashers' Aske's, King Edward's in Birmingham and, I suspect, many others on the scheme could fill the places many times over in that way but, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, they seek to open doors of opportunity for children whose parents are not able to afford the fees. That is what the scheme is doing, and the hon. Gentleman has no evidence to the contrary.

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman has made a speech, responding to a point that I have not even made. My argument is that the assisted places cost the Government more money than places in maintained secondary schools and that it would be much better if the money were used to improve the facilities and increase the number of teachers in the state schools.

As I was saying before the hon. Gentleman's speech, the scheme is a blatant attempt to cream off very able children from the maintained sector. If the Government were truly concerned about the quality of education in the maintained sector, they would be doing everything possible to ensure that the policies were in place and the facilities and teachers available to make certain that all children could be educated to the best of their ability.

What is even worse, given the fact that there is a subsidy and an attempt to cream off the best pupils from the maintained schools, there is absolutely no evidence that the extra cost means better results. Her Majesty's inspectorate and the Audit Commission have examined the issues exhaustively and concluded that there is absolutely no evidence that pupils who go to such schools benefit in any way. In fact, when the scheme was introduced, John Rae, then headmaster of Westminster school, said:

"The Scheme was based on a false premise: that an independent school was automatically a better place to educate a bright child."

Plainly, it is not, and the scheme is a waste of money.

The scheme encourages educational snobbery which undermines maintained schools. It provides opportunities for a few at the expense of the many.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): It is a great pity that the hon. Gentleman knocks the education of poor children, because that is what he is doing. Is he aware that the assisted places scheme costs £95 million a year out of an education budget of £17 billion? If he thinks that children do not profit from the scheme he need only talk to poor parents in my constituency who will tell him the truth. Why should they not have the same opportunity as others?

Mr. Griffiths: It was the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) who said that the scheme covered about 1 per cent. of all pupils. If the hon. Gentleman is really concerned about the education of poor children, why does he not ensure that the facility is available to every child? The scheme is highly selective. It would be far better if the Government gave every state school an extra £400 per pupil. We would then see what more could be achieved by that simple expedient, without encouraging such a highly divisive system.

The idea of helping poor children has failed on the Government's own objectives. In the Daily Mail on 25 June 1981, the right hon. Member for Brent, North said that he wanted the scheme to cater for able children from the poorest homes. Lord Joseph, then Secretary of State for Education and Science, said that he saw the scheme as a way of producing a greater social mix in independent schools. With the scheme helping only 1 per cent. of pupils, that plainly is not happening.

Although it is true that two thirds of pupils on the scheme come from families with below average incomes, a third come from families with above average incomes. If the Government were intent on helping the poorest families, they would divert all the help to those on below average incomes. What gives the game away is that well over half the parents of even those on low incomes went to independent or selective schools. So we have a self-generating scheme: those who know about it and are in a position to take advantage of it do so.

If the schools are so good, why do the Government not provide the extra money for all children? The plain fact is that they do not. Why do they not spend the money to help able pupils in maintained schools? The money would be put to much better use there. Why do they not use the money to provide more nursery school places? There is a well-established and well-researched link between the provision of good nursery education and better performance in schools. That would be a far more effective use of public moneys.

What is worse is that we are now seeing that the scheme is badly managed. In 1992 the spending has to be capped to a maximum increase of 12 per cent. In the maintained sector, an increase of only 7 per cent. was allowed. In 1990-91 there was a £3 million overspend, even though 17 per cent. of the places remained unfilled. In 1991-92 the scheme was almost £11 million over budget. This year it is estimated that there will be a £78 million outturn in the Department's expenditure plans. Next year the plan is to spend £95 million. However, on table 10 on page 16 of the same document, the Government say that there will be only 286 extra places next year, but they are spending £17 million more. If that is computed on a per capita basis, it is nearly £60,000 extra per place. I invite the Minister to check the figures and explain to me how I have misread the tables.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is likely to be a steep increase in demand for places from Kent, where the Liberals, who have just taken control with the assistance of the Labour party, have decided to cut, in maintained schools, the teaching of history, geography and English in favour of what they call "enhanced centres of experience"?

Mr. Griffiths: I am afraid that, on the Department's figures, there will be only 286 more places next year, so if the hon. Gentleman is right there will be a lot of disappointed parents in Kent.

The whole scheme shows the Government's belief that they have failed. They are in effect admitting that they do not think that the maintained sector offers a good enough education for able children, so they want them to go to the independent sector. Funnily enough, it was the hon.

[Mr. Griffiths]

Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) who described the assisted places scheme in February last year as a lifebelt for many a talented child. He added:

"Although I am a Conservative I do have reservations about subsidising the independent sector for all time."

The point is that the money would be much better spent in the maintained sector.

Surplus places also come into the equation. Thirty-four of these schools have more than 200 pupils on the assisted places scheme, so children are being taken away from the maintained schools in some boroughs and counties. It would be far better if the Government devoted the resulting extra resources to the maintained sector. The Government want to uprate the scheme so as to keep going their preferential treatment of a small minority of parents. That is deplorable. It shows up the ideological divide between us: the Government are intent on giving privileges to the very few while we believe that the money should be spent on extending opportunities for excellence in education to everybody.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) for recalling some words that I uttered some time last year. Since the speech that he has just made was rather similar to speeches he has made before on these occasions, he will forgive me if I deliver a speech similar to the one I made last time.

Although I continue to approve of the assisted places scheme, we ought to keep an open mind and enter, perhaps, into a more sophisticated debate than is possible when phrases such as "running sore", "creaming off" and the like are used.

A figure that has struck me is to be found in a press release from the Department for Education dated 5 July. While we are spending £76 million on this wholly worthwhile scheme, we have put £50 million into our "successful technology schools initiative", of which I also approve.

The Minister says that the assisted places scheme provides parental choice, raises standards and extends opportunities. That is all true, but I would like a system that would not involve our subsidising the private schools. I would like a system like that in certain continental countries, where these things can be achieved in the places where the children actually live. That is my point about the Government's welcome technology schools initiative.

Ideally, we would not face the stark choice between comprehensivisation—86 per cent. of secondary schools are comprehensive—and the lifebelt of the assisted places scheme. That is a stark and artificial situation, and we have got ourselves into it through our mistaken educational philosophies over several decades, not including the last one.

We have to do what Wandsworth has done and fight our way out of that. We have to have "parental choice", "raising standards", "extending opportunities" in the locality, and that can be done only by providing a variety of different schools in one locality, with selection not by ability—let us put to one side the old-fashioned class debate—but by the method that they have in more sophisticated continental countries, by what the child shows that he has aptitude for.

There must be movement between schools—the system should not be set rock hard, because some children develop later than others. If the Government can find the money to expand not so much the assisted places scheme as the technology schools initiative, it is possible to foresee a time when, in many deprived, semi-deprived or just normal areas, there is a genuine choice for children, of all backgrounds, with different aptitudes. Children from deprived backgrounds may have an aptitude for academic, intellectual work. Some may have an aptitude for engineering. As we all know, that does not mean 19th-century engineering—it is a demanding business.

We can envisage different schools for those different children. There might also be a comprehensive school, and why not? There should be no dogmatism, no bar on having different types of school. If one is not a dogmatist, one cannot object in principle to having a comprehensive school. Why cannot there be three types of school?

I could go on for some time, but I would bore everyone if I did. However, I want to add one point about private schools. They have always worried me—not in themselves, because, despite what the hon. Member for Bridgend said, their methods are far more educationally sound than those in many of the state schools—but because I dislike the social polarisation involved in the existence of private schools, which one sees in no other country to the same degree. It is a profoundly disturbing phenomenon. It continues, as the hon. Gentleman intimated, from generation to generation, which makes it even more profoundly disturbing.

One of the little thoughts that I should like to leave in the mind of my hon. Friend the Minister——

Mr. Rowe: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Walden: May I just finish this little thought before it slips my mind?

I am serious about the thought of buying out some private schools. We should never forget that there are some private schools that used to be direct grant schools —the equivalent of what we now call grant-maintained schools. They were forced by the activities of Labour Members or their predecessors into the private sector and are now closed to ordinary children.

I would like to see those schools, with all their traditions of excellence, come back into the state sector and be open to every child on a competitive basis, to go there without paying fees. Such a scheme would be the ultimate extension of the assisted places scheme, because everyone would have the chance to go to such schools.

Eton may not do that, but I have visited some former direct grant schools that would not be unattracted by the notion of selecting, free, from the brightest children, rather than having to take them from certain privileged and moneyed social classes, with a sprinkling of scholarships, as they do at present.

Mr. Rowe: Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the pressures for the continuation of private schools is the extraordinary difficulty which many maintained schools appear to have in retaining single sex education? Many parents want single sex education, and, in the case of girls, there is clear evidence that single sex education yields better results.

Mr. Walden: I hear what my hon. Friend says. I do not want to consider sex, although I know that that is a problem. One of the difficulties in our way of thinking in this country—I mean no offence to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe)—is the tendency to go off at a tangent.

What I am trying to address, perhaps unsuccessfully, as it is very late at night, is a very central issue. I want diversification for everyone on the ground, locally, rather than the stark and artificial choice between being forced, nine times out of 10, to go to a comprehensive school, and being bailed out by the state in a wholly artificial and very expensive way to the tune of £76 million to give a child a chance in an almost certainly better and more demanding educational environment.

I believe that the whole process is artificial, and therefore fundamentally suspect. However, for the moment I can think of nothing better. Let us get on with the technology schools initiative. Where the money is to come from is a separate debate, although I have my ideas about that as well.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): It is an absolute disgrace that, at a time when most state schools are struggling to find enough resources to pay for teachers, equipment, books and for essential repairs and when there is a lack of nursery places, the Government continue to fund private education from public funds. They not only continue to subsidise private schools: they intend to increase that subsidy tonight.

When the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) was an Education Minister, he said that the scheme was intended for able children from the poorest homes. Why he thought able children from the poorest homes would want to go to public schools beats me—[HON. MEMBERS: "They do."] No, they do not. If Conservative Members listen to me, they will see that they do not.

Even if the right hon. Member for Brent, North was very sincere—I do not dispute that he was—he was wrong. The scheme is exploited by the middle class. Evidence and statistics clearly show that 60 per cent. of the children who benefit from the scheme have parents who are lawyers, civil servants, clergymen, teachers or other white collar workers. Only 10 per cent. of assisted places pupils come from working class parents and have fathers who are manual workers.

That is typical of the Government, and it epitomises their political philosophy. They subsidise the better-off at the expense of the less well-off. If parents want to send their children to public schools, that is their choice, but they should not do so at the expense of the vast majority of pupils in the state sector.

Let me give examples of the subsidies offered to parents wishing to send their children to Durham school, the well-known public school in my constituency. The annual fees for Durham school in 1991-92 were £5,638. A family earning £25,000 a year with one child on the assisted places scheme attending that school would have received a subsidy of £1,531. If the family had two children attending the school, it would have received a subsidy of £5,114 from the taxpayer. If a family earning £19,000 a year sent one child to the school, it would have received a subsidy of £3,500 a year. Should it have sent two children to that school, it would have received a subsidy of £8,000 a year from the public purse.

That is reprehensible. The state should not pay private schools large subsidies at a time when the state sector is strapped for resources. It should not pay subsidies to the private sector at any time, regardless of whether resources are scarce or not. The assisted places scheme is a deliberate attempt to subsidise the private sector and keep it viable.

Whether the scheme is being used by the middle class, the working class or, for that matter, any other class is irrelevant. The fact that that scheme is available in the first place is appalling. Money is being hived off from the state sector into private education at the expense of the state sector. That is what the scheme is all about.

It is a scandal that, this year, £95 million will be spent on the scheme. In 1995-96, that expenditure will increase to £106 million. In comparison, this year, the Government intend to spend just £131 million on the school building grant to the maintained sector, and plan to spend just £107 million on that grant in 1995-96. The Government plan to spend as much money on the private sector as they plan to spend on that building grant. That must be wrong and immoral.

I would not care, but the scheme does not even offer value for money. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) said, it costs £400 a year more to educate a child in a private school than in the state sector. That difference is based on the figures provided by the Independent Schools Information Service, ISIS, which can hardly be regarded as an independent-minded organisation by any stretch of the imagination.

There is no evidence that children on the scheme do better in private schools than they would have done had they been educated in state schools. The evidence suggests the contrary. In 1991, the Audit Commission produced a report, "Two Bs or not", on the A-level performances in schools and colleges. It suggested that no single type of institution appeared consistently more effective than any other in terms of obtaining A-level results. It found, significantly, that private schools did marginally less well than the sixth forms and tertiary colleges of the state sector. It reported that pupils got better results in the state sector.

As the scheme produces no better results from the pupils who participate in it, and given that the scheme was not initially intended to assist pupils of a certain background, who account for the majority of its participants, one can only conclude that it is a device used by the Government to meet the increase in the private school fees. It is a subsidy to the private sector from the state purse.

I will conclude by quoting, once again, the right hon. Member for Brent, North.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Hear, hear.

Mr. Steinberg: The hon. Gentleman should listen carefully to what that right hon. Gentleman said. He believed that the scheme had turned out to be a rescue for "distressed gentlefolk". He also suggested that it had taken the Tory party down a "side alley". I agree.

The Government have gone down a convenient side alley, because, through the scheme, they can subsidise private education. I suspect that that was always the intention.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Unlike some hon. Members, I do not wish to flex ideological muscles against the independent sector. Some independent schools can make a valuable contribution to education.

The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) said that he was not ashamed to refer to the speech that he made last year, and I feel exactly the same way. Last year, I said that I did not want to attack independent schools, and that some of them could contribute to education. In responding to the debate, the Under-Secretary of State accused me of trying to have it both ways, so my argument may not have been clear enough.

Considerable evidence proves that mutual benefit accrues from the independent and state sectors working together in certain areas. For instance, we are well aware that most trade unions and many professional education associations have joint membership from both sectors. The National Association for the Teaching of English, the Association for Science Education and the Secondary Heads Association are just a few examples of organisations that are working to improve the quality of education for the nation's children. There are many examples of joint in-service activity and shared use of premises, and even some examples of joint teaching.

So co-operation to mutual advantage is possible, and Liberal Democrats are happy and willing to support it. However, we are not prepared to support measures that foster elitism in our society and prop up ailing independent schools to the disadvantage of pupils in the state sector. The assisted places scheme comes dangerously close on both counts.

Equally worrying is the fact that the assisted places scheme is not only badly managed but missing its target. Only 24 hours ago, the Government put VAT on domestic fuel to help pay off their £50 billion public sector debt, but today they do not seem concerned about wasting money on a scheme with little demonstrable benefit to taxpayers. Until recently, it was not even fully taken up. Furthermore, even the Minister will accept that the scheme was overspent by some £10 million.

Given that such straitened financial resources are available in state sector schools, how can we justify spending £8,595 of state money on sending pupils to Charterhouse school, for example? That money could have been far better directed towards hard-pressed state schools. It cannot be right that the assisted places scheme is being used to prop up some independent schools suffering from falling rolls due to the recession.

Notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) said in his lengthy intervention, the figures show that questions must be asked. Can it be right that a high percentage of pupils at a number of independent schools come through the assisted places scheme? For example, 39·9 per cent. of Batley grammar school's pupils, 37·3 per cent. of Denstone college's pupils, 38·5 per cent. of Hereford Cathedral school's pupils, 44·8 per cent. of St. Edward's college's pupils, and nearly 50 per cent. of Wisbech grammar school's pupils come through the scheme.

As the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) said, in a single year some seven schools received more than £1 million and more than 50 schools received some £500,000 of taxpayers' money through the assisted places scheme. Perhaps even worse, that money is being spent with no apparent reference to standards, quality or value.

We all know that our state schools are required to teach the national curriculum—I suspect that many of them would prefer not to have to do so, given its nature. Those schools are required to be regularly inspected by Ofsted and are expected to conform to the requirements of standard assessment tests for their children. None of those requirements applies to the independent sector schools, to which state money is given to support the pupils.

The Under-Secretary of State used the argument that we should not invest money into schools that do not conform to those three criteria—the national curriculum, Ofsted inspections and SATs—during the passage of the Education Bill. At that time he used that argument to show why money should not be given to Steiner schools. We are presented with the strange anomaly whereby the Under-Secretary today supports state money being put into independent schools that do not conform to those requirements.

In a similar debate last year I challenged the Under-Secretary to provide evidence to the House of value for money for the scheme and added value. On both counts, he was silent, except to tell us that the independent schools produced good examination results. Even he was honest enough to go on to say that one would expect that, given the selection procedures that are adopted by those schools.

Last year, I referred to views expressed by the Library of the House, whose officials had studied all the various research conducted into the success of the assisted places scheme in meeting its intended target of providing assisted places to bright children from less well-off backgrounds. At that time, the Library concluded:

> "Much of the research on the operation of the scheme has suggested that it has failed in its prime aim of giving good education to children from relatively poor backgrounds and is mainly subsidising middle class parents."

That view was not challenged last year by the Minister. I hope that he will be prepared to do so now—or does he accept the view expressed by the Library?

We cannot support a scheme that is badly managed and misses its intended target. Therefore, we will vote against the provision tonight. In consultation with those in both sectors, the Liberal Democrats will continue to explore alternative approaches to co-operation between the sectors to mutual benefit.

11.3 pm

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock and Burntwood): I welcome any scheme that seeks to nourish academically able children from disadvantaged backgrounds. However, the problem with the assisted places scheme is that it is such an impoverished and ideologically driven way of thinking about the subject that it fails to achieve that objective. In many respects, it is the original opt-out approach—it provides a subsidy to leave the system, rather than taking serious action to improve the system for the target group identified.

As we have heard from both sides of the House, the scheme fails even on its own terms. It is an expensive failure. We know that it currently costs nearly £76 million, and the cost is soon to rise again. It is overspent. It has take-up problems. Last year there were 5,671 vacant assisted places. Contrary to the claims that used to be made, the scheme now costs more per pupil than the maintained system. Various figures have been offered but the most recent ones given in parliamentary answers show that each assisted place now costs £3,100, compared with £2,195 in the maintained secondary sector. Therefore, one of the traditional claims for this scheme does not apply by a mile.

We were told that the scheme is failing to meet its claimed target. Much of the money is a subsidy to the lower middle class. Speaking as a member of the lower middle class, I am not entirely against that, although I cannot understand why my taxes should be used for that purpose. In 1989, a study funded by the Economic and Social Research Council reported that:

> "The scheme seems to have been yet another example of an educational reform targeted towards the working class but mainly benefiting children from middle-class backgrounds . . . Neither, in terms of the objectives that were originally defined for it or our own findings to date does there seem to be much scope or justification for extending it in its present form."

[Dr. Tony Wright]

If hon. Members are unhappy with that finding, they should look at the Independent Schools Information Service survey that was commissioned from MORI last year. That survey found that 41 per cent. of children taking up assisted places came from lower middle-class families with only 16 per cent. coming from families of semi-skilled or unskilled workers.

The right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) has been cited with acclamation many times in this debate. His most profound point about the scheme is that, even in its own terms, it is failing because there is no evidence that the children taking up places are from not only the poorest families but the poorest schools. For the scheme to make any sort of sense, it would take the most able children from the most failing schools. It would then be doing something significant. As the right hon. Gentleman argued—this is clearly true—the scheme is probably taking children with the most motivated parents, who ensure that they secure the best schools in the neighbourhood for their children. Therefore, the scheme is failing on a fundamental ground.

The scheme is transferring large sums of public money from the Exchequer to private schools. I shall not explore that matter, as other hon. Members have done so. Here we have a scheme with expanding and—in some senses—uncontrollable costs. It has problems with take-up and is substantially missing its intended targets.

What should a sensible Government do when faced with such a scheme? The Government are desperate to cut public spending—they are imposing VAT on domestic fuel and targeting the social security budget. Yet in those circumstances, and faced with a scheme with those characteristics, they spend more on it. Because they are spending more on this scheme, they are necessarily spending less on everything else. They are certainly spending less on other things in the education system of which we have no trouble assembling a list.

In conclusion, we should let this ill-conceived scheme wither on the vine. Anyone who examined the scheme would say that that is the most sensible thing to do. Indeed, all those who have examined the scheme sensibly say that that is the most sensible thing to do.

We should do something else—we should rescue the kernel of an idea that has got lost as the scheme has developed. We should do all that we can to nourish the academically able, especially those from academically and financially disadvantaged backgrounds. That is a educational task. I have some sympathy with what the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) said. In other words, there is a completely different educational agenda from that which the scheme represents.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am listening to the hon. Gentleman with great interest and finding some common ground with him. He said that he would like to do more for the academic child from a deprived or difficult background. He has not explained how he would do that, an omission that I hope he will remedy before he concludes. Having many years ago been governor of the Queen Elizabeth grammar school in Atherstone in north Warwickshire, I assure him that that wonderful school, before it was forced to go comprehensive, did precisely what he is now putting to the House.

Dr. Wright: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. An obvious example is large classes. We have recently confirmed evidence that there is a direct correlation between reduced class sizes and increased academic performance. The figures show that under the Conservatives class sizes have increased substantially. If the Government's objective were increased academic achievement, they would have followed the strategy of reducing class sizes.

The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) gave an interesting example, but I prefer to close with an example of my own, which is about the numbers entering university. The figures are shocking, and I simply relay them to the House. In England and Wales, 30 per cent. of university entrants come from private fee-paying schools, despite the fact that only 7·5 per cent. of school-leavers come from such schools.

If the Government were serious about wishing to make higher education available to all who might benefit from it, especially those from deprived and disadvantaged backgrounds, they would regard that figure as shocking and would devote greater energy to opening up the higher education system to children from such backgrounds.

Sadly, the Government have not done that, but are instead pursuing schemes such as the one before the House tonight. That is why we say that their proposal is completely irrelevant to what is required. By transferring public money in the way they propose, they are simply sustaining, propping up and further developing a system of schooling which, as the hon. Member for Buckingham said, has been one of the most damaging and divisive things to have happened to this country.

Mr. Forth: Tempted though I am, I shall not indulge in a debate on the principle of the scheme because I should be called to order. As I said at the outset, this is a narrow debate on the regulations.

I had some difficulty understanding the arithmetic of the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths). My arithmetic suggests that if he took the total amount spent on this excellent scheme and spread it among all the pupils in the maintained sector, he might reach the total of about £13 per pupil. I am not sure what dramatic difference that would make to the quality and standard of education. I leave him to draw his own conclusion.

About 69 per cent. of pupils on the assisted places scheme come from the maintained schools sector, well exceeding the 60-40 rule that we set out for the scheme. That gives the lie to the facts that were claimed by Opposition Members, not least the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg), who, in a rather pathetic parade of class-ridden prejudice of a kind that we have come to expect from him, completely ignored the facts.

For example, the hon. Gentleman ignored the fact that 56 per cent. of parents whose children go on the assisted places scheme earned less than £12,000 last year, and that 38 per cent.—about two out of every five—earn less than £9,000 per annum. How they represent the elite he claimed were taking advantage of the scheme is beyond me. I should have thought that such people might even have qualified for his soubriquet of the working class or manual working people of whom he approves. I suggest that he looks again at the statistics to see whether his class profile might be suggested to the House in a different form.

The hon. Gentleman has suggested that the scheme may not deliver quality. The achievements of assisted pupils in terms of GCSEs, A-levels and AS-levels are well above the national pass-grade result, and fully comparable with the achievements of the independent sector as a whole. All the evidence suggests that the achievements of pupils on the scheme compares very well with those of others—which contradicts what some Opposition Members have suggested.

Mr. Don Foster: Surely the Minister accepts that children selected according to ability are expected to do well in examinations. What he is telling us is no surprise; it is a repeat of what he said last year. Will he now tell us the evidence of added value from the scheme?

Mr. Forth: We are all repeating what we said last year. What mystifies me is why we have these debates annually, but if Opposition Members persist in coming to the House at this late hour and making the same speeches every year, I do not see why I should not do the same.

The fact is that all the evidence suggests that pupils whose parents put them forward for this excellent scheme fully vindicate not only the scheme and their parents' choice of education, but the schools that then enable them to achieve excellent results—results fully comparable with the results achieved by pupils in similar schools, and way beyond those of pupils generally and those educated in the maintained sector.

As for the accusations of elitism, I believe that they have been effectively disproved—not only by the income background that I described in response to the points made by the hon. Member for City of Durham, but by my points about the excellent level of achievement.

The brief but excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) was very much in tune with the thrust of the policies of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, starting with the White Paper "Choice and Diversity", which was produced last year. Of course we believe that the technology schools are an exciting new development in education; I suggest that the emphasis on specialisation—that is probably the word that best sums up what my hon. Friend was talking about: drawing out young people's aptitudes, and providing them with diversity and choice in terms of different schools in their localities—must represent the way ahead. I trust that the Government are trying to encourage that approach, through our different policies in the Department and through some of the measures in the Education Bill, which will return to the House next week.

I believe that these narrow regulations build on a scheme that has been in place for some time.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I asked for clarification earlier on a point that strikes me as rather important. According to page 2 of the Department's report of its expenditure plans, the estimated outturn for the scheme in 1992-93 is £78 million. The 1993-94 plans involve expenditure of £95 million—an extra £17 million.

On page 16—where the Government show the figures for the number of places available—it is made clear that, for that extra £17 million, only 286 places will be available. That is equivalent to nearly £60,000 per place. What is the reason for the big increase in spending and the small increase in numbers?

Mr. Forth: I will give the hon. Gentleman an off-the-cuff reply and write to him in more detail subsequently.

I believe that the missing link is take-up. I must confess that, every year, we have been embarrassed by the fact that the scheme exceeds all our expectations. Year upon year, more people than even we anticipated take up their places in the scheme, and we then find that we have to provide yet more money, which we gladly do every year. But it is an annual embarrassment to which I am very happy to confess. That is probably the reason for the gap that the hon. Gentleman is seeking to understand.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I certainly would appreciate a full answer, because I am not entirely convinced by that. In table 10, giving the number of places available, it is pointed out that at the moment the new places being made available are almost all being taken up. Last year, 97·6 per cent. were taken up. So there is not much room for a greater take-up. I appreciate that higher up there are some big gaps, but surely that cannot be the answer.

Mr. Forth: I believe that this is the answer. What certainly is not the case is that we are providing places at £60,000 each. Even some of the more exotic schools mentioned by hon. Gentlemen do not quite reach that fee level. It is most unlikely, to say the least, that the Department is funding places to the tune of £60,000 per place.

I will write to the hon. Gentleman and give him a very full explanation of this, because it seems that we are unable at this stage to agree.

I hope that I have persuaded the House——

Mr. Steinberg: The Minister accused me of being class-prejudiced, and perhaps I am. When I look at the other side of the House, that makes me class-prejudiced. The statistics that I gave him had not been produced by me; they were produced by the ISIS MORI poll, which said that 60 per cent. of the children came from middle-class homes, including Lloyd's, the civil service, and so on. So is the Isis MORI poll class-prejudiced as well?

Mr. Forth: I cannot imagine why the hon. Gentleman should disapprove of teachers and civil servants; that is beyond me and is for him to explain on some other occasion. From the facts that I gave—these are the more relevant ones, I believe—over half the parents of children in assisted places scheme places have incomes of less than £12,000 per annum.

I will not follow the hon. Gentleman's obsession with what their occupations are. I am much more interested in the fact that the scheme is doing what it was set up to do—that is, helping those on low incomes to get their children into good schools.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): I would like to know the source of the Minister's information, quite simply.

Mr. Forth: The source of my information is the underpaid and overworked civil servants in my Department.

I hope that in this short debate I have been able to persuade the House that we should approve these excellent regulations, which update this excellent scheme, from which so many of our children benefit.

Resolved,

That the draft Education (Assisted Places) (Amendment) Regulations 1993, which were laid before this House on 29th June, be approved.

Company Accounts

11.34 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Neil Hamilton): I beg to move,

That the draft Partnerships and Unlimited Companies (Accounts) Regulations 1993, which were laid before this House on 21st June, be approved.

Accounting requirements for companies in the European Community have been harmonised, principally through the fourth and seventh company law directives, but there was concern that companies in some member states were avoiding the disclosure requirements of those directives by conducting business through the equivalent of partnerships. The Council therefore adopted the partnerships directive to bring partnerships between limited companies and unlimited companies owned by limited ones within the scope of the accounting directives, requiring them to produce and publish accounts.

In Great Britain the directive and thus these regulations apply to partnerships, limited partnerships and unlimited companies where all the members with unlimited liability are themselves limited companies. For a limited partnership it is the nature of the general partner or partners only—the ones with unlimited liability—that matters.

To be within the scope of the regulations the general partner or partners must be limited companies. The regulations will not apply to most partnerships in Great Britain, such as those between accountants, solicitors and small traders, where one or more of the partners is a natural person, not a company. Partnerships between limited companies, or where the general partners are limited companies, are not thought to be particularly common in Great Britain. In fact, they amount to only about 3,500 out of 600,000.

We consulted business and others on the line to be taken in the negotiation of the directive. The conclusion of that consultation was that partnerships between companies, or where the general partner is a company, were not being used as a vehicle to avoid disclosure, the problem with which the directive seeks to deal. Our negotiators strove, therefore, to achieve sufficient options in the directive to ensure that existing practice in Great Britain could continue to be followed as far as possible.

It is important for those dealing with a partnership or unlimited company to know that its members or general partners are limited companies. The liability of members or general partners is unlimited, but, if they are limited companies and the debts of the partnership force them into liquidation, the creditors of the partnership would become unsecured creditors of the company up to the limits of the capital of the company. It is equally important for those dealing with and investing in a company to know that it has exposure to unlimited liability through partnerships and unlimited companies.

The regulations provide three ways in which accounting information about the partnership can be handled, depending on the circumstances. There are also provisions that apply to all companies and partnerships which are within the scope of the regulations, no matter which accounting treatment is used. The members of a partnership must give inquirers the name of at least one company member that has included the partnership in its accounts, or the names of all the company members that are publishing its accounts. Companies which are involved in partnerships or unlimited companies within the scope of these regulations must reveal their names and addresses and legal forms. The companies must also state in their accounts where the accounting information about the partnership is to be found.

The directive, when implemented in all member states, will require all companies incorporated in the Community to give such information about the partnerships and unlimited companies within its scope of which they are members. That will help companies in Britain to find out more about the companies that they are dealing with in other member states.

If the partnership is included in consolidated accounts by at least one of its partners, there will be no further requirement to draw up and publish accounts. The member companies must state in their accounts whether they have consolidated the partnership or whether another company has done so. In the latter case, the name of the other company must be given in the accounts.

Our aim has been to provide information for those dealing with the partnership and the company, while keeping the burdens to a minimum. My Department consulted last year on the method of implementation, and the approach that we have taken in these regulations was welcomed by the organisations that responded. We have estimated that the compliance costs will be low. A compliance cost assessment has been prepared and is available.

To give companies and partnerships the maximum time to adapt to the requirements, the directive permits member states not to apply its provisions to financial years commencing before 1 January 1995. The regulations would take advantage of this.

As I have explained, throughout the process of negotiation of the directive, and the consultation and drafting of these regulations, there has been no evidence that the problem with which the directive seeks to deal —the lack of disclosure of accounting information by partnerships between companies—is a problem in Britain. We therefore sought, and were successful in negotiating, options that would permit us to leave existing provisions largely intact. The regulations implement the directive in a most light-handed way.

I commend the regulations to the House.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am grateful to the Minister for taking us rapidly through the regulations. There is usually a 10-minute speech arranged for these occasions, but I am aware of the quorum hovering in the Chamber at this hour. Therefore, I will not seek to delay the House unduly.

These regulations implement a Council directive dealing with annual accounts and consolidated accounts. They confirm again, if confirmation is necessary, that we are within the European framework, that we have been in a European framework for some 20 years now, and that we are developing that framework along lines of which even the noble Lady Thatcher would approve. We are creating harmonious conditions throughout the length and breadth of Europe so that company law and accountancy law are the same in all European countries.

Regulations such as these create a level playing field that companies will come to know and understand. The time may come when we will be debating a European company which is trans-national and which will incorporate the whole of our European company law. Indeed, such a law has been debated for the past 20 years, but it has yet to make its way on to the statute book. Perhaps with debates and regulations such as these we shall be able, little by little, to creep towards it.

The scope of the application of the regulations concerns partnerships, limited partnerships and unlimited companies, all of whose members, having unlimited liability, are limited companies. That may seem like gobbledegook to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but for the cogniscenti, it means that there is a difference in liability for partnerships and unlimited companies when compared to those that have limited their liability by incorporating themselves into limited liability companies.

There is a significant difference in the treatment of trading companies and partnerships not limited by liability and those which are. We shall debate that difference in greater detail and whether they should be subject to audit when we have the Minister's proposals for small businesses. It will be the Opposition's submission at that time that limited liability companies that do not wish to submit themselves to an audit should disincorporate themselves—take unlimited liability—with all its attendant risks, while leaving limited liability companies properly audited in the interests of full disclosure and in the interests of work force, bankers and outside parties, which may be shareholders. That is also for another debate, but it might be as well to put down a marker for the Minister's attention.

As I understand it—I am grateful to the Minister for explaining this to me—there are occasions, principally in Germany, where partnerships gather together from limited liability companies. Those dealing with such partnerships may do so on the basis that there is unlimited liability upon the partnership. As the Minister said, that is not often the case in our country, and it is not likely that such situations will arise, or, if they do, it will not be very often. Nevertheless, it is appropriate that there should be a common framework throughout the Community so that those dealing with such partnerships will know where they stand and will act accordingly.

As we read Sir Andrew Large's critique of our self-regulation organisations—acting within his Securities and Investment Board—it is being drummed into us that the principles of caveat emptor can never be removed from financial investment. There will always be an element of risk. Regulations such as these, bringing in their wake full disclosure, will provide the information for the investor to take into account when he takes his investment decisions and risks his money.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): The hon. Gentleman is an expert in French law and has practised at the French Bar. Can he tell us, with regard to partnerships, whether the same rules or uberrima fides—the utmost good faith—apply in other European countries as they do in Great Britain?

Mr. Bell: They certainly do. As I said earlier, one of the reasons for this directive is that it will cover the whole of Europe so that the principles and concepts to which the hon. Gentleman referred conform with what we are debating and what we have in our country.

The Minister said that compliance would not be costly. It would be nice to look on the measure as constituting a mini securities and exchange commission, with its imposition of criminal penalties for failure to comply with the regulations. But of course such penalties already exist within the framework of the Financial Services Act 1986 and the Companies Act 1989. Still, it is nice to see the extension of criminal penalties for failure to comply with financial regulations, which edges us further towards the sort of statutory regulation which no doubt we will debate on the Floor of the House and towards which, if I have read Sir Andrew Large's report aright, even the Government are edging.

I promised the Minister not to have too long a saunter around the paddock of regulation and self-regulation, independent or statutory, and I hope that I have not done so. One of the difficulties of opening debates such as this one is that I cannot respond to any speech that the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) may make later. If he does make one, I shall listen to it with great interest. If he does not, I remind him that the best speeches can be kept for another occasion.

I assure the serried ranks of Conservative Members who are waiting to go home that none of my hon. Friends is loitering in the Corridors waiting to cast a vote or to press the button that will ring the Division bell. I thank the Minister for his courtesy and patience in explaining these technical but important regulations to the House. The attendance may have been a bit thin, but I assure him that his comments—and mine, I hope—will read well in Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: With the leave of the House, I will not reply to the debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Partnerships and Unlimited Companies (Accounts) Regulations 1993, which were laid before this House on 21st June, be approved.

Charities (Collections)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

11.46 pm

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): We were treated to a remarkable degree of brevity in the last debate, and I too will take only a few minutes. My purpose is not to raise any major issue but to fire a warning shot across the Minister's bows.

We have a remarkable tradition of charitable giving, which no other country in the world can equal or surpass. Part of that tradition is that we give freely, but over the years more and more charities have asked for our support, so it is quite right that we should impose certain controls on them, particularly when it comes to door-to-door collections.

In 1939, the House to House Collections Act was passed. It was adequate then, but given the number of charities today it is no longer so. Since 1939 there has been an explosion, not only in the number of charities, but in the energy and time that they devote to fund raising and door-to-door and street collections. It is therefore crucial that good controls should be exercised by authorities close to the areas where the collecting is to be done.

At first sight—certainly to a newcomer to the subject like me—local control by the district council seems the answer. That brings me to the reason why I asked for this debate.

We are raising money for a local hospice. For an area like west, south and north Dorset to raise £3·4 million in just over two years is quite an achievement. We have a target of £5 million, and I hope and expect that, by the end of next year, we shall have raised that money and the hospice will be opened. We were all—particularly my wife—delighted when we were granted a licence for one week for the whole of west Dorset to raise funds for our local hospice.

An immediate operation was set in train, which involved the distribution of some 200 to 300 tins, with all the paraphernalia—badges and other things—that go along with such an operation to ensure that we would raise the maximum amount. Every town, village and hamlet in west Dorset was covered, and people were prepared to go out to raise the money. I am always an optimist, and I thought that we would raise about £20,000 to add to the £3·4 million. In fact, we raised just half that sum.

Why did we not get anywhere near that target, when everyone locally supports the hospice project and wants to see it open? Before we started the week allocated to us, people began to phone in and say that, although they would like to help, sadly, they did not think that they could, because other charities were to be collecting that week. As the week progressed, more and more people phoned in and asked what was going on. It was nonsense, they said. They thought that they had the total licence and nobody would be in competition, but moving down the street at the same time as they were trying to collect were at least four other charities—Barnardos, the Diabetic Association, Action Aid and the Alexandra Rose. All those four charities were actively collecting, on the basis that they had exemption from registering because they were large, national charities.

That is our problem, and we were saddened by what had happened to Joseph Weld house. On Monday morning, I received a letter from Mr. Wilson, who is the divisional superintendent of our local St. John Ambulance. He said:

"I would like to make a formal, written complaint with regard to the fund-raising collection which took place in Dorchester and District between 25th June and 3rd July, 1993.

As I am the Superintendent of the Dorchester Combined Division of St. John Ambulance, I feel partly responsible for the situation as members of the public, understandably, felt aggrieved at what appeared to be constant requests for money. Some of my members received a very poor, even hostile, reception when selling flags.

As you know, our organisation is entirely voluntary and we are allocated one week each year for our Flag Day and House to House collections. Normally this is well supported, but this year we fell some £300 below our anticipated total. I believe that this is almost entirely due to the Dr. Barnardo's collection being held during the same week.

My main point is: why should we suffer these losses when we rely on the funds raised at this time? We are required to register well in advance and try to avoid competing with other Charities. Other organisations, however, are not required to register and can therefore collect at any time.

I should be grateful if you would raise my concerns with the appropriate authorities."

That rather indignant letter joins the indignant protests of my wife as the organiser of our fund-raising activity during that week.

However, it is a fact—I am quite certain that the Minister will bear witness to this—that things are going to change. Therefore, as I said at the beginning, all I intend to do is fire a shot across my hon. Friend's bows and say that the present situation cannot be allowed to continue.

My aim tonight is to highlight the present unsatisfactory situation that puts smaller and particularly local charities at a disadvantage and to seek from my hon. Friend an absolute assurance not only that, under the Charities Act 1992, there will be a tightening up, but that all charities will be required to register with local authorities and that small, but local, charities, will have their absolutely fair share of time.

I am president of my local British Legion. It would be inconceivable to me that, during that week, we should not devote all our thoughts and attention to the poppy day appeal. However, it seems that at least 50 per cent. of the year should be devoted to local charities. Otherwise, the 50 or so charities that have exemption at present can run roughshod over our local activity, push us to the wall and make our fund-raising insignificant.

That should not be allowed to happen. All I seek tonight is an assurance from my hon. Friend that we will see a change by early 1994, that more control will be vested locally, and that the national charities will not be given the free rein that they have at the moment.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Peter Lloyd): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Sir J. Spicer) on securing this debate. The fact that we are here at this comparatively late hour attests to the importance that he rightly attaches to the issue.

Before I address the particular matter of his concern and what he called his warning shot, I should say that I am pleased that he drew my attention and that of the House to the excellent work of the Dorset respite and hospice trust in his constituency. I share the public's admiration for those who care so compassionately for the terminally ill and give vital emotional support to their friends and relatives. That work requires great sensitivity and devotion; I pay tribute to what they are doing and applaud their extremely impressive efforts, which my hon. Friend described, to raise new funds to extend their work further.

As my hon. Friend explained so clearly, the very business of fund raising has brought him to this debate tonight. He described how the hospice's dedicated fund raisers, not least his wife, had planned their house-to-house collection and notified that to the local authority, and were then unhappy to find that other large national charities were also making house-to-house collections that evening.

I can understand those people feeling that they were all treading on each other's toes, and that their hospice cannot but have raised less than it would have done if the collectors had had a clear run on their own. I can also understand why my hon. Friend feels that there should be effective rules to avoid such an overlap. However, as he said, there are a large number of charities in England and Wales. More than 160,000 charities are registered with the Charity Commission. A good number of them are very small, many are confined to one area and some are very large indeed.

Altogether, the income of all charities in England and Wales has been estimated at perhaps £18 billion a year. While public charitable collections are only one source of that income, the net effect is that there is considerable pressure and, indeed, competition for the public's generosity.

The first main point that I must make in reply to my hon. Friend is that no one charity could, in all reasonableness, expect to have a monopoly on charitable appeals at any one time, even briefly and locally, unless other charities were correspondingly to be prevented from fund raising.

Even if public charitable collections were to be given over—briefly and locally—to a single charity, others would be free to compete in the same area and at the same time through other means of fund raising, such as direct mail, newspaper appeals and telephone fund raising.

Considerable overlap is, I fear, inevitable, and something that we must accept. My hon. Friend suggested that house-to-house collections by the larger charities should be confined to one half of the year only, but that would restrict those that have currently secured eligibility for an exemption order, issued by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State.

The law currently regulates collections under the House to House Collections Act 1939 and, in relation to street collections, the Police, Factories, etc (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1916. Only the 1939 Act provides for large national house-to-house collections to be granted an exemption order, removing them from local control. No equivalent provision exists in the 1916 Act, so permission for street collections—the familiar member of the public with the collecting can in the town centre on a Saturday —must always be applied for from each local authority.

Larger charities granted exemption orders by my Department for house-to-house collections are asked to notify local authorities in whose area they intend to collect. From time to time, they are reminded of the need to do so. Conversely, West Dorset district council and other local authorities, as a matter of good practice, point out to local charities that exemption-order-holding charities may collect in the same area, and that those local charities cannot be guaranteed a monopoly. It may be constructive for those directly concerned to contact one another in order to co-ordinate their collections and minimise overlap.

I do not know what happened in the particular case to which my hon. Friend referred; certainly things did not appear to go as well as they might have done. I agree with him that it is anomalous that street and house-to-house collections for very similar purposes are controlled through separate primary legislation. That was remarked on by the efficiency scrutiny of the supervision of charities, chaired by Sir Philip Woodfield, in 1987. The proposal implemented through the Charities Act 1992 was to bring both types of collection together under more consistent legislation. In the 1992 Act, that type of joint activity is covered by the term "public charitable collection".

We are currently examining, as my hon. Friend accepted, how the new provisions can best be brought into force. We intend to complete that process by the end of next year. We must take into account many practical angles, such as the co-ordination of different collections between competing charities, including between permission to collect that is granted centrally under 1992 Act, from the Charity Commission, and that granted locally by district authorities.

I cannot promise my hon. Friend that any one type of charity or issuing authority will necessarily take precedence over another, but I agree that the issue should be thoroughly examined before a decision is made on what seems best. This debate represents a timely and constructive contribution to that examination and my hon. Friend's proposal, which, in effect, is for some form of rationing, is one of the possible new arrangements that we will consider.

Close consultation with various people and organisations that have first-hand knowledge is indispensable. Our intention to discuss new arrangements for public charitable collections with experienced practitioners follows similar initiatives that we have already taken in relation to the provisions of the 1992 Act dealing with charity accounts and the control of professional fund raising.

We are making good progress in implementing the new legislation, and this week we are issuing a consultation document on the control of professional fund raising. That has undoubtedly been strengthened with the benefit of practitioners' views.

My hon. Friend's suggestions and the particular experience of the Dorset respite and hospice trust will help to ensure that the forthcoming regulations under the appropriate provisions of the 1992 Act will be constructed wisely and effectively. I hope that they will do much to avoid the type of situation that my hon. Friend has rightly drawn to the attention of the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes past Twelve midnight.

HIGHLAND REGIONAL COUNCIL (WESTER BRIDGE) ORDER CONFIRMATION BILL

Mr. Secretary Lang presented a Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under section 7 of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936, relating to Highland Regional Council (Wester Bridge); and the same was read the First time; and ordered to be considered on Tuesday 20 July and to be printed. [Bill 237.]

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Baghdad (US Attack)

1. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with representatives of the United Kingdom's Arab allies about the United States' attack upon Baghdad; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): The policies of the Baghdad regime of course cause us great concern and therefore we have frequent and close consultations with our Arab friends and partners.

Mr. Galloway: I thank the Minister for that answer, although it did not answer my question. In their discussions, did his allies tell him that when the 1,000 lb of explosives landed on the house of the celebrated Iraqi artist Leila al-Attar, killing her, her husband, and a member of her staff, and cruelly maiming her children, they had any idea what would arise from the ashes of that disaster? What rises from the ashes of Al Mansour is the barbarism of extremism and fundamentalism, which is breathing down the necks of the allies with whom he has had regular discussions. When the Minister reads of the latest murderous assault that will come any day now, will he bear in mind the fact that as long as our Government and the western powers are ready to pulverise Iraq, but appease Israel, and are ready to starve and blockade innocent Iraqis, but allow Serbia to get off with genocide in Yugoslavia, our Government's policies will be contributing to the disaster that is on its way?

Mr. Hogg: The death of anyone not connected with the aggressive policies of Iraq is to be deeply regretted. However, it was quite plain that the Government of Iraq were behind the attempt to assassinate former President Bush. That was a clear attack on the security of the United States. We believe that, in invoking article 51 of the charter, the United States was entitled to take the action it did, which received broad support.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: In considering a response to Iraq's failure to comply with the appropriate Security Council resolution, will the Government be in touch with the political opponents of Saddam Hussein outside Iraq and the Arab countries threatened by Iraq, and will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that any action taken is proportionate, involves the minimum loss of life and advances the long-term strategic aims of the United Nations?

Mr. Hogg: We will indeed ensure that any action that may have to be taken—I hasten to say that I hope that no action will have to be taken—is proportionate, causes the minimum casualties and is firmly based on international law. We are in continuing discussions with our Arab friends, partners and others about that issue and related matters.

Mr. Dalyell: For the reasons that I gave the Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office, Sir Michael Burton, in the interview that was arranged for me by the Foreign Secretary, do Ministers accept that, whether they like it or not, sanctions and bombing strengthen the regime of Saddam Hussein in a way that nothing else could?

Mr. Hogg: I do not accept that point, but I accept that it is extraordinarily difficult by a policy either of sanctions or of bombing to displace Saddam Hussein. It is essential for all of us to ensure full compliance by Iraq with the mandatory elements of the Security Council resolutions, especially those that relate to the eradication of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction. We must hold to the sanctions regime if we are to achieve that.

Lady Olga Maitland: What representations has my right hon. and learned Friend had from our Arab allies regarding the missing 627 Kuwaiti prisoners of war—male and female civilians—who were taken from their homes three years ago? To this date, Iraq has failed to comply with United Nations resolutions seeking their release. Will my right hon. and learned Friend make the greatest endeavours to achieve justice in that important humanitarian matter?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is right. The Government of Kuwait raise the question with us on every possible occasion and we raise it with the Iraqis in New York and at the sanctions review meetings. It is one of the very important respects in which Iraq is in breach of the mandatory parts of the Security Council resolutions and it makes the relaxation of the sanctions regime impossible at the moment.

Mrs. Mahon: How does the Minister expect to secure the release of the three Britons being held in Iraq when his Government condone the bombing? The family of Michael Wainwright think that every time the British Government support such actions, they put the lives of those men in danger.

Mr. Hogg: It is important to separate the two issues. We are, of course, very concerned about the position of Mr. Ride, Mr. Wainwright and Mr. Dunn and we take every opportunity to impress on the Iraqis the fact that we regard the sentences imposed on them as outrageous. As the hon. Lady knows, our representatives saw the three men a few days ago. The Russians have been extremely helpful in facilitating visits to the three men. We will do all that we can to secure their release, but we will not pay any kind of blackmail and we insist on our right to support, for example, the Americans when they exercise their right of self-defence under the charter of the United Nations.

Mr. Brazier: My right hon. and learned Friend has taken a tough and robust stand in forcing the Iraqi regime to conform to the United Nations requirements on weapons of mass destruction. Does he agree that this is a matter in which the vital interests of this country and of every other country in the west and in the civilised world are fundamentally involved? If the west backs off and the United Nations requirements on weapons of mass destruction are not enforced, the consequences are too horrible to consider.

Mr. Hogg: I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend has said. I had the pleasure of seeing Ambassador Ekeus a few days ago and he made two important points. First, he believes that there has been a substantial eradication of weapons of mass destruction by Iraq, but that it has not been completed. Secondly, he believes that provided that we hold to a tough verification and monitoring regime in future, we can prevent the Government of Iraq from reassembling weapons of mass destruction. He goes on to say—and I agree—that if we fail to hold to a tough policy of monitoring and verification, the chances are that the Iraqi Government will do just that.

Dr. John Cunningham: Although we of course support the determination to enforce the resolutions of the UN Security Council in respect of Iraq, what evidence is there that the frequent launching of missiles against Iraq is hastening that process? Is not it really the case that as well as causing the inevitable slaughter of innocent civilians, it causes Iraq to become more intransigent, especially when missiles are launched under questionable legal authority? Is not there also another grave consequence, which is that our friends and allies in other Arab countries in the middle east are themselves politically destabilised? Is not it far better to pursue the action being taken now in the name of the United Nations, which is further discussions and an insistence on Iraq's meeting the requirements of the resolutions, than to contemplate yet another missile attack, with yet more civilian casualties and yet more support for the odious regime of Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Hogg: The right hon. Gentleman has raised a number of points and I shall be unable to reply to them all. First, I say at once that I deplore as much as he does the civilian casualties. That is, indeed, a tragedy and one cannot pretend otherwise. Secondly, I do not believe that our friends and allies in the middle east are being destabilised.

Dr. John Cunningham: Yes, they are.

Mr. Hogg: I do not believe—it is a matter of judgment—that they are being destabilised in the way that the right hon. Gentleman has claimed. Thirdly, I do not feel uneasy about the legal basis for the action in the way that the right hon. Gentleman apparently does.

Lastly, of course we hope that we can avoid future military action. I hope that the Iraqis will comply with the mandatory elements of resolution 687, but the right hon. Gentleman must ask himself what we should do if they do not. That takes me back to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier).

G7 Summit (Tokyo)

2. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the G7 summit in Tokyo.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made a statement in the House on Monday. The progress made on trade was especially welcome and the market access package endorsed by the summit provides the much-needed impetus for resuming the multilateral negotiations in Geneva.

Mr. Moss: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it was the British Government's agenda for international economic recovery that found widespread acceptance in Tokyo, as it did in Copenhagen some weeks ago? As Britain is a leading advocate of free trade, does not the enhanced prospect of a successful conclusion to the GATT talks later this year mean good news for the British economy and for British jobs?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right. We have pressed that view for a long time. It has proved to be a long road. We do not believe in systems for regional trade—Fortress Europe, Fortress Asia or Fortress North America—which are not good for a world trading country such as ours, so we were encouraged by the success on trade access. We can approach the main GATT negotiations in Geneva with a good deal more optimism than seemed likely a few weeks ago.

Mr. Winnick: What is the use of fine words about Bosnia when, on Monday, 12 people were killed and 15 were seriously injured queuing for water as a result of the action by Serbian war criminals? It should be clear to the Government, and to other western Governments, following the summit, that the Serbians will continue their aggression, their murder and their crimes and atrocities against humanity, as long as they believe that they can get away with it? What on earth is the west going to do about it?

Mr. Hurd: I will talk about that when I answer a later question, but the two immediate needs are to keep people alive by continuing humanitarian supplies—Mrs. Ogata urged that in London on Monday—and to bring the fighting to an end, which will happen only through a negotiated settlement, unless the hon. Member and others in the west are prepared to do something that no one has been prepared to do, which is to send an international expeditionary force to impose a particular solution. No one has suggested that, save one or two Opposition Members. No Government have suggested that. The rhetoric that has done so much harm in the matter has come from exaggerated expectations, leading to exaggerated criticisms.

Mr. Budgen: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the most important outcome of the G7 meeting was that it was plain that the British Government were not going to engage in any military intervention in Bosnia? Was not that a significant demonstration of leadership and choice to the British nation and a rejection of the dangerous and deceitful dream of world government, which the parties of the left in the House enjoyed for at least 100 years? Did not the Government at last demonstrate a true Tory view—that British soldiers should risk their lives only in upholding the British national interest?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend knows that 2,500 British troops are in Bosnia. They are helping to keep people alive. They have so far escorted 950 convoys and 45,700 tonnes of food, mainly to Muslims and Croats. Many Bosnians, of all backgrounds, would have been dead had it not been for the British effort, so I do not entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I think that was, and remains, a thoroughly worthwhile effort. However, I do not believe, and have never used rhetoric that would lead anyone to believe, that it was part of Britain's interests to pretend that we could sort out every man-made disaster in the world, of which there are many at the moment. The United Nations is struggling with great difficulty in places such as Somalia, Iraq—which we have just dealt with—Afghanistan, Angola, Mozambique and Bosnia to do what it can. It is in our interest to do our bit, but we should not over-pretend, or let rhetoric get in the way of reality.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Did the G7 consider the reports from Iran that it might want to send as many as 17,000 troops to Bosnia? If that were to happen, what would be the response of the western democracies?

Mr. Hurd: It is for the Secretary-General to assess replies to his request for more troops for Bosnia. I am glad that the French are sending more and I hope that other European countries that have been thinking of it will do so. I believe that there is a strong case for having Muslim contingents there. I do not personally think that Iran would be a suitable candidate for that.

Hong Kong

3. Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Governor of Hong Kong to discuss the future of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: On Friday 9 July. I reported to him on my visit to Peking on 8 and 9 July. In Peking I had useful wide-ranging talks with Chinese leaders. On the electoral issue, I was able to focus their attention on the essential points and to make plain the need for more rapid progress. I emphasised the need for fair and open elections acceptable to the people of Hong Kong and for the negotiations to concentrate on three things: the functional constituencies, the election committee and the through train—that is to say, the need for clear, objective criteria for candidates standing in the 1995 elections to remain members of the legislature for a full four-year term. Chinese leaders also agreed to speed up work on the airport and in the joint liaison group.

Mr. Sims: I thank my right hon. Friend for that detailed reply. He mentioned the joint liaison group which, clearly, has a key role to play between now and 1997, but it has been making particularly slow progress. What success does he think that he had in discussing with officials in Beijing and with the Governor ways in which the work of that group could be expedited? Will he take this opportunity of explaining to the House the implication of the establishment with the Chinese of the preliminary working committee?

Mr. Hurd: On the first point, yes, we made some progress inasmuch as the dates for future meetings have been fixed for September and later this year in Peking and London. I emphasised—this was not contradicted—the need to get on with much of the agenda, for example the air services agreement, defence lands and the technical changing of legislation. I hope that there is progress there, although the next few months will show whether that hope is real.

I raised the matter of the preparatory working group with the Chinese Foreign Minister who is to be chairman of the group and received an assurance that it was not aimed at interfering in or complicating the work of the joint liaison group or, indeed, the administration of Hong Kong by Britain up to June 1997.

Mr. Rogers: When I met Governor Patten on his visit here on 1 July I was pleased to hear that the process of getting democratic structures into place by 1997 was advancing and that the through train has been pursued assiduously. When will the Secretary of State make a decision on the future of the non-Chinese ethnic minorities in Hong Kong? There are 7,000 such people, mainly of Indian origin, who were removed to Hong Kong as many as 100 years ago and who are likely to become stateless under the citizenship propositions. Surely they deserve much better treatment from this Government than what has been proposed.

Mr. Hurd: This is a long-standing argument and I know the strength of the case. It was dealt with a few days ago on 9 July by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department. He repeated the assurance that the group already has: that if, against all expectations, they come under pressure to leave Hong Kong and have nowhere else to go, the Government of the day would consider with considerable and particular sympathy their case for admission to this country.

European Community (Enlargement)

4. Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards enlarging the EC.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): Accession negotiations are in train with Austria, Finland Sweden and Norway. The June European Council set a target date of 1 January 1995 for their accession. It also agreed that the six associate countries of eastern Europe should become members as soon as they could assume the responsibilities of membership. On 30 June, the Commission's opinions on the applications for membership of Malta and Cyprus were issued. We welcome those developments.

Mr. Garnier: While I welcome the proposals for the accession of, in particular, the European Free Trade Association countries, because they will be net contributors, will my hon. Friend keep a firm hold on the present: first, by ensuring that the deliberations of EC Ministers are dealt with more effectively by their meetings beginning on time; secondly, by ensuring that there is a complete absence of pettifogging and nitpicking regulations emanating from Europe; thirdly, by ensuring that article 3(b) is brought into effect as soon as possible; and, fourthly, will he do his best to ensure that the social chapter is kept well offshore?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I can give my hon. Friend those assurances. We, too, want article 3(b) of the treaty brought into effect as soon as possible, but that requires ratification first. I know that my hon. Friend will play his part in that. I believe that the accession of the additional EFTA states will help us, as they, too, believe in a decentralised, open-trading Community with strong budget discipline. That will help us to resist those who want an enclosed, protectionist, centralised, socialist Europe.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: Despite the schedule of events that the Minister sketched in his opening reply and the fact that, for example, Finland acknowledges the diplomatic role that Britain is playing within the Community to assist it in its progress towards membership, will the Minister none the less acknowledge that there are fears among various parties in various countries within the existing Community that the British Government—not least because of reports about the Foreign Office preparation for the next set of intergovernmental conferences, if we can look that far forward—see the enlargement process as a means of putting the brakes, along the lines that the hon. Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) was hinting at, on the process of further European integration? Will he allay fears on that matter?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government welcome the accession negotiations, which are well under way and going well. We were in the lead in inviting other member states to set a target date for the accession of the additional states. We want to strengthen Europe by enlarging it.

Mr. Channon: Will my hon. Friend say a word more about the accession of the associate states that were part of the old Soviet Union? What does he think is now the likely timetable for them?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We believe that Europe should be open to any application from a European state that is democratic and willing to take on the responsibilities of membership. That includes the states of eastern and central Europe. I have to be candid in saying that their membership must be some years away, but the Copenhagen summit was clear in welcoming their eventual accession.

Mr. Hoon: Assuming that enlargement is completed successfully, what consequential changes in the decision-making processes of the European Community does the Minister expect will be necessary? In particular, does he expect that more majority voting in the Council of Ministers will be required?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No, that does not necessarily follow, although it is true that the accession of four additional states will cause us to look again at some of the institutional mechanisms. The number of votes that each of the accession states has remains to be negotiated.

Democratic Elections

5. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to how many countries he has made representations in the last six months urging them to hold democratic elections.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): We have made such representations to 12 countries in the past six months.

Mr. Evans: I thank the Minister for his reply. Does he agree that, in the middle east, the only true democracy is Israel? In view of that, and if he believes in democracy, will he tell me why the Government discriminate against Israel, in both trade and aid? We know that the shambles opposite do not know anything about democracy, dominated as they are by the unions—no say no pay, and all that nonsense—but we do. In view of that, does not he think that the Government should give their undivided support to the Government of Israel?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I agree with my hon. Friend that Israel is a democracy, although I hope that it will resolve the problems of the occupied territories in the context of the current peace process. It is not true that we discriminate against Israel. Only last week at the Tokyo summit there was a call for removal of the Arab boycott.

Mr. Grocott: Does the Minister agree that the violation by the Nigerian military authorities of the democratic process in Nigeria last month was tragic not only for the people of Nigeria, but in the precedent that it set—an all-too-frequent precedent—for those around the world who accept the democratic process only when it gives them the results that they want? Will the Minister confirm that that violation of the democratic process in Nigeria has resulted in bloodshed and a further infringement of civil and human rights? Will he further confirm to the House and to the Nigerian authorities that there can be no normalisation of relations with Nigeria—rather, relations will inevitably deteriorate—until the regime there understands that the only legitimate source of political authority is not the army but the will of the people?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, we have taken a strong line and we have deplored the decision of the Nigerian Government not to respect the elections and to seek another way forward. We have made it absolutely clear that we will not normalise relations until a proper democratic civilian regime is in place in Nigeria.

Mr. Devlin: Will my hon. Friend be making representations to the Chinese Government about the present situation in Tibet, where no democratic elections have been held since the invasion in 1948 and where recently large-scale riots in the streets have been savagely put down by the Chinese occupation forces?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised that matter with the Chinese Government in Peking last week and made our position clear.

Ms Eagle: Is the Minister aware of the increasingly dangerous situation in Cambodia following its elections, particularly the gains of influence and territory being made by Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge? Is it not disgraceful that the western powers have included that appalling organisation in the so-called peace effort and allowed it to make gains which bring the probability of another year zero even closer?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are actively encouraging the Cambodian authorities to complete the new constitution and form a Government who respect the wishes of the Cambodian people as expressed in that election.

Mr. Colvin: I am sure that one of the countries to which Her Majesty's Government will have made representations is the Republic of South Africa. Have the Government expressed any preference for the sort of democratic structure that they would like to see in place in that country when the reforms—which are long overdue, and welcome—are in place? Will he acknowledge that a federal or perhaps a confederal system in South Africa is more likely not only to protect the democratic rights of minority groups but to assist that country to the economic recovery without which the people's economic aspirations are not likely to be met after the elections are held?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We welcome the South African Government's decision to hold elections on 27 April next year, but the constitutional arrangements for those elections are a matter for the South African people in their current discussions. We continue to give strong support for negotiations to end the current violence.

Bosnia

6. Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he proposes to take to ensure that Serb and Croat aggression in Bosnia is not rewarded by territorial acquisition.

Mr. Hurd: A solution dictated by the Serbs and Croats at the expense of the Bosnian Muslims would not be accepted by the international community. Lord Owen and Mr. Stoltenberg continue the search for an equitable negotiated settlement based on the concept of one Bosnia. Mr. Stoltenberg briefed the United Nations Security Council yesterday. This would have to involve Serb and Croat withdrawal from the present positions taken by force. Sanctions will continue to be enforced against Serbia and Montenegro until the conditions set by the Security Council are met. We believe that the time has come for the European Community, perhaps on Monday, to consider economic measures against Croatia so long as Croatia, too, is engaged in activities contrary to internationally established principles.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the Foreign Secretary recognise that that answer essentially reiterates the policy that he and the Government have pursued during the past year and more? That policy has failed to stop the aggression by the Serbs and Croats and the sickening slaughter of innocent men, women and children in Sarajevo and countless other Bosnian towns.

When will the Foreign Secretary recognise that the lesson of history is that aggressors are not stopped by fine words and declarations, but only by the prospect of superior military force? Does he also recognise that until the United Nations acts firmly and concertedly to stop the aggression there will not be an end to the sickening killing?

Mr. Hurd: The difficulties of following that advice may be seen in Somalia today, and the situation in Somalia is easy compared with the problems of Bosnia. That is why I repeat that no Government with whom we have been in contact—in fact, no Government at all—have proposed, as the hon. Gentleman does, that an international expeditionary force be sent to impose a solution to the civil war in Bosnia and then stay there to enforce that solution for one, two, five or 10 years. Many half-measures have been suggested, and we have analysed them.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly says, we have not managed to stop the fighting with the present policies. What we can do is provide a framework of ideas for a negotiated settlement, put economic and financial pressures on those stimulating the fighting—I mentioned that in relation to Croatia—and help to keep people alive.

Mr. Fry: Does my right hon. Friend accept that it is not enough to say that the UN and this country will not condone the Croat and Serb invasions of parts of Bosnia? That cannot be done without making it clear that the only way to enforce any settlement is to ensure that there can be a degree of resettlement of the people who have been subject to ethnic cleansing. That will not be decided by a few words. There will be a need for an international force to ensure that resettlement can take place. Is my right hon. Friend prepared to take that up with the UN as soon—I hope that it will be soon—as some kind of settlement is agreed among the three parties?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right. Once there is a negotiated settlement, which cannot be dictated by Serbs and Croats, the question of saving people and establishing them in new homes or their old homes arises immediately. There will have to be a big international effort. The Heads of Government said at their meeting in Tokyo that that cannot be undertaken at the dictate of Serbs and Croats. Lord Owen and Mr. Stoltenberg are not seeking to press the Bosnia Muslims into accepting a particular settlement. They are saying that it is worth while from everybody's point of view that the discussions in Geneva should continue to see whether such a settlement can emerge based on one Bosnia, either a confederation or a federation.

Dr. John Cunningham: Few people, apart from the right hon. Gentleman, are in any doubt that the outcome in Bosnia is being dictated by Serbian and Croatian aggression. All the evidence points to that inescapable conclusion, and the deplorable statement from Washington in May this year was almost an invitation to that end.

Is it not time that the right hon. Gentleman stopped issuing threadbare threats of tougher measures which never emerge? The use of air power is never ruled out, but it is never ruled in. That is in stark contrast with Iraq, where the war is over but missiles have been used in furtherance of United Nations resolutions. The war is continuing in Bosnia, but no action, even limited action, is taken.

There are options between the present position and the all-out expeditionary force to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, but no action is being taken. The outcome is a deplorable defeat for the EC and for the United Nations.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman is a firm disciple of the "something must be done" school. I listened with growing bafflement to the rigmarole of the Leader of the Opposition elaborating on this theme in answer to the Prime Minister on Monday. The right hon. Gentleman is rightly against lifting the arms embargo. He talks about air power, but I do not know what he means; it has never been spelt out. What does he think will be achieved? The position is clear: NATO and the Security Council have agreed that if UNPROFOR troops, and our troops, are attacked from the air, NATO can defend them. That is perfectly clear and has been made perfectly clear to everyone. The right hon. Gentleman must get out of the habit of supposing in a vague and unformulated way that the half-measures that he is advocating will produce results which could be produced only by something so drastic that not even he would propose it.

Departmental Personnel

7. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the number of personnel in post on Foreign and Commonwealth Office duties (a) abroad and (b) in the United Kingdom; at what cost; what were the corresponding figures five, 10 and 15 years ago in numbers and cost in real terms; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): The total diplomatic wing United Kingdom-based establishment of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is currently 6,648, of which 4,048 are serving at home and 2,600 overseas. The corresponding figures in earlier years were 6,578 in 1988-89, of which 3,775 were serving at home and 2,793 overseas, 6,763 in 1983 and 7,275 in 1978. A breakdown of personnel between home and overseas in 1978 and 1983 is not available.

The estimated pay bill for 1993-94 is £265 million. The equivalent figure on the same price base for 1988-89 was £257 million and for 1983-84 £251 million. A comparable figure for 1978-79 is not available.

These figures should be seen against the background of increasing demands on the diplomatic wing. We continue to exercise rigorous control over United Kingdom-based staff numbers at home and overseas.

Mr. Greenway: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply—[Interruption.] For all the hilarity in the House, I am sure that we are grateful to all members of staff in embassies and consulates around the world for the excellent work that they do for our country. Does my right hon. Friend share my concern that the number of staff in post in the foreign service is diminishing rather than increasing at a time when more are needed because the world situation is so much more complex with the break-up of countries into much smaller units? Will he convey the support of the House to the Treasury and say that we want more people in post and properly supported because that is the only way in which this country's influence can be sustained and improved and in which trade can be improved?

Mr. Goodlad: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. The Government will ensure that the level of staffing in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is equal to the tasks laid on us.

Ms Coffey: Has the Minister received any more information from Foreign Office staff in Turkey about the possible release date for my constituent David Rowbottom and his partner who are being held by the PKK? Can he give the families any assurances because, as he will appreciate, they are extremely worried?

Mr. Goodlad: I will write to the hon. Lady.

Mr. Wilkinson: What evidence is there that, as we supposedly proceed towards ever-closer union in Europe, there will be an ever-diminishing number of Foreign and Commonwealth diplomats stationed in European Community countries? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that there will be no diminution of posts, but rather the opposite, in the real growth areas in the world where significant economic advances are being made and where opportunities really exist for British business, such as the Pacific basin and south America?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We shall have people where they are needed.

Mr. George Robertson: Is there any chance that Foreign Office Ministers might drop the supercilious veneer that they deploy in circumstances in which the most trivial and most serious issues are still at stake?

Will the right hon. Gentleman come clean with the House and with the country about what the consequences will be if the Treasury gets its way with regard to the cuts in our diplomatic representation overseas and, especially, the cuts in the British Council and in the BBC World Service? Why will Ministers not speak out about the permanent—perhaps irreparable—damage that will be done to institutions such as the BBC World Service, which is respected across the planet, which almost every day speaks with authority and balance to some 146 million people, and which may well face budget cuts of about £13 million next year? Surely it is the duty of the Foreign Office to come out from behind the diplomatic language and fight for its corner and for the country.

Mr. Goodlad: The hon. Gentleman is extremely eloquent in dreaming up ghosts at which to start. I can assure him that we will ensure that the resources provided are equal to the tasks laid upon us.

Mr. Allason: Will my right hon. Friend and his colleagues exercise a little less reticence in attacking ill-informed press criticism of Foreign Office expenditure overseas? Will he confirm that the appointment of the Governor of Bermuda, for example, costs the British taxpayer nothing and that the Government of Bermuda meets the bill in full? Why was it left to the Governor of Bermuda, and not Foreign Office Ministers, to draw attention to the crass criticism in The Mail on Sunday and The Times, among other newspapers?

Mr. Goodlad: If I were to occupy myself dealing with crass criticism by newspapers I should not have time for anything else. However, my hon. Friend is absolutely right that the Governor of Bermuda costs the British taxpayer nothing, as he is paid for by Bermuda. The Premier of Bermuda is in this country today and is very welcome here.

Sierra Leone

8. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the present state of United Kingdom relations with Sierra Leone.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are hopeful that our relations will improve.

Mr. Jones: I hope that our relations will improve sufficiently to enable the United Kingdom Government to ask the Sierra Leone Government to honour pension commitments that are still outstanding after, in some cases, 40 years. I refer to United Kingdom citizens who are ex-employees of the Colonial Office, having worked in educational establishments in Sierra Leone. If there is no improvement, will the United Kingdom Government pay the pensions of those people at long last?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I will certainly look into the question of our representations to the Sierra Leone Government about the pensions to which the hon. Gentleman refers. He will know that we have many issues outstanding with the Sierra Leone Government. We were very distressed by their conduct last year, and we are seeking, by persuasion, to bring about an improvement in the political situation there, in so far as we can influence it.

Bosnia

9. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last discussed Bosnia with his European counterparts.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend did so at the Copenhagen meeting of the European Council on 21 and 22 June and, again, in the margins of the Tokyo summit held between 7 and 9 July.

Mr. Alton: In the absence of European troops in Bosnia and of the political will to commit them, can the Minister say what we shall do when the members of the Organisation of the Islamic Conference appeal to the United Nations to commit up to 18,000 troops there? Given our own indifference to the plight of people who have been masscared in Bosnia, to the mutilation of that country, and to its right to self-determination and sovereignty, and even though we have failed to commit troops for the purpose of saving people there, we should say that we will not oppose the placing of Islamic troops to defend the interests of Muslims, who continue to be massacred.

Mr. Hogg: I have heard some pretty silly questions in this place, but that is one of the silliest. All hon. Members, with the possible exception of the hon. Gentleman, know that we now have 2,400 troops in Bosnia. In addition, there are very substantial French and other European formations. I do not know what the hon. Gentleman is talking about.

Sir Michael Marshall: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, in consultation with our European partners, there is scope to seek to deter aggression in Bosnia if we can take forward the process of bringing to justice those who are guilty of crimes against humanity? In that regard, does my right hon. and learned Friend believe that it will be possible to name names so that we can deter those who have gone in for ethnic cleansing and other horrors?

Mr. Hogg: The Security Council has made it plain that there should be an ad hoc Yugoslav war crimes tribunal. I agree with that. What is even more important, however, is that we get the parties to the fighting to start negotiating.

Mr. McAvoy: Does the Minister really believe that Serbian expansionism will stop when Bosnia vanishes from the map? It is well known that the Serbians will extend their aggression to other areas in the Balkans once they have finished with Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The Secretary of State has outlined the difficulties and dangers involved in supporting the use of United Nations troops in Bosnia. Does the Minister accept, however, that the same doubts and difficulties existed at the time of the Kuwait-Iraq war? The Secretary of State supported intervention then. What is the difference between Iraq and Bosnia? Is it Arab oil?

Mr. Hogg: Two questions are rolled up in that question. As to Bosnia, it is our determination that there shall continue to be a state of Bosnia. We are seeking to carry forward negotiations whereby the three warring factions can live in peace within the existing frontiers of Bosnia. Whether that is a confederal or federal solution is a matter for the parties involved. That we hope and intend to see a state of Bosnia in future is clear and beyond doubt.

The hon. Gentleman's second question was broadly whether the situation in former Yugoslavia is the same as that in the Gulf. The answer is no. There are remarkable differences. To start with, what we are seeing in Bosnia and indeed throughout much of former Yugoslavia is, in essence, a civil war. What we saw in the Gulf was a clear attack on one sovereign state by another. Moreover, in the Gulf war it was easy to define one's political objective, which was the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. In Bosnia, what one is seeking to achieve is political negotiation and then a settlement through discussion.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not a cruel and cynical betrayal of the Bosnian Muslims that the United Nations should send in a United Nations protection force with no mandate to protect and should declare safe havens that it has no intention to make safe? For how much longer will the United Nations and Her Majesty's Government maintain a position whereby we deny the victims of aggression any outside assistance and refuse to let them have access to the means of self-defence when we know that the other side —the Serbs—started the conflict with more than 10 times as much ammunition and hardware?

Mr. Hogg: We need to be clear about this. The United Nations is neither more nor less than its member states. Therefore, the essential question is whether the member states—in particular, the United Kingdom—are prepared to put combat troops into Bosnia to wage war. If the answer is no—and that, indeed, is the answer—people must not encourage the Bosnian Muslims to suppose something different.

Kenya (Press Harassment)

10. Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's representations concerning harassment of the press in Kenya.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have repeatedly stressed at the highest levels of the Kenyan Government the importance of a free press.

Sir David Steel: The Minister knows from my question on Monday that I am particularly concerned about the case of Fotoform publishers, in which we have a particular locus because its managing director is a British citizen. Is he aware that since its presses, which I visited in May, were raided and forced to close, three of the company's publications—Society, Finance and Law Monthly—have been suspended? That is direct harassment of the press. My latest information is that the judgment that should have been delivered yesterday was not forthcoming and that the case is still continuing. Such suppression of the press is outrageous and we have a particular duty to make repeated condemnation of it.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am, of course, aware of that case and of the right hon. Gentleman's interest in it. We exchanged words about it on Monday. He will know that we take a strong line about it. I am extremely disappointed that the case was adjourned yesterday. We believe that the legal proceedings should be concluded as soon as possible.

Mr. John Marshall: Will my hon. Friend make it clear to the Kenyan Government and other Governments that economic assistance from this country depends on those Governments adhering to basic principles of human and political rights?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Yes. As my hon. Friend is aware, the elections in Kenya were, ultimately, conducted successfully, even though in the run-up to them there was cause for concern. The Government and the International Monetary Fund have made it clear to the Kenyan Government that further balance of payments support depends on their complying with a shadow programme that they have negotiated with the IMF.

Israel (EC Application)

11. Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made with Israel's application for associate member status with the EC.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The 1975 co-operation agreement provides the present basis of the relationship between the EC and Israel. In 1992, the EC and Israel agreed to examine how those arrangements might be updated. The Commission has had exploratory talks with Israel and will soon propose a draft negotiating mandate to the Council.

Mrs. Kennedy: Does the Minister believe that the economic regeneration of that region is the surest way to achieve stability and lasting peace? If so, will he actively promote—not merely support—Israel's application for associate membership of the EC? Will he further consider the active promotion of Israel's application to join the "Western European and Others" group of the United Nations?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am cautious about using the term "association agreement" because it might imply that EC membership is in prospect when at present it is not. I agree that it is a matter of mutual interest to develop trade relations and better political dialogue.

Mr. Dykes: Does my hon. Friend agree that Israel's application for associate-only status would be considerably reinforced if the British Government would put pressure on the Arab countries to remove their boycott, which harms Israel's economic performance? If Israel now has the imagination to reach genuine and lasting peace with the Palestinians in the present negotiations, the great prize of the near east common market will be available, including maximum support from the European Community.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I confirm to my hon. Friend that we deplore the Arab boycott of Israel.

Mr. Burden: Does the Minister agree that, if it is reasonable for Israel to seek closer relationships with the European Community, it is reasonable for the international and European communities to seek from Israel reasonable standards of conduct of the sort expected of other countries? That includes ending the economic strangulation of the west bank and Gaza strip, respecting the rights of Palestinians living in the occupied territories, and abiding by international resolutions such as ending the illegal occupation of the west bank and Gaza strip and the illegal annexation of east Jerusalem.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has repeatedly made it clear that the Israeli defence forces must respect human rights in the occupied territories. We deplore all violence of that nature as well as terrorist activities against Israeli citizens.

Middle East

12. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the peace process in the middle east, and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The 10th round of bilateral negotiations adjourned in Washington on 1 July. The Israeli-Palestinian negotiations have reached an important moment. Both sides now face the decision whether to engage in detailed negotiations about interim arrangements in the occupied territories. We think that they should.

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the present agreeable climate in the peace process would be better promoted by a constructive dialogue with the newly pragmatic Palestine Liberation Organisation rather than allowing Hammas and fundamentalist groups in the region to continue to pose a dangerous threat to the whole of the middle east?

Mr. Hogg: I certainly think that Hammas poses a threat to the middle east in general and to the peace talks in particular. That is why it is extremely important that urgent progress should be made in the peace negotiations now under way.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Does the Minister agree that the middle east talks are threatened by a three-and-a-half month closure of Gaza which, after 26 years of occupation, does not have the finance to sustain itself and in some cases lacks the basic infrastructure for water, sewerage and a financial system? Does he also agree that, while Israel has a right to legitimate security rightly, as an occupying power it also has a duty to look after the interests of the occupied population? If the Israelis will not help the Gazans, will the Government do something through the EC to help them?

Mr. Hogg: I certainly think that if we are to see progress in the talks it is important that the Palestinians and the Israeli people see that positive advantages are to be gained from those talks. Therefore, I say to the Government of Israel that they must lift the weight of the occupation—there are various ways in which to do that—and I say to the Palestinians that they must stop the violence.

Mr. Carrington: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the process of peace negotiations in the middle east depends crucially on the brokering by the United States of a settlement? Will my right hon. and learned Friend put pressure on the United States Government to encourage Israel to bring the future of Jerusalem into the negotiations in a constructive manner?

Mr. Hogg: I entirely agree that the role of the United States is critical to a successful outcome of the negotiations. We, the United Kingdom Government, will do what we can to support the process, but our agenda is not separate from that of the United States. The negotiators must hurry, as it is always possible that; if there is no progress the enthusiasm of the United States to remain involved may diminish. I think it is prudent to leave the issue of Jerusalem until last.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I wish to raise with you, Madam Speaker, a point of order of which I gave you notice: the apparent conflict between the rulings that you gave yesterday and that Mr. Speaker Weatherill gave some time ago on Standing Order No. 20 and its terms.

In exchanges yesterday, you said:

"The matter in question must be urgent, and it must relate to new developments, such as a change of policy."—[Official Report, 13 July 1993; Vol. 228, c. 834.]

Standing Order No. 20 states:

"On Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday a Member rising in his place at the commencement of public business may propose, in an application lasting not more than three minutes, to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration."

I put it to you, Madam Speaker, that the ruling that you gave yesterday, which was initially given by Mr. Speaker Weatherill, does not give that permissive right to hon. Members to move an application for Standing Order No. 20. If your ruling is accepted—I have no reason to think that it is not—it requires amendment of Standing Order No. 20. Therefore, I should like advice from you on how such an amendment can be secured, because, unless an amendment is made, it seems that Standing Order No. 20 is in direct conflict with the ruling that you made yesterday and that made by Mr. Speaker Weatherill some years ago.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker. I am grateful for your letter, and I wish to raise a point of order arising from that of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). Many of us can recall when hon. Members, whether the occupants of the Chair liked it or not, stated at your office that they were going to make an application and, as far as I can recall—the Clerks will no doubt advise if this is wrong—there were no restrictions.

During the 1974-79 period, Conservative Members, when in opposition, used to make four or five applications each day. No doubt on each occasion the Members involved took the view that they stood no chance of succeeding, but there were no restrictions on them trying.

I accept entirely that it was not you, Madam Speaker, but your predecessor who made it more difficult to make applications. However, with all due respect, I wish to ask you when that change was made and what opportunity the House was given to decide, on a vote, whether that should be the case. Undoubtedly, there has been a change, and it is now far more difficult to get permission to move an application under Standing Order No. 20. The matter should be put to the House and a vote taken accordingly.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): There is an ironic side to this whole episode in connection with Speaker Weatherill. My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) said that, in 1974-79, when a Labour Government were in office, we had to put up with four or five applications a day for SO9s, as they were then called, from Tory Members. The deputy Chief Whip of the Tory party at that time was none other than the man who was later to become Speaker Weatherill, and he organised the SO9s.

Madam Speaker: That is hardly a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West) rose——

Madam Speaker: Is it the same point?

Mr. Canavan: No.

Madam Speaker: In that case, I shall respond to the point of order. I am not able to relax the practice of the Chair in this matter. Contrary to what some hon. Members said yesterday, that practice has been applied consistently for several years. If I relaxed the practice, the House would be exposed to a spate of three-minute applications which had no possibility of success because they bore no relation to the criteria that I have to apply.

Those criteria are that the matter must be specific, important and urgent, and must be matter for which a Minister has responsibility. Of course, I shall continue to offer constructive suggestions to hon. Members who make Standing Order No. 20 applications so that they might pursue the matter, which I quite understand concerns them, in some other way.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Further to the point of order, Madam Speaker. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and others have said, there was a spate of applications in 1975. By what alchemy, at what point and when was the change made? Who decided it? On reflection, some of us think that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover is right, and that this has all been done by the powers that be since television has been brought in. What it is all about is television at prime time. The question is succinct: how and at what moment was the change made and by whom, and was it made with the authority of the House?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman was a Member at that time. If he and all of us reflect, we will remember that, in the period 1978-79, which hon. Members are recalling there was a spate of urgent issues. We all have long enough memories to understand what they were. If the hon. Gentleman wants to know about the urgency requirement in a Standing Order No. 20 application, he will find that it is there for him to read. If the House wishes to change our procedures or the Standing Order, which is quite specific, there are ways and means, as the hon. Gentleman knows, for him to do so.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I must take other points of order. I have dealt with the previous one. Some hon. Members are taking up the time of the House on a day that is crucial to other hon. Members.

Mr. Canavan: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It is different from the last one. One of your many onerous duties is to chair the Parliamentary Boundary Commission for Scotland. The Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986 states quite clearly that, in making recommendations about the drawing up of parliamentary constituency boundaries, the commission must have regard to local government area boundaries.

Traditionally in Scotland, local government area boundaries have been determined after very careful consideration and, in many cases, after public consultation by the Local Government Boundary Commission for Scotland. Major restructuring involving the creation of new authorities or the abolition of existing ones, has usually been done after careful consideration by some form of independent commission.

However, for the proposals that will be before the House this afternoon, that has not been done. There have been accusations of gerrymandering, and it would put you, Madam Speaker, in an invidious position if the work of your commission, the Parliamentary Boundary Commission for Scotland, were prejudiced in any way by the implementation of the gerrymandered local government proposals that will be before the House today.

Will you use your position as Chair of the Scottish Parliamentary Boundary Commission and your good offices to try to bring about some kind of independent commission to study this matter carefully and see that the proposals that will be before the House today are scrapped, or at least shelved until the whole matter of Scottish local government is given the fullest possible consideration by an independent commission chaired by somebody who is neutral and fair-minded, such as your good self?

Madam Speaker: These are still only proposals. The hon. Gentleman has made some interesting points which are better raised in the debate, which, if we ever reach it, will be shortly. He should put his concerns to the Minister at that time.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): On a different point of order, Madam Speaker. May I refer you to the amendment tabled today in the name of the Prime Minister, which relates to the debate that we are about to have on Scottish local government? It refers to the Government's White Paper, which contains proposals to set up

"a single tier of strong and acceptable all-purpose authorities."

If you read the Government's White Paper, you will find that they are proposing to remove water, police and fire services from those single-tier authorities. Therefore, the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister is misleading and inaccurate, and on that basis will you rule it out of order?

Madam Speaker: As soon as we start the debate, I will give my ruling on the amendment, but we are not in the debate yet.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): You will recall, Madam Speaker that, some time ago at Question Time, I said to the Minister for Energy that the President of the Board of Trade had dipped his hand in the till of the miners' pensions. The Minister, in the House, vehemently denied that, but in this morning's paper it was admitted that Ministers had urged British Coal to raid the pension funds.

Has the Minister for Energy offered to come to the House to make an apology——

Madam Speaker: Order. What appears in newspapers has nothing whatsoever to do with the Chair of the House. All 650 Members could bring in their newspapers and ask me whether I thought they were correct. It is a terrible abuse of the time of the House.

Mr. Enright: It is the court reporter.

Madam Speaker: I do not give a—[Laughter.] I do not care whether it is the court reporter or the most junior reporter on my local paper; it is not an issue for the Chair or for the House.

I had a point of order yesterday from the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) to which I wish to reply. The hon. Gentleman raised with me the effect of article 21 of the Act of Union on the implementation of the Government's proposals for local government reorganisation in Scotland. As the House is aware, I rule on the orderliness of the business before the House and not on hypothetical questions. I am satisfied that the motion before the House today is perfectly in order. Consideration of the orderliness of a future Local Government (Scotland) Bill will have to wait until the text of the Bill is available and I have been able to see it.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Thank you, Madam Speaker. Your ruling is slightly ambiguous. Scottish Members would like to know whether the determination of Scottish local authority boundaries and structure and the future of water supplies will be dictated by the votes of English Members of Parliament in the House, regardless of and notwithstanding the Act of Union.

I thank you for your consideration of the matter, but you will appreciate its importance. If the conventions of the United Kingdom Parliament dictate that English Conservative Members, many rolling in from the liquid dungeons of this place at the end of the day, dictate that——

Madam Speaker: Order. I patiently listened to the hon. Gentleman's point of order. He put it to me clearly, and I took some time in considering it. This is a United Kingdom Parliament, and we all determine together what happens in the various parts of this nation.

Mr. Salmond: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. There can be no further point of order. I carefully considered the hon. Gentleman's point of order yesterday. I have gone into it thoroughly, and I answered it today by saying that this is a United Kingdom Parliament and every one of us is entitled to make a decision on what comes before the House.

Women into Parliament

3.44 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Representation of the People Acts with a view to increasing the number of women elected to Parliament; and for connected purposes.

By great good fortune, and with the co-operation of the people who arrange ten-minute Bills, today is the birthday of Emmeline Pankhurst—and this year marks the 75th anniversary of women's suffrage. A group of women Members of Parliament from all parties have got together to commemorate those great events to stage an exhibition in the House called "Women into Politics"—which you, Madam Speaker, graciously opened on Monday.

Today, Lady Thatcher, our first woman Prime Minister, unveiled a plaque to suffragettes in St. Stephen's hall. It is the first time that suffragettes have been commemorated in the House.

Since 1918, only 163 women have been elected to Parliament, compared with 3,986 men. Almost half that number of women were in Parliament for only one Session, because they were given marginal seats to fight or were elected at by-elections, and therefore did not spend more than a couple of years here.

Perhaps it is not surprising that there have only been 10 women Cabinet members, while 388 men have served in the Cabinets. One fifth of all women Cabinet Ministers are in office today, and there are still 17 Government Departments without a woman politician, or which have never had a woman politician in them. Women have a view on every subject. How can their views be reflected in legislation if they are not in the room when key decisions about legislation are made?

Things are getting a little better. At the last general election, 60 women were elected—the largest number ever—but they still account for less than 10 per cent. of the membership of the House. It is not true that women do not come forward as candidates. It is just much harder for them to be adopted for safe seats. You, Madam Speaker, tried for 16 years before being elected, and many of us got here almost by a lucky fluke.

Throughout the history of our democracy, women have had to battle for recognition. Until recently, they did not have property rights or the right to their earnings if they were married, and had to fight for a university education and to be accepted into the professions. The suffragettes were not militant feminists, but Christian women who believed that democracy was part of the Christian message, which taught that women were equal to men.

Parliament is still very much a man's world. If women are to make a contribution in their own style, men must accept the need for structures to change. In my time as a Member of Parliament, the need for changing working conditions has been debated but nothing has come of it.

Even the few women who made it to the House have effected profound changes in respect of care of the elderly, children, maternity services and health. Such topics were not considered suitable topics for Parliament to debate before women arrived. They were laughed at or thought too embarrassing to discuss. Women such as Margaret Bondfield, the first woman Cabinet Minister, Eleanor Rathbone, Irene Ward, Megan Lloyd-George and Barbara Castle battled to make this a more caring country.

In the past, Parliament met to raise money to fight the king's wars. Today it meets to raise taxes that are mainly spent on social services and social structures. Those areas are second nature to women because of their upbringing and experience, and ones in which they can make a key contribution to the deliberations of the House.

Historically, Parliament has always been refreshed by the injection of people from different backgrounds. It was once dominated by merchants and landowners. Now, small business men and trade unionists take their place here. Surely now is the time for that trust to extend to the inclusion of far more women in our deliberations. There needs to be a critical mass of women for the priorities in this place to change.

Parliament is broadened by the insights and energies of these newcomers. No one is detracting from existing Members, or the contributions made by men, but stating that women have a key economic role to play, not just outside but inside this building. It is time for us to encourage more women into the House.

Women have all the qualities necessary to be Members of Parliament—not that those qualities are exceptional—and we will know that women have really reached their place in our political community when they are allowed to be as mediocre as some of the men who occupy these Benches.

There is not a level playing field between men and women when it comes to selection for parliamentary seats. If there were, there would be no need for my Bill. Different parties address the matter in different ways. Some parties consider the possibility of quotas, others proportional representation, and still others may—like Bernard Shaw—recommend a coupled vote.

A Parliament with more women would be more equitable, and would more fairly reflect the changes that have taken place in society, particularly in the lives and status of women. I urge hon. Members on both sides of the House to support the principles that I have outlined in my Bill, and I commend it to the House.

3.51 pm

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): It is with some diffidence that I oppose the motion moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman).

I sympathise with much of what my hon. Friend and her supporters seek to achieve, but I disagree fundamentally with the method that they have chosen to achieve those objectives—that of tinkering with our present electoral system, which is epitomised in the Representation of the People Acts.

One of the greatest strengths of our democratic system is the single-member constituency. I have always opposed any suggestion of introducing proportional representation. It would divide the electorate, so that, for example, Conservative voters would approach a Conservative Member of Parliament to deal with their problems, socialist voters would approach a socialist Member of Parliament and Liberal voters would approach a Liberal Member of Parliament.

A secondary result would be that even more power would be put in the hands of the party hierarchy over the selection of candidates, and that centre of decision-making would be taken away from where it should rightly be, at grass-roots level in the constituencies. The people who live in an area should have the freedom to choose an individual to represent them, whether that individual be male or female.

Our existing arrangements for electoral representation have worked well, and have not debarred women from coming forward as candidates. Women Members have made a considerable contribution to the House, to the political life of the country and to society as a whole. With you in the Chair, Madam Speaker, hon. Members are continually reminded that it is possible for women to achieve the highest and most influential of offices, and to fulfil the ensuing responsibilities with great distinction.

I remind the House that the Head of State and the head of the established Church in this country is a woman. Until relatively recently, we had our first woman Prime Minister, who was outstanding in terms of both leadership and intellect. Currently, two members of the Cabinet are women, seven members of the Government are women and 59 right hon. and hon. Members are women. The leaders of countless county borough and parish councils are women. The hard-working grass-roots majority of the membership, certainly of the Conservative party, are women.

If we consider the gradual manner in which our parliamentary democracy came into being over a period of centuries and the way in which the franchise was extended from a limited number to include all adults, we see that the speed with which women have, in the last few decades alone, seized the initiative is truly remarkable. The enthusiasm of my hon. Friend further to hasten this process by any form of positive discrimination should not be allowed to undermine the progress which has been made, or to alter the Representation of the People Acts, which are one of the foundation stones upon which our system of free elections is based.

I support 100 per cent. any attempt to encourage more women Members into this House of Commons, but I completely oppose any attempt to change the rules, to fiddle the rules, to enable them so to do.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mrs. Teresa Gorman, Ms Jean Corston, Mrs. Margaret Ewing and Mrs. Ray Michie.

Women into Parliament

Mrs. Teresa Gorman accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Representation of the Peoples Acts with a view to increasing the number of women elected to Parliament; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 16 July, and to be printed. [Bill 238.]

Orders of the Day

OPPOSITION DAY

[17th Allotted Day]

Local Government and Water (Scotland)

Madam Speaker: I have looked at the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister. It is perfectly in order and has been selected for debate.

May I make a plea at this stage for short speeches? There are a great many Members in all parts of the House who wish to speak in the debate.

3.56 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I beg to move,

That this House notes the publication of the White Paper 'Shaping the Future-The New Councils'; considers that these proposals have been brought forward without adequate consultation, and represent costly and unnecessary changes not sustained by general support for their introduction; condemns the blatant manipulation of boundaries for narrow party interests, consistent with an approach to the governance of Britain which centralises power and disregards the basic consensus necessary to a healthy democracy; welcomes the success of the public campaign against outright privatisation of water, but notes the continuing threat to the future of these services posed by the proposals in the White Paper to remove them from local authority control; and demands that Her Majesty's Government withdraws the White Paper, establishes an independent Commission to review the whole question of local government in Scotland, retains water and sewerage in local authority control, and makes proper provision for adequate investment in these services.

I ought to say that we intend to oppose the amendment that stands in the name of the Prime Minister and his right hon. Friends.

There is a widespread belief that Scotland is usually the first to be at the receiving end of this Government's most damaging initiatives. That is certainly true of the discredited poll tax and the discredited Ministers who supported it, but the Secretary of State for Scotland can make no plea of mitigation in respect of local government and water privatisation. He already knows of the disasters that followed that elsewhere in the United Kingdom. He also knows now that Scotland is at the end of the queue.

What the Secretary of State announced last Thursday was not the product of original thought on his part. His announcement consisted of two proposals: to rearrange the map of Scottish local government to the advantage of his party, and to move a step closer to the selling of Scottish water. Both proposals have already been visited on other parts of the United Kingdom. The people of Scotland, having seen the so-called future, in Tory eyes, know that it does not work.

The fact is that the Government have one overriding conviction, and have adopted it in Scotland as well: if they cannot win elections, abolish them—[Interruption.] The Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), must know that they won 11 out of 72 seats in Scotland and that they have a mere 16 per cent. of support, according to the opinion polls, among the people of Scotland—hardly a mandate to do anything in Scotland, far less to impose this nonsense upon us.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way in a moment.

We saw their solution to the problems that democracy poses. The Greater London council, the metropolitan counties and the Inner London education authority caused problems for the Tories and were abolished. Scotland has now been presented with the same sort of treatment.

Mr. Gallie: The hon. Gentleman referred to 11 Tory Members from Scotland. How many Scottish seats did he forecast the Tory party would get before the general election? Will he note that we achieved 25 per cent. of the vote at the general election?

Mr. Clarke: One thing that I will forecast is that, even with the gerrymandering, the Tories will not get in next time. They know that they cannot win Strathclyde, Lothian, Central or Fife, they suffered humiliating losses in Tayside, Grampian, Dumfries and Galloway and they did not do all that well in the district elections.

What is their answer? It is the same one as we have seen before—the London solution: sweep them away. They respond to the problem of voters who continue to elect Labour councils by creating safe havens for themselves. What is much worse is that they take away from councils as many powers and services as possible, reduce democratic accountability and prepare for sell-offs to the highest bidders.

On water and sewerage, the House will know that there was not a hint in the Tory manifesto at the general election in Scotland of the Government's proposals on water privatisation, or a suggestion that water would be up for sale. Most people in Scotland—indeed, 98 per cent.—believe that water is a gift from God.

Last Thursday, the Government stopped short—but not far short—of selling off water as a result of the Scottish people's influence and determination, not because there was a sudden change on the road to Damascus on the part of the Secretary of State for Scotland.

A few days before the House returned after the summer recess last year, and at considerable expense to taxpayers, the Secretary of State launched a glossy document in Glasgow. The document was full of marks, photographs and nice graphics, and even contained an explanation of why it rains in Scotland. Following that, a firm of consultants was commissioned, at a cost to the taxpayers of upwards of £100,000. It caused months of deep uncertainty among workers and consumers, and nearly 3,000 replies were received, of which only 1 per cent. favoured privatisation. All of that, for what?

The document that we saw last week was not even a full page—it had a mere four paragraphs on water. However, it still managed to disguise the real thinking of the Secretary of State on the matter. Why did he not tell us that water and sewerage will be left in the hands of democratically elected local authorities?

Those local authorities have 150 years of service in protecting the public in terms of health. They know about investment, and they know that they are entitled to protect God's gift to Scotland, as the Scottish people see it. The Government's determination to move in and profiteer is not welcomed either in Ayr or elsewhere.

The Secretary of State said that the public ownership of three new water companies can be combined with a major role for the private sector in providing and financing much of the essential and large capital investment programme that is needed over the next decade. Therefore, the private companies will be providers as well as providing finance.

Perhaps the Secretary of State will tell us how that will work. What is the difference between the franchising option and what he suggested last Thursday? Nothing in the White Paper suggests that he has abandoned all hope of privatisation. We have seen a U-turn, but one that will last only to this side of the next election, as we saw in Northern Ireland. The Secretary of State has been less than honest in Scotland, so let us be clear that his paving Bill will be a major issue at the next general election in Scotland, and we will, of course, invite the Scottish people to decide.

As with water, the Government cannot conceal how they see the role of local government. For the Labour party, that role is about democracy, it is about elected councillors, it is about serving the local community, it is about accountability, and it is about sustaining high standards of services. They are all noble ideals that were once accepted as a consensus by all political parties on behalf of the Scottish people.

For the Government, in their miserable documents, that role is about centralisation, about competitive tendering and, in the end, about local councils organising meetings to award contracts to people who are not accountable to anybody.

The Government issued another glossy document in the past year with a flourish of publicity, including the publication of a video that I understand was called "Lang—the Movie". Civil servants advised the Secretary of State, so in future Ministers may take more account of advice from elsewhere. We were told that "Lang—the Movie" cost £25,000—many will ask if the right hon. Gentleman's presentation was worth that amount. All that was missing was Scarlett O'Hara saying that the Scottish people could not give a damn about his proposals.

That costly exercise offered the Scottish people options of 24 or 35 or 51 authorities. Did the Government respond to the replies? No, not really. They were not responding to people's replies to the various options. During that apology for a consultation exercise, the Government had their own ideas, and those ideas related not to what the people of Scotland wanted, and certainly not to an independent commission, but to a small minority view that coincides with what appear to be the interests of a small number of Tory Members.

During that important consultation on the future of local government, Ministers have been both prosecutors and jury, while the people had no right of appeal.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): In support of the hon. Gentleman, he will remember the sentence in the White Paper that says:

"The Government recognise the time and effort devoted to preparing these reponses, and have examined them with great care".

The responses have been on public view in St. Andrew's house over the past week. There were 108 submissions in the Borders, which have been examined, and of those only three support the proposals advanced by the Government to take Berwickshire out of the Borders region. Not surprisingly, the three who support it are the Conservative group on Berwickshire district council, the Conservative group on Lothian regional council and a single Conservative councillor. Is that public consultation?

Mr. Clarke: The right hon. Gentleman has done a service to the House in exposing what amounts to a disgraceful exercise. I invite the Secretary of State to publish not only those documents to which the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) referred, but other documents that are relevant to our discussions.

The Government claim that there is no evidence of gerrymandering, yet since Thursday—again I challenge the Secretary of State to deny this when he replies—not one independent commentator has been willing to say that the Government's exercise was not influenced by party political considerations alone.

Arthur Midwinter, an academic expert so clearly regarded as non-partisan as to be invited to the Prime Minister's breakfast sitting and invited to give advice during the state visit in the past year, said:

"Stirling, East Renfrewshire, Berwickshire and East Lothian represented Toytown councils."

If I am mistaken about the influences on the Government, perhaps the Secretary of State, after his wide-ranging consultation, will tell us which serious commentator or advisory body, other than the Tory party, advised him to put Helensburgh into Argyll, to take Musselburgh out of East Lothian or to put Barrhead into Greater Eastwood. If he will do so, I am happy to give way.

I am happy to give way to him if he can name a single independent body that supports the proposals. I am happy to give way even to his sidekick, the hon. Member for Eastwood, if he will tell us of any independent body that supported such a view. The fact is, as is clear from the silence, that nobody did, because nobody would support a proposal so reeking of political corruption and so consistent with party political advantage. I am still happy to give way.

The House can reach only one conclusion—that the Secretary of State is the "Jim'll Fix It" of Scottish politics. He has fixed it for the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), he has fixed it for the hon. Member for Eastwood, and he thinks that he has fixed it for the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie). He certainly has not fixed it for the Scottish people, because they have fixed it for him. As someone else might have said at the Dispatch Box, never in the history of local government reform has so much been owed by so few to so few.

Let us consider the carve-up of Renfrewshire. West Renfrewshire has three times the population of East Renfrewshire. No doubt Eastwood has a consideration in these matters, and no doubt we shall get an impartial explanation of how such a conclusion was reached. North Ayrshire includes Cumnock and Doon Valley in the south, and is more than three times as large as South Ayrshire. There is a farcical situation in the Lothians. West Lothian is physically separated from Midlothian, and Musselburgh and Prestonpans are thrown in for good measure. West Lothian is three times as large as Berwickshire and East Lothian.

Are we to conclude that it is now official policy that three voters for a Labour council may be compared with one for a Tory council? That is hardly a model for a modern democracy. Stirling, the model toytown council, spent a year—[Interruption.] As the hon. Member for Eastwood is being so provocative, I shall spell it out again, especially as I have no wish to misquote Professor Midwinter.

Stirling, the model toytown council, spent a year selling everything in sight, no doubt on the advice of the hon. Member for Stirling. I have no doubt that the Government want to do the same to regional services. We are entitled to ask seriously, because the voters of Stirling regard the matter as serious, whether such a small council will begin to take responsibilities for education and social work.

Twenty years ago, the Wheatley report said that an ideal size of council area for social work was 200,000 people. The Secretary of State has often said that the regions have achieved quality of service and identity with local communities. The same is true of education, in terms of economies of scale, delegation of management, direct accountability of staff to councillors and direct accountability of councillors to voters, which the Secretary of State has told us his proposals are all about. Those factors represent a successful recipe for the delivery of strategic services.

The most important question before the House is whether the quality of services and their delivery will be met by the Government's proposals. In social work, what evidence is there to overturn Wheatley? Wheatley, after a long period of consideration and genuine consultation, produced an excellent report, not a sham report based on narrow political dogma.

Where is the evidence that social work departments are better and stronger if they are smaller? Where is the evidence that they can provide the necessary services? Where is the evidence that the needs of the vulnerable who are suffering under the Government's so-called policy on community care will be met by the Government's proposals? Since we are dealing with people who have to work with much larger health boards—in terms of co-operation with community care—perhaps the Secretary of State will tell us more about how he expects the system to work.

Since we are told that the Government are also willing to leave such important matters as education to local authorities, what guarantees are there that the people of Scotland will avoid the bitter experience of those in inner London? The Government argued that abolishing the Inner London education authority would cut costs—something that Tory Ministers repeatedly told us would work—and Ministers are telling us the same of our future in Scotland, but they must know that, in London, the opposite has happened. London boroughs, forced to duplicate central administration and to increase bureaucracy, have upped the number of managers by 67 per cent., which would blow the Government's costing to smithereens. Inner London boroughs were forced to duplicate specialist education services or to abandon them.

Perhaps we shall hear evidence today of what will happen to youth work in Scotland, to adult education and to special needs, based on the inner London experience, which no Secretary of State worth his salt would wish to emulate. When so many young Scots are imperilled by unemployment and drug-related crimes, community education and youth work may be among the victims of the Government's ideological obsessions. That is another reason why the people of Scotland find the Government's proposals so unattrative.

Last week, we had a short exchange in the House about transitional costs. I invite the Secretary of State to be more forthcoming today. We are told that, on the Government's estimate, the transitional cost would be about £200 million. Since, in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), he made it clear that that would have to be found from other elements of the Scottish Office budget, will he tell us which parts of that budget will be cut?

Which services will lose £200 million to pay for the schemes? When the Treasury is clawing back every penny, threatening pensions and benefits, imposing a new tax on people heating their homes and so on, why does the Secretary of State feel that it is the right time to spend £200 million on such an exercise?

All that unnecessary expenditure will not provide a single extra police officer on the beat, a single extra teacher in a school or a single extra home help for the most needy. There is nothing in the proposals that would save a single Tory seat. The Government are unashamedly offering us a two-tier system, but it is based on joint boards, on buying in services and on competitive tendering—a system in which the Secretary of State takes decisions and even makes appointments. Few Hon. Members understand how he can justify that on the basis of democracy.

Only one of the many organisations providing services will be directly accountable to the community. When numerous submissions were made to the Secretary of State, why did he disregard the importance of accountability? Was not that the strong view of the local community councils, of the elected councils, at district, regional and island level? Was not that the strong view of virtually all the voluntary organisations in Scotland, which see the need for positive local government and for co-ordinating activity locally and nationally?

The fact is that the Government are seeking to impose on the people of Scotland without adequate examination or independent assessment a system of government which, as we have seen in the gerrymandering of the proposals for Stirling, Eastwood, Lothian, and even Aberdeen, could have been thought up only by narrow-minded people in Conservative central office. That is not a recipe for success for the future of democracy or local government in Scotland.

The Secretary of State may not wish to be reminded of this, but it was Wheatley himself, who had more experience in these matters than the whole Tory Front Bench put together, who defined local democracy as "to ensure that the effective power of decision in local matters rests on an elected council directly accountable to the electorate for the exercise of that power."

How can we have that measure of direct accountability over education, the police and the fire service in Strathclyde, not to speak of the assessor's role? How can we have that measure of accountability when sprinkled throughout the document is the Secretary of State's determination to take upon himself even more powers, especially in relation to joint planning, than those he has now?

The Government's proposals are not about reforming local government, but about enfeebling it. It is about the betrayal of Scotland, yes, and Conservative promises to listen to the Scottish people. Above all, the latest in a series of cynical manoeuvres by which the Conservative party has overridden the wishes of local people expressed through the ballot box is the Government's response of removing the ballot box itself.

This is a foolish and dangerous course to follow. I hope that the Secretary of State will not mind if I refer to my local government experience. There are many who have contributed to local government and who in a democracy are entitled to expect their views to be heard. Democracy depends on consent. Consent depends on those in power playing by the rules. By changing the rules to suit itself, the Conservative party is putting democracy itself at risk. That is the reason why we have tabled this motion today.

I call upon the Government today, knowing that we carry the overwhelming support of the Scottish people——

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not give way—to recognise the importance of Scotland's deep commitment to these democratic principles and to withdraw their proposals.

Mr. Riddick rose——

Mr. Clarke: If they will not do so, I call upon the people of Scotland to resist and oppose them in every way and to stop them in every way possible. In that, they can be assured that they can depend on the support of the Labour party, and in due course of a Scottish Parliament—which the right hon. Gentleman's absurd proposals, happily, have made even more inevitable.

4.23 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Ian Lang): I beg to move, to leave out from 'House' to the end of the motion, and to add instead thereof:

'welcomes the publication of the White Paper "Shaping the Future-The New Councils"; and considers that its proposals will lead to better and more efficient local government in Scotland, based on a single tier of strong and accountable all-purpose authorities.'.

I welcome the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) back to Parliament—safe back from his little jaunt to Downing street. Last Thursday, he quoted what Oliver Cromwell said to the Rump Parliament in 1653:

"In the name of God, go!"—[Official Report, 8 July 1993; Vol. 228, c. 35.]

I thought that it was singularly inapt, but when he picked up his papers and left the Chamber I realised that he was talking to himself. It is a pity that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was not at home. He is back from Tokyo now, if the hon. Gentleman would like to go again. Certainly the cameras were there in plenty. Indeed, the cameras were everywhere.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Lang: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman now.

Mr. Clarke rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State appears not to be giving way. Is that correct?

Mr. Lang: That is correct.

One of my hon. Friends at the St. Stephen's entrance was greeted by a cameraman asking, "Is this the entrance for the spontaneous Labour walk-out?" When the hon. Member for Monklands, West got to Downing street, he had his photograph taken with the policeman on the door, just as Harold Wilson once did when he was a boy. When Harold Wilson grew up, he went into politics, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman should do the same.

Mr. Clarke rose——

Mr. Lang: No, I will not give way.

I understand that the hon. Gentleman has his troubles at present. After all, we have it on the authority of the Daily Express in an article of 14 June headed, "Labour enemy within". It says:

"Militant is on the march again. When Labour's shadow Scottish Secretary, Tom Clarke, turned up to canvas support during the Easterhouse council by-election, he was cheered to the rafters."

It turned out that it was thought that the right hon. Member was the comedian, Andy Cameron. When it turned out to be the comedian, Tom Clarke, the article said:

"Their tears turned to unprintable forms of welcome."

All the comings and goings of the hon. Gentleman remind me of the doggerel by Mr. Hughes Mearns:

"As I was going up the stair
I met a man who wasn't there.
He wasn't there again to-day.
I wish, I wish he'd stay away."

Judging by the hon. Gentleman's speech today, he was not there again today.

I am glad that we have this early opportunity for a debate, but it is a pity that the Opposition thought that it was only worth half a day of debate. [Interruption.] It takes half a day to read the motion, which is perhaps why Opposition Members have not bothered to read it.

The motion talks about inadequate consultation. The hon. Member for Monklands, West tried to make much of that. I remind the House that we have had no fewer than four consultation papers over the past two years on different aspects of local government reform. We have had nearly 9,000 replies, some of them immensely thorough and detailed, and we have looked at them carefully. In addition, there have been many newspaper and media articles and surveys.

If one doubted the need for single-tier local government and the advantages of it, and the confusion and difficulty that arises from the two-tier structure, one need look no further than the ICM poll in The Scotsman of 9 March. It revealed that one quarter of Scots did not know that cleansing was a district council responsibilty; one third of Scots did not know that housing was a district council responsibility; and no fewer than 40 per cent.—getting on for half the population—did not realise that education, the biggest single local authority service, is a regional authority.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way. Perhaps he will now answer the question that he did not answer last week about how he arrived at the conclusion that Westhill should be incorporated into the city of Aberdeen. Since then, there has been outrage in the daily newspapers in Aberdeen—and from many Tory councillors—that he is gerrymandering. Westhill does not want to be part of Aberdeen. Is not that typical of the way in which he has totally ignored the views of ordinary people in every part of Scotland?

Mr. Lang: If the outrage is coming from Tory councillors, I am not quite sure how I can be accused of gerrymandering. The fact is that there are many proposals on aspects of local government reform for which there is support and opposition in different parts of Scotland. We shall have ample opportunity to debate all of those during the passage of the Bill through Parliament, and the hon. Gentleman will have a chance to make his point.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Will the Secretary of State care to comment on the remarks made by one of his Scottish Tory colleagues, Mr. Brian Meek, a former distinguished Tory group leader on Lothian regional council? Writing in The Herald on Monday of this week, he said:

"So let us go on to the gerrymandering argument. Did Mr. Lang and his Ministers seek to give their party the best possible chance under the new set-up? Of course they did. Why shouldn't they?"

Is that not a remarkable confession of guilt by one of the Secretary of State's own party colleagues?

Mr. Lang: It is not for me to decide whether the correspondent of The Herald, Mr. Meek, is confessing to guilt of anything. He is answerable for what he says in his columns. I am answerable for what I propose to the House.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) rose——

Mr. Lang: No, I must make a little more progress. As for the popularity of single-tier local government, the System 3 poll in The Herald showed support for single-tier up from 37 to 46 per cent., substantially the most popular option of those addressed.

The Labour party's contribution to the debate during the consultation period was almost zero. It is the party of scaremongers and has made no constructive contribution to the debate. We have had nothing but talk of hidden agendas. It was said that we would create a national police force, but our paper today demonstrates that to be wrong. Not only will there be no national police force, but there will be the same number of police forces as before.

The Labour party said that we would privatise water and sewerage—wrong again. We have established three public water authorities firmly in public ownership, maximising the efficiency gains to be had in the delivery of water and sewerage and benefiting from private sector funds for investment.

The Labour party said that there would be massive spending cuts—wrong again. Local authority spending will continue to rise. Private sector investment in water and sewerage will relieve pressure on our resources by billions of pounds.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): The Secretary of State says that this is a single-tier system. Will he explain to the ordinary person in the street how his water, sewerage, education, police and fire services will be run in a single-tier system?

Mr. Lang: If the hon. Gentleman listens to my speech and subsequently takes part in the debate on the Bill as it goes through Parliament, all those questions will be answered. At the moment, I am dealing with all the scares and alarms raised by the Labour party in the past few months. Labour Members should be hanging their heads in shame at the sort of things they have said to cause scare, alarm and anxiety among the Scottish people.

Labour Members talked of a massive increase in joint boards. We had it again from the hon. Member for Monklands, West today. The fact is that the only major services that will be subject to joint boards will be the police and fire services, as at present. They talked about huge centralisation. Again, we had it today from the hon. Gentleman. Again, that is not so. All the major services, with the exception of water and sewerage, which we had clearly flagged as being subject to unavoidable alternative arrangements, will stay with local authorities. The greater integration of services and the decentralisation from the regional level to the single-tier, all-purpose authorities will, in many cases, be the reverse of the centralisation that was proposed.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lang: No, I will not.

Then there was the scare of the great Treasury veto. In The Herald on 3 September the hon. Member for Monklands, West said:

"The Scottish Secretary, Ian Lang, will not be able to deliver the changes because of a Treasury veto."

That was around the time that he came forward with three successive forecasts of extra costs ranging from £400 million to £500 million to £600 million—wrong, wrong and wrong. There has been no Treasury veto and no extra costs. Rather, there will be savings of up to £1 billion over 15 years.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): Does the Secretary of State intend to transfer all existing water services to the new water boards, or does he intend to write off part or all of that debt? What categories of person will he be nominating for those water boards?

Mr. Lang: Those are precisely the kind of points that it is perfectly proper to raise and which we shall consider when we draw up the proposals that we shall bring forward in due course, when the hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity to debate them.

On costs and savings, I was interested to see that Dundee district council estimated that the new arrangements proposed in Tayside would save some £1·8 million per annum. Angus district council, the hon. Gentleman's own authority, estimated a saving of £2·3 million for the same arrangements. In Fife, Dunfermline district council estimated a saving of £8 million per annum from an all-purpose Fife authority, and North-East Fife district council estimated the same. Therefore, there is a cross-party consensus across those authorities on the kind of savings that will be available.

With regard to job losses—another scare raised by the Labour party—it turns out that rather than the substantial number of job losses of which Labour Members spoke, there will be a maximum of some 2,200. If one compares that with the burgeoning employment figures and bureaucracy in local government that I discovered only yesterday—last year alone, employment in local authorities rose by no less than 4,854, a rise of 2 per cent. at a time of recession and public expenditure restraint—one puts into clearer perspective the kind of saving of less than 1 per cent. that it has been suggested will be the result of job losses arising from reform.

Strathclyde's Labour leader surpasses even the hon. Member for Monklands, West when he talks about extra costs and extra job losses and plucks out of the air a figure of 20,000. He might have had some tiny shred of credibility had he argued for one or the other, but he cannot have it both ways. If reform can save 20,000 jobs, local authorities must be inefficient at present, in which case savings—not extra costs—are a certainty.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): If the Secretary of State is so sure that his proposals are right for Scotland, why does not he test them at the ballot box and give Scotland the opportunity of a multi-referendum that could include his proposals for local government? Is not it the case that he will not do that because the proposals would be binned by the people of Scotland?

Mr. Lang: The Government are answerable at the ballot box by elections to this Parliament for everything that we do.

The Opposition have been scaremongering about jobs, costs and other issues that they have raised to create distraction and misunderstanding about the proposals. It is disgraceful that Labour leaders seek only to instill alarm and despondency among local government staff whose interests they claim to protect. Now, as if the palpable failure of all their scares was not enough, the Opposition raise the spectre of gerrymandering. I reject that charge. Our proposals are largely based on the existing building blocks of regions and districts. Four existing regions survive largely intact and many more districts have had their powers enhanced greatly.

By abolishing the two-tier structure and by lifting the baleful socialist shadow which stretches across the central belt of Scotland and far beyond to the outlying areas, we shall enable those areas to break free and assert their own varied political allegiances, whether those may be Liberal, Conservative independent or nationalist. That is not gerrymandering—it is a healthy strengthening of local democracy in all its diversity.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The Secretary of State's last phrase was about the "healthy strengthening of local democracy". He specifically mentioned many cases from the blueprint of the enhanced powers that are to be given to the districts. Does he recognise that neither description can be applied to the highlands, where all existing districts are to be abolished and one council is to cover the region?

The Secretary of State's statement last week laid great emphasis on the way in which he would require decentralisation within the new authorities. He did not emphasise paragraph 3.5 of page 5 of the White Paper, which concerns decentralisation schemes. The White Paper is, interestingly, coloured blue. It says:

"Guidance will be issued to local authorities on how they might develop these schemes but the initiative will rest with the new councils and schemes will not require the approval of the Secretary of State."

What possible satisfaction or guarantee can constituents across the highlands take from that worthless statement?

Mr. Lang: I have considerable sympathy for some of the circumstances in the highlands. I also note the hon. Gentleman's interest in imposing control over local government. I believe that local government should be allowed as much discretion as possible. I draw comfort from the words of the convener of Highland regional council. He has made it abundantly clear how strongly his local authority, like many others in Scotland, is committed to decentralisation.

I was addressing the baleful influence of socialism across the central belt of Scotland and beyond. I suggest that the Labour party is gerrymandering in reverse. It seeks to keep in place the distorted instruments of its unfair hegemony over central Scotland. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. So many hon. Gentleman are rising that no one can hear who wants to intervene.

Mr. Lang: The Opposition do not like the truth—they know how much it hurts.

Under the two-tier structure, Scotland has suffered double jeopardy under Labour. Labour has exercised control, if not through the districts then through the regions, in ways that have smothered local politics and local economies.

Since the Opposition's claims last week—this point was raised by the hon. Member for Monklands, West in his speech—I have checked on some figures. In the regional elections in 1990, the votes cast and seats gained revealed that it took 3,133 votes to elect a Labour councillor, 6,419 to elect a Conservative and even more to elect a Scottish Nationalist. That means that it is more than twice as hard for a Conservative councillor to be elected as it is for a Labour councillor. The picture in district councils is broadly the same, so what we are hearing is not the high tone of principle but the shrill cries of vested interests being dislodged.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way at long last. It was rather unfortunate that he cited personal attacks, probably leaked by the Scottish Office itself to cheap newspapers, in defence of his speech. He said that one should become "adapt" at responding to the facts—I think that he meant "adept". He gave figures on voting at local elections, but will be explain why the Conservative party contests so few seats? Why is it that where it contested seats there seems to be more representation but where it did not field candidates the local authorities seem much larger?

Mr. Lang: I said neither "adept" nor "adapt" when referring to the hon. Gentleman's quotation; I said inept —[Laughter.]—inapt, but I could as easily have said "inept". The hon. Gentleman proves it again.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can we make it clear that we all heard the Secretary of State say "inapt", which perfectly describes his speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If all sides are agreed on what was said, Hansard will have recorded it——

Dr. Reid: Even if there is no such word?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not need any help from the hon. Gentleman. If all sides are not agreed, we shall have to go by what Hansard says.

Mr. Lang: I welcome the Labour party's predictions about the Conservative success that it thinks will flow from the proposals, although the Labour party's attitude is strangely defeatist.

Let us consider what the claim of our likely political success under the new system implies: either it means that thousands of Conservative voters have, in effect, been disenfranchised by the present structure and will now be liberated or that our proposals will be popular and will win support in Scotland. I can face either conclusion with complete equanimity.

I will take no lectures on gerrymandering from any Member of Parliament for Monklands, an area in which one group of Labour councillors stands accused by another group of Labour councillors of showing bias in capital allocations. How does that administration explain the fact that for every £1 of capital resources allocated to Airdrie, £10 is allocated to Coatbridge? We will protect the interests of all residents of all parties in Monklands, and under our proposals Monklands district council will be abolished.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Lang: No, I will not give way because I have already done so many times.

Where do the Opposition parties stand on our proposals for local government reform? The hon. Member for Monklands, West said on television last week that the Labour party was absolutely committed to reversing our reforms. Yet in the House the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) expressed his "great satisfaction at the restoration of a single tier authority for . . . Aberdeen".

The hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) said that he had "always advocated an all-purpose authority for the city of Dundee".

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy) welcomed our recognition in the White Paper that

"Cambuslang and Rutherglen are separate communities in their own right."—[Official Report, 8 July 1993; Vol. 228, c. 478-82.]

The hon. Member for Monklands, West is committed to blocking, frustrating and sabotaging our proposals, yet only last Friday the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities had a productive and constructive meeting with my hon. Friend and myself at which it asked for a further meeting and agreed to co-operate through a working party on finance in studying costings.

Only today in The Herald, under the heading "Labour Councils Smooth Lang's Way", we learn that four councils in the Central region yesterday announced "that they had signed a management agreement designed to smooth the way for the creation of single tier councils in their area."

The Daily Record, which is no friend of the Conservative party, states:

"A giant hole has been blasted in Labour's campaign against Scots local government changes."

Yet it is the chief executives who have made the agreement, although the Daily Record states—so I presume it is true —that they were backed by their political leaders, the council leaders, even though Central, Clackmannan and Falkirk are Labour controlled. That is less than 24 hours after Scottish Labour leaders pledged a non-co-operation pact involving Members of Parliament, the Scottish Trades Union Congress and COSLA. The fact is that the Opposition parties are all over the place, but those local authorities are being a great deal more responsible.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): Perhaps the Secretary of State has not heard that the chief executives of the four authorities, including Stirling which is Conservative controlled, have today issued a statement saying:

"We reject any implication that our actions in issuing the joint protocol provide either support, co-operation, corroboration or agreement with the Government proposals."

Mr. Lang: That is absolutely fine, but the fact is that they are doing it and are being much more responsible than the Opposition, because they care about the delivery of local services in local government. The Labour party's shiny new slogan is "Bring back Strathclyde". If that is how Labour want to fight the next general election, it will be very interesting.

As well as reversing our proposals, Labour has a second policy. It wants to establish a commission, "an independent Labour commission" no less—presumably one which, to quote Harold Wilson, would take minutes and waste years.

We must have some clarification about the commission. Is it the same commission that Labour set up to consider a separate Scottish Parliament, or is it a separate commission? If so, would it not be more sensible to call it a convention to avoid confusion, or is there still a convention in being?

Which will come first—the commission or the legislation to reinstate the two-tier structure? Or will we have both together so that while Labour is legislating to set up the two-tier structure, it will also be setting up a commission to investigate whether it is a good idea to abolish the two-tier structure and, if so, what to put in its place? Perhaps Labour will also tell us how long the commission will take—five, 10, 15 or 20 years. Does it care?

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Would a serious discussion of these matters not at least pay tribute to the considerable, although not perfect, achievements of Strathclyde and Lothian? Will the Secretary of State take it from me, in view of my particular political history, that what he is doing is inflicting grave injury on the Union?

Mr. Lang: I can only say that I profoundly disagree with the hon. Member. I am absolutely convinced that our proposals for the reform of local government will greatly strengthen local government, local democracy and good government in Scotland, which can only enhance the Union.

The real significance of the Labour party's pledge to establish a commission is that, beneath all the fumbling and stumbling, it is committing itself to a single-tier local government structure for Scotland. Usually, Labour's U-turns take about four years; this time, it has taken about four days. If the Labour party is serious about local government reform—its proposal for a commission suggests that it is—all that distinguishes us is disagreement over some aspects of the map.

It is time for the Labour party to raise the tone of its involvement in the debate and get away from its narrow party self-interest. Above all, let us hear some concern from the Labour party about the quality of services on which so many local people depend. A single-tier structure will provide a significant opportunity to improve further the quality and delivery of services. The integration of services that are currently divided between two sources clearly promises improved efficiency and co-ordination as well as cost savings. Housing and social work, or trading standards and environmental health, are just two examples of how better co-ordination can lead to better services.

There are also opportunities through proposals for decentralised management to improve the quality of local government. New authorities developing schemes of decentralisation in decision making, consultation, administration and greater access are going with the grain of local authority thinking. Many are already working on such schemes. There is a widely recognised potential that more can be done. Why should one have to go to Dumfries for the replacement of a broken street light if one lives in Stranraer? Why should one have to go to one council for a council house and to another for a home help?

There are new opportunities in local government in Scotland, but a change of philosophy and a flexible approach—things which the Labour party seems unable to comprehend—are needed to enable local services to be delivered in place of the old, rigid empires of direct service providers. I want to see local authorities liberated. I want to see a new era in which local government becomes a watchword for quality and efficiency. I want local authorities to be a source of pride and loyalty in their communities. I want them to provide exciting career opportunities for those who work in them.

That is the future which Conservatives seek to build for local democracy in Scotland—strong, all-purpose authorities that truly reflect the diversity and the qualities of all the varied parts of Scotland. On that positive note, I urge the House to reject this destructive and negative motion and to support the amendment.

4.50 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I agree profoundly with my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that the Secretary of State's is just the kind of speech and that these are just the kind of proposals that bring the Government and the House into disrepute in Scotland. If there had been any genuine consultation about the way in which the review of the structure of Scottish local government should be conducted, the Government could not possibly have come up with proposals such as those that we are contemplating now.

For example, surely they could not have overlooked the obvious distinction between East Lothian and Berwickshire. East Lothian and Berwickshire have always been, and always will be, distinct entities. The only way round that would be to rewrite the history of Scotland and to bulldoze the Lammermuir hills into the sea. The distinctions between the three counties in the Lothians and the four counties of the Borders could not be clearer. That is the message that I have been getting from all sorts of people on both sides of the Lammermuirs ever since these bizarre proposals came to light a couple of weeks ago.

Indeed, the Secretary of State for Scotland has created certain difficulties and embarrassments for his Conservative colleagues on East Lothian district council. They attended a council meeting in Haddington this morning, where their line was that they had no choice but to accept the Secretary of State's proposals although they opposed the idea of dividing East Lothian. That is their problem.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): This is liberating local government.

Mr. Home Robertson: It is debilitating local government. It is an illustration of the crazy situation that the Secretary of State is bringing about.

Perhaps I should quote local papers in East Lothian and the Borders, which traditionally support the Conservative party. Last week's leader in the East Lothian Courier said:

"A wedding of the two counties would make nonsense of the word 'reorganisation' in virtually every sense, other than the narrow party political interest. . . . Mr. Lang will hear the beat of the tom-tom and realise that the worst criticisms of the Opposition parties are shared by the man in the street, as well as many of his supporters."

South of the Lammermuirs, the leader in the Berwickshire News, which is headed "We must remain in the Borders", said that the proposed amalgamation

"certainly smacks of political opportunism."

Indeed it does.

The Secretary of State is proposing two amazing new local councils to cover my constituency. Both of them would be beyond the political creativity of even the celebrated Governor Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, the man who cobbled together a district shaped like a salamander and gave us the word "gerrymander". At least his salamander was in one piece, with its head attached to its shoulders. The proposed pseudo-Lothian creation is in two separate parts, detached by the Balerno corridor, with my constituents in Musselburgh and Prestonpans mysteriously tacked on to one of the bits. That mystery can, of course, be resolved by taking into account the fact that those parts of my constituency happen to have elected six Labour councillors, who do not fit into the scheme of things as seen by Professor Ross Harper. The remaining part of East Lothian, served by seven Tory councillors and four non-Tory councillors, is to be floated off to Tory-controlled Berwickshire. I wonder why.

What the Secretary of State for Scotland is proposing could be described as a sort of aggravated shotgun marriage. We can cast the Secretary of State in the role of an evil stepfather who could not care less about the welfare of the couple. All he wants them to do is to conceive a Tory council. This will produce some very curious bedfellows.

Dr. Reid: Bed persons.

Mr. Home Robertson: Yes, bed persons. I think of Cockenzie and Coldstream. What else do they have in common? Not much. Political expediency is not a sound basis for the reform of Scottish local government. Nothing like this has ever been done before, and if the House is, for once, to live up to its responsibilities, it must not be allowed to happen now.

Let us have a quick look at the proposed Berwickshire and East Lothian authority. I represented both those counties from 1978 until 1983, so I am very well aware of the fundamental differences in community interests and identity, economic structure and general outlook, between the two sides of the Lammermuir hills. They have always, but always—right back to mediaeval times—had separate local administrations. The new authority proposed by the Secretary of State would be an administrative farce and a geographical joke. The only all-weather link between the two counties is at Dunglass bridge, and the geographical centre of the proposed composite district would be 1,000 ft up the Lammermuirs, on a hill called the Hungry Snout.

Since the political snout of the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Hungry Snout seem to be the only common denominator between Berwickshire and East Lothian, I suggest that, henceforth, the Secretary of State's proposed area should be described as "Snoutshire". "Snoutshire" would be Scotland's smallest mainland authority. The Secretary of State proposes 25 council areas, with an average population of just over 200,000. This one would have just 76,000 people, despite the fact that it is a large, scattered and incompatibly divided area. So, with well under half the average population and a big area, the costs of running a full range of local services, including education, social work, special education and everything else, would be disproportionately high. Thus, there would be either a high council tax or worse services or—most likely—both.

Mr. Dalyell: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Home Robertson: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not give way. I want to be fair to everybody.

I should love to go into the byways about where the headquarters would be. What about the school whose catchment area will be divided by the proposed boundary? I shall not go into those matters at this stage, except to say that what is proposed would be a complete travesty. It is not surprising that all sorts of people in both counties are amazed and outraged. Yesterday I received from a former chairman of the East Lothian branch of the National Farmers Union for Scotland a letter demanding that East Lothian be kept together. In last week's press we read words of a committed local Conservative. Speaking on behalf of the 60-strong East Lothian business group, he said:

"It's crazy. We don't want to see a very good relationship end in this farcical shake-up."

The clear consensus in my constituency is that East Lothian must remain intact, as it always has been. There may or may not be a case for combining our district with a neighbouring district—it is very unlikely that that would turn out to be Berwickshire—but there is no serious or convincing support for the idea of dividing East Lothian in two. The existing district has a population of 86,000—bigger and more logical than the one proposed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Dalyell: Will my hon. Friend give way—please?

Mr. Home Robertson: All right.

Mr. Dalyell: On the question of local services, the Secretary of State, within the hearing of us all, said that when street lights in Stranraer were broken, one had to go to Dumfries. I have telephoned Wigtown district council—the office of Mr. Alastair Geddes—and found that this is absolute nonsense, that these things are done by the client services department, Church street, Stranraer. What we have been given is lies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There may be a misunderstanding or misinformation, but the hon. Gentleman may not accuse another hon. Member of lying. Perhaps he would like to rephrase his comment.

Mr. Dalyell: In the case of Westland, I was turned out of the House five times for having said that Lady Thatcher was a liar. That is now generally accepted—by Sir Leon Brittan and everybody else. I do not want to divert my colleagues by being thrown out again, so I shall refer to this as being economical with the truth.

Mr. Home Robertson: My hon. Friend has illustrated the fact that the Secretary of State knows as little about his own constituency as he does about my part of Scotland or the rest of the country.

I am prepared to accept that there may be a case for single-tier authorities, but I am certain that I speak for virtually all my constituents when I say that I reject the plan to split East Lothian between two freakish, artificial authorities. That sort of carve-up and the Secretary of State's proposals for non-accountable, unelected quangos to run the water industry are a disgrace to the office of the Secretary of State for Scotland. He should take his proposals away, set up a proper independent review and start all over again.

4.59 pm

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson (Aberdeen, South): On Thursday when the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) replied to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State he said:

"we are being asked to consider a White Paper for which there is no consensus in Scotland, no support, no demand".

[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] The hon. Gentleman said that clearly, definitely and with all the authority that he was able to muster.

The House will understand my complete astonishment when I found, on the following morning, that the front page of The Press and Journal carried an equally unambiguous and bold heading, "Aberdeen achieves goal". Given that this is the close season, the paper was certainly not talking about football. Two contradictory statements were therefore issued about my right hon. Friend's proposals, one from the hon. Member for Monklands, West and one from The Press and Journal. With all respect to the hon. Member for Monklands West, I would suggest that The Press and Journal is closer than he is to the thinking of the people of Aberdeen. I am sure that he will correct me if I am wrong, but in his time as shadow Secretary of State for Scotland he has yet to visit Aberdeen.

The hon. Gentleman need not take the word of The Press and Journal for the support expressed for my right hon. Friend's proposals. It has been voiced by all parties and all quarters in Aberdeen. The day after the original proposals were put to the House, the political parties in Aberdeen were vying with each other to try to outdo each other in clamouring to express their support. Not surprisingly, the support started with the Conservative group leader on the district council, Councillor Mike Hastie, who said:

"I am delighted we are to become a single-tier authority again."

That was not any good for the Scottish National party, because its group leader, Brian Adam, pitched in and said:

"I am in favour of single-tier authorities".

The leader of the Liberal Democrat group, John Reynolds, said:

"We are in favour of Aberdeen being made a unitary authority".

The Labour party's group leader and leader of the council in the city of Aberdeen said:

"We welcome the return to being a single-tier, all-purpose authority, which we have been working towards since 1974".

Even the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) said—I concede that he said it rather grudgingly and through gritted teeth—

"There will certainly be great satisfaction at the restoration of a single-tier authority for the city of Aberdeen."

It was therefore breath-taking arrogance and a display of total contempt for the people of Aberdeen for the hon. Member for Monklands, West and his hon. Friends to ignore such statements of wholehearted support from all sides for my right hon. Friend's proposals.

Mr. Robert Hughes: My acceptance of an all-tier authority was not made through gritted teeth. What I did say through gritted teeth and which was widely echoed by people in Aberdeen, including Tom Paine, the leader of the Labour group, was that I regretted the way in which Westhill had been tacked on to the city of Aberdeen. More important than that, however, it is clear that the Secretary of State's intention is to provide a smokescreen with the boundaries; his real intention is to strip local councils of real control and the real delivery of services.

Mr. Robertson: If the hon. Gentleman can contain himself, I shall discuss Westhill later.

It was breath-taking arrogance on the part of the hon. Member for Monklands, West and his colleagues on the Opposition Front Bench to ignore all shades of political opinion in Aberdeen. Such was the arrogance of the hon. Gentleman when he said that there was for the proposals of my right hon. Friend. If the hon. Gentleman can dismiss in a cavalier manner the views of elected councillors of all parties in Aberdeen and those of his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North, over how many other councillors', hon. Members' and people's opinions has he ridden roughshod in his frantic attempt to fabricate a case to help him deny the popularity of my right hon. Friend's proposals?

"no consensus . . . no support, no demand"—[Official Report, 8 July 1993; Vol. 228, c. 472.]

If the hon. Member for Monklands, West were still in the Chamber I would ask him to come to the Dispatch Box to apologise to his Labour local government colleagues in Aberdeen and to the wider community in Aberdeen, political and non-political, for misrepresenting them and ignoring their long-held views in order to score a cheap political point. I am sorry that he is not in his place, but perhaps the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish), when he replies to the debate, will apologise not only to the Labour party of Aberdeen, but to the wider Aberdonian community.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gordon McMaster (Paisley, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: I will not give way. Sit down.

Mr. McAllion: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) is not giving way.

Mr. Robertson: As the debate develops in the coming months, the hon. Member for Monklands, West will be forced to eat his words of last Thursday in respect not just of Aberdeen but of communities throughout Scotland.

Much has been said about the decision to include Westhill in the new Aberdeen city council, to which the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North has already referred.

Mr. Graham: Does the hon. Gentleman realise that an awful lot of Labour supporters may want local government to be reorganised, but only when we have in place a Scottish Parliament? Then the debate would be meaningful and services would not be delivered by quangos, which would be running the cities, in accordance with the Tory plan.

Mr. Robertson: When the Scottish people watch this debate and the arrayed masses opposite, is it any wonder that they consistently vote against a Scottish Assembly?

We have been told that the decision to include Westhill in the new Aberdeen city council is all part of some great Tory plot to increase Conservative representation. If only, if only. Those who talk about Westhill seem to forget that it has no elected Conservative councillors at either district or regional level. In the 1988 and 1992 district elections no Conservative candidates even stood for election. That seems to be a rather perverse form of gerrymandering.

Far from a political manoeuvre, my right hon. Friend has responded to the case made by the Labour-controlled City of Aberdeen district council, whose submission to the original consultation document was approved by the full council, after being rammed through by the ruling majority Labour group. On page 53, that submission says:

"A boundary could be drawn quite tight to the west of Elrick, which is part of Westhill, to avoid including Kirkton of Skene, thereafter utilising minor roads and farm access tracks to reconnect with the existing city boundary at the Leuchar Burn in the vicinity of Mid Anguston. This proposal would enable the lands at Cairnie, owned by the City Council, to be incorported within the City's administrative area."

Paragraph 7.20 of the submission states:

"It may be the case that inhabitants of those areas may not choose to regard themselves as part of the 'community' of Aberdeen, and that individual reasons for taking that view are of greater or lesser validity, but if the economic life of such places as Westhill is inextricably bound up with that of the City, and significant levels of use of the City's cultural and recreational facilities are enjoyed by residents of those places, there may well be a sound case for extending the City's boundaries."

I am sure that Labour councillors on Aberdeen district council will be glad to hear that the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland has said that they are narrow-minded.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that Westhill is in my constituency. The hon. Gentleman and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should take on board the fact that the people of Westhill have not expressed any wish to be included in the city of Aberdeen —quite the reverse. Gordon district has invested heavily in community facilities in Westhill, which the city of Aberdeen may not have done.

Mr. Robertson: The contention that I outlined in the submission from Aberdeen district council suggests that if my right hon. Friend is to be accused of gerrymandering it is Conservative Members who should be complaining.

Mr. Bruce: Answer the question.

Mr. Robertson: I am about to do so. The people of Westhill look to the city and their focus is the city, as I am sure the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) would agree.

The most recent figures produced by Grampian regional council show that, of a resident and economically active population of 3,200, some 2,200 work in Aberdeen. The inclusion of Westhill in the city boundaries is a welcome and long overdue move. It is vital to recognise the role that Westhill and its population play in the life of the city. It is also vital to recognise the corresponding demand placed on city services for which, until now, there has been no recompense.

The including of Westhill also addresses, just as importantly, what Opposition Members would call the democratic deficit, because the people of Westhill have had no say in the affairs of a city that plays such a major and strategic role in their day-to-day lives.

If the hon. Member for Monklands, West had bothered to address such issues as communities and the provision of services rather than playing to the gallery behind him last Thursday, he might have come to some different conclusions. In so doing, he would have spared himself the embarrassment of what followed.

Last Thursday, the House witnessed what the people of Scotland have had to witness for too long: the Secretary of State taking Scotland forward, updating her institutions and preparing her to meet head on the challenges and opportunities of the new century.

Mr. Robert Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We must all be responsible for what we say in the House, but is it in order for an hon. Member deliberately to misquote from a document and not give way to someone who knows something about the matter?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair. Hon. Members are entirely responsible for their speeches and how they quote from documents.

Mr. Robertson: Last Thursday, Labour Members responded, as they are doing now, with gesture politics, showing their inability to grasp the issues of the day or contribute to the debate in a meaningful way. The Scottish people were not persuaded by last Thursday's antics. Unfortunately for the hon. Member for Monklands, West, they laughed at his false rage and were left unmoved by his self-righteous indignation. They saw through the whole thing, as he and his colleagues will soon learn. They resented being used by the hon. Gentleman as a backdrop to allow him to start his re-election campaign to the shadow Cabinet. They resent being used by him in a frantic and grubby attempt to shore up the support of the Scotland United group of Members of Parliament and to win over a few of his, until now, unimpressed colleagues.

Last week had nothing to do with the hon. Member for Monklands, West trying to speak for Scotland or even for the Labour vote, but everything to do with sending a message to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) that he was, even after a year, still one of the boys.

Last week had nothing to do with plans to wipe Strathclyde, Lothian, Tayside or Monklands from Scotland's political map, but everything to do with trying to wipe the smirk from the face of the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish). That smirk appears on the hon. Gentleman's face every time his boss speaks at the Dispatch Box. The Labour party went too far. It treated the people of Scotland with consummate contempt as pawns in its sordid little struggle as it jockeys for positions of power.

Last Thursday my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State spoke for Scotland, which is why the reforms are popular, will work and will last.

5.11 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The voters of Westhill will have noted the patronising terms in which the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) has referred to them. He implied that they should know better and should want to be part of Aberdeen. His argument could be applied to Eastwood's relationship to Glasgow, or even to Portlethen's Stonehaven's or Banchory's relationship with Aberdeen. I doubt whether his logic will go down well in the constituency of the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch).

We also heard the Secretary of State say that, if someone wants a light bulb changed in Stranraer, he must go to Dumfries. As the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, that is palpably untrue. Under the Secretary of State's proposals, that might happen, because my hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) showed that, where existing regions are to remain, it will be up to the regions whether to devolve responsibility. Clearly, the House was seriously misled simply for the sake of cheap jibes and good one-liners, which did not befit the office of Secretary of State.

Given the blatant partisan nature of the proposals, I am not surprised that there has been so much furore about the boundaries. Everyone wants to know what criteria the Government applied when drawing up those boundaries. What is so special about Eastwood or East Renfrewshire that, with a population of 88,000, they can be single-tier authorities, whereas Inverclyde next door, with a district population of 93,500, cannot?

What is so special about Highland, and Dumfries and Galloway, which are both bigger in size and population than Borders, that they should remain intact, while Borders must be butchered to create a council in Berwick and East Lothian to suit the Conservative party's wishes? People might legitimately want a straight answer to those questions, but may not think that they will ever get one.

More important, what is local government all about? We play into the Government's hands if we spend all our time in the next 18 months debating the Balerno corridor or the Eastwood enclave. In his introduction to last autumn's consultation paper, the Secretary of State said:

"The exercise is, after all, not only about redrawing maps. It is ultimately about organising local government to enable it to fulfil its potential as a legitimate and powerful part of our democracy."

I quote those words because the point is succinctly made, not because I attach significance to the fact that it was made by the Secretary of State. It is the kind of phrase that one expects Secretaries of State to put in such a document. One can envisage the Secretary of State writing it, the pen oozing with sincerity, but one knows full well that, when Tory Ministers talk about power and local democracy, they are as genuinely concerned about them as the big bad wolf was when he expressed concern about Little Red Riding Hood's grandmother. They have no concept of what local democracy is about, because 14 years of Conservative government have seen more than 150 measures designed to take powers from local democracy.

When the Secretary of State says that he wants to liberate local democracy, he should own up to the fact that the Government have emasculated local democracy and that the measure is a smokescreen to continue that course.

Even when we find in the document a germ of hope that might mean more power being given to local government, we must wait and see what happens. We are told that there will be statutory confirmation of a local authority's right to become involved in industrial development activities, yet the same paragraph tells us that the Secretary of State will reserve to himself power "to make regulations imposing conditions or restriction on the way in which local authorities carry out this function."

Even when the Secretary of State is giving with one hand, he is taking away with the other.

If this had been a genuine exercise in promoting local democracy, a general competence power would have been given to local authorities, and the Government would have ensured that councils were elected by a fair voting system.

I was delighted to hear the Secretary of State accept that the present system was rubbish, and that it took twice as many Conservative votes to elect a Conservative councillor as it did to elect a Labour councillor. Proportional representation is the fair way to deal with that, not gerrymandering councils. We want a system in which the electorate will judge local authorities' performance, and financial responsibility is enforced through the ballot box, not through ministerial fiat. We want not so much the glossy pages of the citizens charter as a statute setting down minimum standards that are enforceable by the citizen in law courts.

The Government stand most condemned when we consider their case for reform and see what they are saying compared to what they are doing. Today the Secretary of State quoted opinion polls, saying that there was an overwhelming popular demand for unitary authorities.

Let us be fair: having regard to popular opinion in Scotland is a novel approach for the Government. We are not told why public opinion on this issue must be heeded and why popular opinion expressed at the ballot box about the need for a Scottish Parliament is ignored. I suspect that many of the people who responded to the first consultation document in 1991, saying that they wanted a single-tier authority, understood that it would be a single-tier authority with a Scottish Parliament. That is the proper context in which to consider single-tier authorities.

The 1991 consultation document said that the people rejected the present system because "The risk of confusion, which was always inherent in a two tier structure, is therefore increasingly emerging as a serious weakness."

It also spoke of the need to end the "clouding of accountability" and

"the potential for duplication, waste, delay and friction."

But surely the largest contribution to the clouding of accountability has come from the Government's interference in local government. How can a local authority be held to account when so many of the criticisms can be met with the response that inefficiency, nonsense or unpopularity has been imposed by central Government?

I doubt whether the friction between region and district has ever been as great as the friction that Tory Governments have generated between central Government and local government. Which local authority —islands, district or region—has managed to compare with central Government in producing the level of wasteful expenditure associated with the poll tax?

The Secretary of State has found an easy way to ensure that there will be no more clouding of accountability in the case of water: he will end accountability. Yet another quango will spring into life, which will make it easier to transfer the water industry into the private sector when the Treasury demands that that should be done.

The Secretary of State's lack of an answer to a question posed by the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) was illuminating. Will there be another consultation paper to tell us what the three areas are, how the boards will be constituted, what the financial arrangements will be, and whether debts will be written off? In relation to water and sewerage services, the White Paper leaves more questions unanswered than even the original consultation document.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Quayle-Munro will prepare the report.

Mr. Wallace: Quayle-Munro will no doubt be paid a substantial amount to provide another report, which is meaningless.

When the Government were preparing their consultation document, they told us that, although regional councils all decentralise decision-making to some extent, inevitably it is difficult for individuals to find their way around those unavoidably large organisations.

In an open letter to the Secretary of State, Councillor Ross Finnie, the leader of the Liberal Democrat group on Inverclyde district council, has underlined how difficult it has been for Inverclyde residents in the Paisley-based Renfrew sub-region of Strathclyde. However, ignoring local opinion in Inverclyde and community links, the Secretary of State proposes that Inverclyde should form part of the existing unitary sub-region of Strathclyde. Therefore, Inverclyde will experience the problems which he has identified, and which he said in the White Paper would be eliminated.

Citizens in Caithness and in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) will be reassured that, since the publication of the consultation paper last year, when the difficulties were highlighted, Ministers have been persuaded that decentralised decision-making in a large region, if it happens, will no longer pose any problems for the individuals involved.

I am sure that people in Skye, Caithness and Stranraer will conveniently forget, as Ministers will want them to, that the document also stated:

"The individual may consider that the presence of a local office or existence of an area committee will not always be an effective substitute for being able to attend a full council or council committee meeting. In general, therefore, the links with the community seem likely to be closer, and the accountability of elected members more obvious and direct, in an authority which is relatively small."

The one silver lining in the matter is that we might save the north of Scotland railway lines, because councillors and members of the public will have to travel the hundred miles by train to attend the local council meetings.

I shall continue to illustrate the mismatch between promises and outcome. The Secretary of State has done whatever he wants to be done, particularly if it helps to promote the Conservative cause. We have heard the figures quoted by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel).

An analysis of the responses to the consultation document showed that, of 108 responses from south-east Scotland, 105 wanted the continuation of the Borders region or two units which would maintain the present integrity of the Borders region. Three were against: the Conservative group of Lothian region, the Conservative group of Berwickshire district council and one Conservative councillor.

The prospectus published last year stated:

"We will consider carefully all the comments we receive before making decisions about the shape, size and number of the new authorities."

The prospectus failed to mention the existence of the golden share, which is usually in the hands of the chairman of the local Conservative association.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Govan): We are debating an extremely important issue. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government are making no attempt to justify the boundaries that they are proposing, safe in the knowledge that they have a parliamentary majority behind them? Does he agree that the Government intend to drive through these politically partisan proposals, which have no support in Scotland, except among their own ranks? Does he agree that that process will threaten the Union in the way described by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)?

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Gentleman puts his finger on the spot. The Government's proposals go beyond the conventions of an unwritten constitution. I would rather have a written constitution, but we have an unwritten constitution which is bound by conventions. Those conventions have been broken.

It may be argued that constitutional changes have taken place in the past—the Chamber has been the scene of many battles—but history will show that those battles were usually fought over the progress of people's democracy, not shabby little pieces of political manipulation such as those with which the House has been presented today.

Perhaps hope for us all lies in the words of the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), who told the Select Committee on Defence earlier this week that, in two or three years, there might well be a different Government. It would be the ultimate irony if those who seek to defeat democracy are, in turn, defeated by democracy.

Mr. George Kynoch (Kincardine and Deeside): I shall try not to detain the House longer than necessary, as I am aware that many Opposition Members want to speak.

The motion refers to "unnecessary changes", and talks of the lack of general support for the introduction of single-tier authorities. In my district of Scotland, there is a strong wish to have single-tier local authorities, and for a good reason. People want a single-tier local authority which is as near the people as possible and provides services at the best possible cost.

That is not to say that local authorities which have run services to date have not been doing a good job, but circumstances have changed and it is time to evolve. For too long, constituents have been at sea as to whether functions are carried out by regional or district councils. When they encounter a problem, it is passed from councillor to councillor or from department to department —it is not known who is responsible for the service involved.

In the short time that I have been a Member of Parliament, I have realised that, when I hold surgeries and constituents visit me, many of the problems they bring should be addressed to their local councillors. The reason my constituents come to me is because they do not know to whom they should turn, and they cannot be bothered to waste time as the buck is passed from person to person.

[Mr. George Kynoch]

They would rather achieve some action by going straight to the right place initially. Surely that is not what local government is about. Local councils should be accountable, local and flexible, and they should have clear responsibilities.

I represent a largely rural constituency. The problems and requirements of rural constituencies and districts are different from those which obtain in cities. One obvious sector of concern in my rural district is primary school education. In cities, it is possible to rationalise schools and ensure that funds are used in the best way in a new primary school which provides education for as many children as possible. Children may have to travel a distance which seems relatively far in city terms, but which is, in rural terms, a small distance. In rural constituencies, the primary school is often the hub of a local community—educating smaller numbers of children and providing the necessary education to the children of that district. If there is rationalisation, those children will have to travel greater distances.

Constituents in rural districts sometimes wonder whether a regional education authority which includes a city places too much emphasis on the easy option of providing primary schools in cities. It is all too easy to neglect primary schools in rural areas. I have seen that happen in my constituency, where numerous smaller schools suffer from lack of attention, because too much attention is paid to city education.

It would be useful to move towards city single-tier local authorities that are separate from rural districts, so that the problems of the rural outlying districts could be addressed by council members who understand the rural problems and do not have to battle with problems related to the city.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Does the hon. Gentleman believe that city suburbs should be included in cities, as the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) argued? If he does believe in that principle, why should it not be extended to Glasgow as well as Aberdeen?

Mr. Kynoch: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but I do not want to argue about Glasgow. I would rather discuss the district of Scotland that I know much better —my constituency.

There is always a grey area about whether a suburb is part of the city or rural, but a line must be drawn. I appreciate the difficulties that my right hon. Friend must have encountered in drawing some of those lines.

Single-tier authorities will be welcomed by people in cities and in rural areas in which size is important. Rural authorities should be small enough to be local and large enough to be economically viable. We could debate for many hours what is viable and what is not, but, whatever the size of the unit, it must deliver services locally, effectively, efficiently and competitively.

As with any business, the larger the unit, the easier it is to spread overheads and reduce overall cost. That seems to be a better way than subcontracting to provide services, but the obvious risk in doing it that way is that the local touch and the flexibility to provide services with local needs at heart may be lost.

The proposed Aberdeenshire will have an area of about 2,300 square miles and a population of almost 200,000 spread over a diverse geographical area. The White Paper refers to decentralised management and administration about which my right hon. Friend spoke. How will that ensure that decisions are taken at the most local level?

My right hon. Friend spoke commendably about people not having to make long journeys to visit council headquarters. I welcome that, because it embraces the idea of bringing local government to the people. How could that objective be achieved in single-tier local authorities in large rural areas without going halfway to a two-tier system?

When the detail of the Bill is debated, I shall listen carefully to the Secretary of State's explanations. The larger areas must not become dinosaurian, to use the term employed earlier in the week by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), so that the head does not know what the tail is doing. It is a long way from north to south in the proposed Aberdeenshire.

As the Secretary of State knows, I am concerned about the splitting of a local government area that has not been split for at least 170 years. In the 1970s, there was a strong fight in Kincardineshire to keep the area intact so that the Mearns was not separated from Kincardineshire. During the consultation period, nobody from that area who spoke to me favoured being separated from the north and attached to the south.

One of my constituents who lives in Stonehaven wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. She sent me a covering letter and a copy of the letter sent to my right hon. Friend. The covering letter states:

"I am afraid my letter may have been dictated more by my heart than my head. I am, however, Kincardine born, bred and educated. My birthplace was Laurencekirk and my maternal roots are in what is termed the Mearns. I cannot let that area come under the jurisdiction of another authority, where there would be no real interest in caring for what I naturally feel is my heritage.

Since the beginning of local government last century, the county of Kincardine has been responsible for the area stretching from the Dee to the North Esk and over the Slug up Deeside to Kincardine O'Neil. As I have said to Mr. Lang, Kincardine is a family area. It must not be split."

In determining the proposed local authorities my right hon. Friend wants to keep together people who are naturally together. It is fortunate that the White Paper has been presented before the summer recess, because during that time we can ascertain what the people of that area really want. I shall return to the split in Committee.

While I warmly welcome the main thrust of single-tier local authorities, I neither applaud nor condemn the detailed proposal for my area. I seek from my right hon. Friend the reassurances that I have outlined, and I have flagged some areas of concern.

I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's proposals on water. The hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) said that water was a gift of God. He failed to tell us that to get it from God to the human body entails a good deal of capital expenditure on equipment for treating it. When the human body has finished with it and before it passes to the sea, it has to undergo further treatment.

It has been said that capital of about £5 billion will be required over the next 10 to 15 years for Scottish water. My right hon. Friend's proposal will not affect other services, and he has recognised the strong opinion from, I am sure, all constituencies that the people of Scotland do not at this time welcome the prospect of full-blown privatisation. However, those who face facts and appreciate the need to raise funds recognise that private capital must be raised if other services such as health, education and roads are not to suffer.

The proposal for three public boards is sensible. The Government have grasped the local government nettle, and I look forward to the autumn, when we can debate the fine details of the Bill.

5.37 pm

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): The White Paper and the Secretary of State's speech were sad efforts —an exercise in brute force and ignorance, with the stress on ignorance. That was made obvious by an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). The Secretary of State's theme was taken up by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), who has now left the Chamber. [Interruption.] He has moved from where he was sitting. The debate was not improved by the speech by the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch).

I have no fear of the Government succeeding in whatever they set out to do in Scotland. The aim of their hidden agenda is to make the Scottish people lose faith in local democracy. The Government tried to do that through manipulation in England and Wales and they are about to try it in Scotland. Local government elections in Scotland have always had a much higher turnout than those in any other part of the United Kingdom. That is because people take an interest and have faith in local democracy and in the publicly spirited people who seek to represent them.

Who will stop the Government carrying out their purpose? It will be the people of Scotland who will continue to vote in elections because their service aspirations have not been dimmed by past happenings. The Government will also be stopped by local authorities staff in Scotland whose high standards of professionalism and dedication in delivering services have been untouched by Government manipulation and attacks. That will continue to be the case regardless of the attempts to stymie their aspirations by any Government, even Labour Governments in the past, for which we should be rightly ashamed. The individuals who are public spirited enough to stand for local government seek to represent their communities in a public spirited way and that will continue regardless of the Government's manipulations.

I have every confidence that the non-Conservative council will fight on to optimise the services, but not necessarily to maximise them and try to make them as responsive as possible, as it has in the past.

Some of the things that the Secretary of State said are not just a shame and a distortion of democracy, but undermine the very fabric of the Scottish people. They are a genuine threat to the Union, if the Secretary of State thinks that he is defending it.

Local government is not and should never be a matter of geography or based on historic settlements. Some people jump up and down about such issues, but we should not look at them in that way. We need to consider communities as they can generate energy, create self-help initiatives and aspirations and reach out in an articulate way for the services that local authorities should provide.

Whatever local government structure applies under the future Scottish Parliament, and it is consistent that there should be a Scottish Parliament before we have single-tier or any other new authority, it must be judged against objective criteria.

The Labour party is accused of not looking at the future, but I chaired the local government committee of the Labour party in Scotland and we tried to look for those criteria. We did not look at geography but at criteria that would produce a positive result. It is quite clear that we studied the issues more deeply and intelligently than the civil servants have as we produced certain criteria for a Scottish Parliament and beyond.

The criteria are, first, that the local authorities can be properly resourced and achieve the necessary benefits of scale—not necessarily the largest scale but the optimum one. Secondly, they should be able to guarantee a standard and level of service capable of creating an acceptable quality of life and improving the quality of life for those within the council area. Thirdly, local authorities should be accountable and, more importantly, responsive to the needs of local communities and individuals within the council area. The fourth criterion—on which the Government trip up most often—is that those priorities should be applied consistently throughout Scotland. That has not been done in the Government's exercise.

The proposals resulting from the Government's supposed consultation do not reflect any of those criteria. The Government simply fail to do the right thing. The Secretary of State's rubbishing of an objective commission shows how unbelievably patronising to the Scottish people and how parochial and influenced by his party's interests rather than those of the Scottish people he has become. That is a sad fall for someone who I was told was an intelligent person with Scotland's future at heart.

None of the proposals is based on consultation. They are totally inconsistent with the responses to the consultation exercise. Consultation is devalued by asking people what they want and then ignoring what they say.

I want to focus on the bizarre manipulations and the contortions which resulted in what the Government hoped would be Tory enclaves. The image I had was Dickensian. I had Mr. Bumble the beadle, the hon. Member for Eastwood, and Mr. Scrooge, the hon. Member for Stirling, getting together to draw up something more like Dickensian local government than anything that could take us into the future.

As a former leader of Stirling district council for 10 years, I make no apology for focusing on the potential damage that the proposals could do to the quality of life and the services available to people in that district and to future generations there. Stirling district had high-quality services, so we had to have a high tax level to provide district council services, but I suspect that the other mini-councils have the same problem: they do not have the economic base to give them an adequate income to provide the services that are provided at the moment by Central regional council.

I shall not be tempted to draw boundary or geographical conclusions, but after 13 years in local government in Central region and three years outside, I can say that Central regional council delivers a higher level of service in education, social work, roads and economic development, not just absolutely but in terms of pound-for-pound spending and value for money than any predecessor authority and any alternative that has been suggested to date.

[Mr. Michael Connarty]

The spectre of the Tory future which haunts the proposals for new Torylands, as I shall call them, has a particular form. In education, I suggest that there will be either higher local taxes—it is quite clear that the Conservative philosophy will not allow that—or massive service reductions with poorer staff training in education and fewer support staff. If a child in Stirling, Dunblane or Balfron needs educational psychology, he is less likely to get it under the proposed boundaries. Speech therapy and other support services for education such as libraries cannot be provided by small councils such as Stirling without raising the tax base, and that is not likely to be on the cards.

The new Stirling philosophy is likely to offer an alternative. I am told that Stirling district council put a 53-page submission to the Secretary of State. We have seen some of the things that are already happening in Stirling. There will be proposals on opt out. Schools in Dunblane, Balfron, St. Modans and Stirling will be told that, if they opt out of the local authority, they will get a one-off bribe, as they did in England and Wales. They cannot come back to local authorities once they have opted out, so if services start to break down they will be on their own.

The Tory alternative is already known. Community care policies in Stirling and Forth valley have been signalled by the unholy alliance between the ex-Tory councillor, Mrs. Iris Isbister, who chairs Forth Valley health board, and the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth). She thinks that the private sector can provide all the community care necessary for the elderly in my constituency and the others within the Forth valley. They will push those most in need out of the local authorities and force them into the profit-motivated private sector where services will be lower and shoddier and in many cases the cheap, shoddy private sector will be the only option.

I left Stirling in 1990 and moved to my new constituency. Recently, I went back to attend a function in that area and visited some friends in the estate where I used to live. The grass was a foot high. Stirling used to be a shining example of a tourist town. It now has a shoddy, shambolic council. It was so bad that the Conservative councillors were calling for special meetings to force the contractors to cut the grass to the standard that the people expected. There have been cuts in services; recently the solicitor service went out to the private sector with the sacking of solicitors who had given the council loyal service. That spectre haunts people in the Torylands.

I am tempted to encourage the Government in this way as that would be the end of the Conservatives in Scotland. In Stirling they will get rid of the hon. Member for Stirling and they will get rid of the council. The present Conservative Member for Stirling will have a weaker base when people realise that they not only have to put up with him down here but with his philosophies in local services.

I am proud of the fact that, in a constructed constituency, where they took out three mining villages that were recommended by the commission and put in Dunblane and Bridge of Allan, and where there should have been a massive Tory majority, the hon. Gentleman's majority went down to 548 when I challenged him in 1987 and he is hanging on by 700 at the moment. This proposal makes sure that another party will take that seat.

I do not want to be so partisan. I want to recommend to the Government that they do the honest thing, not because I do not want rid of them in Scotland, but because I want the Scottish people to have decent local government. I ask them to turn back, change their minds and bring in a structure that is responsive to people's needs and not about trying to save one or two silly Tory councils.

5.49 pm

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): The Opposition motion would be a joke if it were not in the names of members of the Labour Front Bench. It makes charges of "inadequate consultation", but the fact that 3,500 people were consulted disproves that accusation. The motion criticises also the shortness of time allowed, but there were four months of consultation and five months of consideration—and no doubt there will be 12 months of further debate in this Chamber and in Committee. How much time is needed?

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gallie: It is typical of Labour Members to seek more time, because it is easier to talk. They are not used to making decisions. After 14 years, they do not need to worry about making decisions.

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman did not hear me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's voice was very clear. I am sure that the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) heard the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) earlier and that he does not intend to give way.

Mr. Gallie: The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) said that he would approve single-tier government after the establishment of a Scottish Parliament. Labour has talked about establishing a Scottish Parliament ever since it was last in government in the 1970s. It failed to provide one then and it will still be talking about one well into the next century. A Scottish Parliament is not on the agenda, but single-tier government is—and I approve of that.

I have consistently welcomed single-tier government and that approach was reflected in my comments during the run-up to the last general election. I stated that my aim was the abolition of Strathclyde regional council. At a meeting of Ayrshire chamber of commerce, my political opponents stressed that that was their aim, too. Scottish National, Liberal and Labour opponents wanted to get rid of Strathclyde regional council.

Dr. Reid: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I know that he is a fair-minded man. He mentioned his opposition to Strathclyde regional council. I will not ask him the hard question, which is what it did wrong. As the Secretary of State made disparaging remarks earlier about Strathclyde regional council, I will ask the hon. Gentleman the easy question. Will he name any Secretary of State for Scotland since 1945, Labour or Tory, who had the broad support, democratic legitimacy and backing of more people than any leader of Strathclyde council—from Dick Stewart and Charlie Gray to Bob Goud today? Even though the hon. Gentleman may not agree with them, they had and have more democratic backing than any Secretary of State of any party. Will the hon. Gentleman answer without the advice of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), who is briefing him?

Mr. Gallie: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind initial comment. I accept that there has been strong backing for the conveners of Strathclyde regional council, but the boundaries do not reflect in any way local wishes or aspirations of people outside central Glasgow. That is the opinion also of many constituents to whom I have spoken recently.

Mr. Foulkes: I am one of the hon Gentleman's constituents.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Did my hon. Friend vote for him?

Mr. Foulkes: My hon. Friend's question requires no reply.

The hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) spoke of the legitimacy and popularity of Strathclyde regional council. Earlier, he implied that the Government had paid no attention to the results of consultations. Will he confirm that the vast majority of people consulted in Ayrshire—including the chamber of commerce and Enterprise Ayrshire—were in favour of an all-Ayrshire authority? Few people, and only Tories, were in favour of Kyle and Carrick and no one supported an authority comprising Cumnock and Doon Valley, Cunninghame, and Kilmarnock and Loudoun. That is an invention of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Gallie: I will respond to that point later.—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Opposition Members should show a little patience. I will respond.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State listened to the wishes of the hon. Members for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe), for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) and for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) in trying to bring their areas together. He listened also to voices in my constituency and to me and I applaud that. It is democracy in action.

Nevertheless, we should seek to establish local authorities that recognise local needs and aspirations, whose elected councillors can be seen to be accountable to the electorate and whose administration will be judged on the performance of those councils. We do not want local authorities established on the basis of a state-given right to operate according to ideology and habit. In the central belt of Scotland, that is precisely the situation now.

We heard much from Opposition Members today about democracy and involvement. In the majority of cases across central Scotland, councillors are selected not by the choice of voters but by small cabals within the Labour party—by constituency organisations with, no doubt, considerable trade union input. I am sure that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) is well aware of that.

It is not just council candidates who are selected by such cabals, because they select also committee conveners——

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): The hon. Gentleman suggests that local authority candidates are selected by cabals. Perhaps he will explain how the proposals will change that. Also, what kind of cabal selected the hon. Gentleman as a parliamentary candidate?

Mr. Gallie: The party organisation in constituencies such as that which I serve presents a candidate to the electorate, but ultimately the electorate do not vote according to ideology and habit but on the case that is presented to them. They are offered alternatives. My right hon. Friend's proposals address that important option.

Labour wants to protect party interests. It is not interested in democracy but in the power of the party—a truly socialist tradition. The local government debate has for a long time concentrated on that aspect and it is time for change. That change is reflected by my right hon. Friend's proposals, which recognise that local interests must at all times be to the fore.

The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley referred to the representations made by Ayrshire. I remind him of his own previous comments—particularly those about Enterprise Ayrshire, which he accused of concentrating mainly on Irvine and Kilmarnock interests. If we opted for an all-Ayrshire authority, it would be dominated by Irvine, Kilmarnock and—probably—Cumnock influences. That would not be good for my constituents in Kyle and Carrick.

Most of those consulted about the proposals have stressed the need to consider the local aspects. I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has taken that on board in Ayrshire's case. Let me, however, raise three specific points with him. First, I received a letter today from a group purporting to represent the interests of children's education in Glasgow. That group fears that nursery education will cease to exist following the demise of Strathclyde regional council. In Kyle and Carrick, one nursery school must serve 80 per cent. of my constituents. If that represents good service from Strathclyde region, I look forward to the day when we in Kyle and Carrick can take on our own responsibilities.

I have some sympathy for my former colleagues in Cunninghame, North. The north coast of Cunninghame was always alienated from Strathclyde and, to some extent, from Irvine. I know that my right hon. Friend intends to meet local councillors in the not-too-distant future; I hope that he will accommodate them, but I fear that, if he does, Opposition Members will simply accuse him of gerrymandering.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): I am puzzled by the hon. Gentleman's remarks. Is he seriously suggesting that, when the Secretary of State meets Tories from the north of my constituency, he will reach an accommodation that will satisfy their specific wishes without taking account of the wider concerns of all north Ayrshire—and, indeed, of all those who are to be lumped in with the crazy authority of that name, which will stretch all the way to Auchinleck and other areas? Will the hon. Gentleman adopt a less parochial outlook and recommend an all-Ayrshire solution, based either on a single council or the existing districts? He cannot make sensible pleas for Tories in the north of my constituency without presenting a more general format. In saying that, I speak for people across the political board in my constituency.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Such long interventions prevent other Opposition Members from speaking.

Mr. Gallie: I speak for my constituents and their right to a voice in local government. They need to be able to influence their councillors and to take account of their actions. It is up to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) to decide how best to represent the interests of his constituents. I understand that he has argued for an all-Ayrshire authority in the past, but perhaps I am wrong: perhaps he has argued for the retention of Strathclyde region. I leave him to look after his own interests, but I am aware of anxieties in a part of his constituency with which I have a great affiliation.

My third point involves community councils. [Interruption.] I have given way on a number of occasions, allowing my own time to be used by others in lengthy interventions. Hon. Members will just have to listen to the rest of my speech.

The Government are considering extending the involvement of community councils in planning and licensing. That is a great step forward for local democracy. Members of community councils do a grand job in looking after local interests and their voices should be heard. The need for funds for such councils should also be considered.

I believe that the Secretary of State's proposal for three public authorities to deal with water is well worth implementing. It will fulfil all our requirements, providing high quality, constant volume and lower costs in the long term. In recent years, Strathclyde region has ignored Ayrshire's sewerage needs time and again; I trust that, following the establishment of the new public authorities, those needs will be given appropriate priority and Ayrshire will have a proper sewerage system.

Many of my constituents have complained about the link between water charges and the new council tax banding valuations. I hope that, with the new structure, different charging arrangements will be introduced.

6.5 pm

Mrs. Irene Adams (Paisley, North): I promised my hon. Friends to speak for no longer than five mintues. The fact that I have had to listen to 20 minutes of drivel from the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) reflects the current imbalance in the House: 11 Conservative Members can take up all the time, while 62 Opposition Members must scramble for the few minutes that remain.

The Government's proposals do not surprise me. After all, at the last election they asked the Scottish people to vote for them if they supported the status quo. Only 25 per cent. of Scottish voters did so; 75 per cent. said, "No—we do not support the status quo."

The Government chose to ignore that 75 per cent., just as they ignore everything else that matters. They do so at their peril: they are now endangering democracy in Scotland. Their manifesto contained no proposals for water privatisation, but it was the first thing they mentioned when they returned to power. The Scottish people will not be fooled by the way in which privatisation is being introduced through the back door.

I defend Strathclyde regional council. It irked the Government because it got it right. The Government should ask people in the former Tory counties—in the old Renfrewshire and Argyllshire areas—about the condition of their roads before Strathclyde region was invented. They should go up to the islands, and ask people in Colonsay what social service provision was like when Argyll controlled the council. Strathclyde has been efficient and successful; it has given services to areas that never had them before. The Government have opposed the council because it was democratically elected.

My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) asked about the power of the Secretary of State. A Tory Secretary of State for Scotland was last elected with a majority in 1955. Strathclyde convenors have all been elected with vast majorities, as have those of Renfrew district council.

Apparently, Renfrew district council is not big enough to be the sole authority, although the area contains 206,000 people. Down the road, Greenock—in the Inverclyde district—contains 93,000, but apparently it is not big enough either. A new council representing 88,000 people is now being proposed for Eastwood: apparently Eastwood is big enough. The other council represents a population of 256,000, including—funnily enough—four elected Labour Members of Parliament. The proposed Eastwood council has one Tory Member of Parliament. What has the Secretary of State for Scotland done to justify that? He has taken poor old Barrhead, which has never voted for the Tories, and lumped it into Tory Eastwood.

The Secretary of State has also taken the only Tory ward—Ralston—from my constituency and put it into Eastwood. He will have a job on his hands when he tries to justify to the people of Ralston why their children will no longer be able to go to Paisley grammar school.

When the grammar school issue last raised its ugly head the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), was there, right out in front, telling people that he had the right to speak because children from his constituency went to Paisley grammar school. But it will be in a different council authority. Paisley grammar school will have to take children from Greenock, Wemyss Bay, Gourock and Erskine before it is allowed to take children from Ralston.

If that is not the case, can the Under-Secretary tell us what new financial arrangements will be made to allow council boundaries to be crossed so that children from Ralston can go to Paisley grammar school? The people of Paisley, Greenock and the surrounding areas pay for these services. Is the Under-Secretary telling us that they will have to pay for children from Eastwood to go to the grammar school, while children from Ralston, who live not half a mile away from Paisley grammar school, have to go to school in Barrhead? There is no direct bus link from Barrhead to Ralston.

According to the Secretary of State's proposals, the people of Ralston will have to look to Eastwood for all their services. If a street light is broken, they will have to go six miles to Eastwood and ask the council to fix it. But there is no direct bus service from Ralston to Eastwood.

There is no geographical or historic reasons for setting up the Renfrewshire councils. Half the areas that have been taken in were part of the old Renfrewshire county council, but so was Renfrew. Renfrew, though, votes Labour, so it is not going into the new Eastwood council. It is staying with the other council. The only reason for all this is political gerrymandering—setting up a Tory safe haven in Eastwood to protect the hon. Member for Eastwood.

Mr. Brian Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): I am absolutely opposed to the Secretary of State for Scotland's proposal to reform Scottish local government, as outlined in "Shaping the Future—The New Councils." This is the latest episode in a systematic and concerted attack on the powers of Scottish local government which began when the Tories first came to power in 1979.

It must have been a surprise to anyone reading the document to find that the Secretary of State had committed himself to setting up effective and efficient local authorities. For any council to be effective and efficient, it requires, first, powers to initiate change that have not been emasculated by central Government. Secondly, it requires money so that it can provide efficient services to the public whom it is meant to serve. After 14 years of Tory Government, Scottish local authorities are neither effective nor efficient.

Despite the Secretary of State's assurances in the White Paper, Scottish councils will see their powers further eroded by any reform of local government that is initiated by a Tory document and presided over by a Tory Secretary of State with a hidden agenda which still, even after all his announcements, includes water privatisation and the extension of compulsory competitive tendering. The Tories' hidden agenda is still very much in being. Nothing that was said last week takes away from the fact that the Tories still intend to privatise Scottish water.

The major criticism of the Government concerns the wholly undemocratic way in which the reorganisation has been carried out—not by a commission, as in England and Wales, but by the Secretary of State and his cronies on the Treasury Bench. He has ignored the repeatedly expressed demand of the Scottish people for an assembly. He has compounded that error by denying the Scottish people at least a quasi-independent commission to determine the structure of Scotland's local government. The only area of change allowed for in the document is to be found in paragraph 1·4 which states that the Local Government Boundary Commission for Scotland will be able to review the boundaries if an anomaly arises.

I urge the Government to look at Ayrshire, for a start. How is it possible, according to that document, to have a north Ayrshire and a south Ayrshire when Skelmorlie in the north is in the same authority as Loch Doon? It is utter nonsense. It is hardly surprising that my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) spoke as he did earlier.

The financial implications of the Secretary of State's reforms are so highly subjective as to be meaningless in any serious analysis of the proposed changes. Any reform of local government, even the abolition of Strathclyde regional council, which the Secretary of State has decided on, will result in the additional expenditure of hundreds of millions of pounds of Scottish taxpayers' money in the midst of an economic recession.

In the House the other night, Tory Members of Parliament said that the Government are bankrupt. The White Paper makes it clear that the Scottish Office, too, is bankrupt of ideas.

The implications of the proposals are that there will be job losses in areas where jobs are already in short supply. It is wrong to use local authority employees as political footballs. Any reform of local government based on the Secretary of State's proposals will, by its very nature, create democratic deficits in the accountability of many existing local government functions. A reduction in the number of local authority units will result in decisions being taken further away from, not closer to, the people.

That unaccountability will be made worse by the inevitable introduction of joint boards and quangos, whose members will be appointed by the Secretary of State, who has announced that the police, fire and water authorities in Strathclyde are to cover the same geographical area. Why does he not consider setting up a second tier of local government to cover those functions, which would then be the responsibility of directly elected representatives? What is wrong with that?

Those who are appointed will not be democratically elected councillors. They will be given only the power that the Secretary of State decides that they ought to have, according to his vision of Scottish local government. The proposals will further erode the already limited powers that Scottish local authorities have used to protect their people from the worst excesses of successive Tory Governments.

My reasons for opposing any change in the structure of Scottish local government are clear. The cost and the disruption that will be caused cannot be justified. The face of local government in Scotland will be changed for ever.

To be more specific, what will happen to the wind-up programme for the new towns in the area that I represent? In my case, that factor is critical to the well-being of Irvine new town. When will the Secretary of State answer that important question? Why is that subject not addressed in the consultative document? It is not in the White Paper at all and that is wrong.

Any reforms will simply be perceived by the Scottish people as political navel-watching at a time when the real problems in the country should be addressed. There are 300,000 unemployed in Scotland and thousands of homeless, yet the Government have decided to review local authorities.

Mr. Gallie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Donohoe: The hon. Gentleman had 20 minutes—I have only 10 minutes.

Any review of Scottish local government must be undertaken in conjunction with the establishment of a local Scottish Parliament. Without that underlying principle, any reform of Scottish local government will certainly be temporary. The Secretary of State should understand that.

The Scottish people have repeatedly voted yes for reform and how we are governed. However, in voting yes, they reject the Tory philosophy completely. I reject the proposals, as do the majority of those who responded to the consultation. I reject the need for any reform in Scotland at present.

6.20 pm

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): The Secretary of State for Scotland has attacked the Strathclyde region on several occasions. He should remember that there are many dedicated men and women who have served Strathclyde region since it was created by a Tory Government. He did not complain too much about Strathclyde regional council when he used it to gather the poll tax. He let that local authority take the brunt of the abusive attacks caused by the Government. At the end of the day, they had to do a U-turn.

The Secretary of State should also remember that welfare rights officers were appointed in Strathclyde region to protect the poor and those who needed protection. Many men and women in my constituency got a great deal of benefit from the advice given by those officers. Some of them were former soldiers who gave six years of their lives and did not see their friends come back. They were denied their right to services of Government Departments until Strathclyde stepped in. [Interruption.] I wish the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) would shut up. I listened to his speech—he said absolutely nothing. His constituents would be ashamed of what he said. The more he opens his mouth, the more he puts his big foot in it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) made a good point about Argyll. I was a full-time union officer in Argyll when Strathclyde took over. It was clear to me that the workers in Argyll had had to suffer at the hands of Argyll council, which was a penny-pinching authority and denied the workers their basic rights. Some of the workers had no protective clothing. The road men had no bothies in which to store their tools—they had to store them in their homes. Many of the workers said that they were glad that a Strathclyde union was coming in because they would at least get national wages and conditions and many were able to go on and be promoted. Under Strathclyde, people who worked in Dunoon were able to get promotions in places such as Greenock, Paisley and Glasgow.

It is easy for me to have a go at Strathclyde region. But if—God forbid—these proposals get through the House, some people will say, "I wish that Strathclyde was back again".

Reference was made to Tories objecting to these proposals. I am proud that I served on Glasgow district council before I came here. John Young was a councillor on that council. He was a leading Tory—no one could say that he did not defend the Tory party on that council. Lo and behold—John Young is a Glaswegian who has a great love for the city of Glasgow, and the Secretary of State cannot deny that as soon as the Tory proposals came out, John Young was one of the first to say that they are absolute rubbish.

Let us examine the accusation of gerrymandering. No matter what we call it, it is ludicrous when people who live in the Toryglen area will have to go to Hamilton for their services, although some of them live nearer the city chambers than I do. The Secretary of State will say that I am wrong about that because at one time Toryglen was not in the city of Glasgow.

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Glasgow, Rutherglen): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Martin: I will not give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. McAvoy: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Member to give way to an hon. Member who has knowledge of his own constituency, of which the other hon. Member has no knowledge?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): The hon. Gentleman is well aware that it is for the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) to decide whether to give way.

Mr. Martin: This is not simply another hon. Member's constituency. The White Paper says that the proposal is for the city of Glasgow. I am entitled to comment on a proposal that will take a place that has been part of Glasgow for a long time—Toryglen—and put it into south Lanarkshire. The logic of the Minister's argument is that at one time Toryglen did not belong to Glasgow. Springburn, Keppochhill and Maryhill did not belong to Glasgow at one time. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray) does not belong to Glasgow—he stays outside it. Perhaps if he came in, we would get more population. We need a decent population in the city of Glasgow if we are to stay in a city that gives employment to most of the constituents of my hon. Friend.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): I well understand the strength of feeling of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) because of his experience in local government. When we look at the empty Conservative Benches, there are few Tories because the Scottish electorate rejected them.

As we heard in an earlier ruling from the Speaker, at the end of the day the customs and conventions of the House and the English majority will force the proposals through against the wishes of the Scottish people. The Tories cannot get the democratic mandate of the Scottish people, so they use this manoeuvre to force through their policies, which the Scottish people vote against, and deny Scottish democracy. We should be trying to restore that democracy.

Local government provides a wide range of essential daily services through its councillors and elected officials. It fulfils a highly democratic function in our society by allowing people to participate in local decisions. It also provides a vast pool of expertise and professional, trained, qualified and experienced staff giving a proven service to our local communities.

Scottish local government has a proud record over the centuries for supplying services to our local communities and that is precisely what is at stake in the White Paper. The Secretary of State for Scotland has served his country well and, undoubtedly, England will be suitably pleased with him. However, Scotland has nothing to be pleased about.

This short debate is only one small protest in what will surely be an ongoing debate for days and years against the Government's political chicanery. I will be brief but my anger goes deeper than this debate will allow. From the poll tax fiasco to Rosyth and Ravenscraig, the Tory roll of shame in Scotland is long and the Government have the gall to add this political deceit to it.

The Government's plans are irretrievably rushed. There has been no real consultation on these fundamental changes. [Interruption.] If this rabble would shut up, they might learn about the Labour party's record in Government. There is an obvious contrast between the royal commission in 1969, followed by legislation in 1973, and the condensed timetable offered by this Government. In fact, the previous review of local government started in 1963. It took a total of 10 years from the commencement of the review to the final enactment of legislation. The Scottish Office published its present consultation paper in October 1992 and invited submissions up to January 1993.

Wheatley undertook visits, held meetings and seminars with academics and experts, and placed public notices in the press inviting both oral and written evidence. He commissioned studies and even had an intelligence unit aiding the previous reform of local government. All that suggests that that remit was taken very seriously. If the previous reform took over 10 years to gestate and then failed, what serious chance has the present rushed reform of lasting anything like the 20 years of the previous reorganisation?

There has been no attempt to match communities to the new local government units, which are merely political conveniences for the discredited Tory party. The English get a commission, the Scots get gerrymandering. Like the poll tax, Scotland once more will be the Government's guinea pig. There has been no attempt truly to involve local government officials or the public or councillors before the structure of the proposed change was decided by central Government.

The Government's proposals are fundamentally flawed. There has been no community of interest locally between Kincardine and Angus, or between Perthshire and Angus. There has been no community of interest through employment or through local government practice. The proposals have been introduced irrespective of past and present work, or social and historical patterns. That approach is being mirrored throughout the country; the proposals are for the pure political convenience of the Tory party and not the result of the will or wish of the people.

The previous Scottish local government reform, which was given all the promises that we have heard from the Government tonight, lasted less than 20 years. Before that, reforms lasted for 50 or even 100 years. The new reform looks as though it will last even less time than the 1973 reform, because of the way in which it has been introduced and because of its substance.

The rush to legislate simply guarantees a period of instability, unemployment and the disruption of daily services. The Government have clearly forgotten the cost of chaos and the reality of running parallel authorities from the past local government reform. Why should the reform occur through silly gerrymandering and an effort to govern by deceit?

The Scottish people clearly rejected the Tories at previous elections, yet the Government are now inflicting those rejected policies and philosophy through a series of unelected and publicly unaccountable quangos. There has been an attempt to bypass the democratic process in Scotland. The boundaries have not been agreed and discussed with local communities, but are simply a civil service solution produced under the direction of the Tory party.

The local service proposals are the ultimate sell-out. They represent privatisation through the back door with stealth, through the creation of an unelected, unaccountable quango. The Tories who were rejected by the electorate are now ruling Scotland by a whole series of such unelected and unaccountable quangos—the opposite of democracy.

The process by which the Government issue a consultative document, only then promptly to ignore the results, is also the opposite of democracy. They prefer proposals that are overwhelmingly rejected by the Scottish people. Public pressure has forced a retreat from outright privatisation of water, as the Government originally wanted, but that has resulted in privatisation by two sips rather than one gulp. Scots want local-government-run water services, not the quango-controlled system nominated by and under the direction of the Secretary of State.

I noticed that the Secretary of State was careful to give us absolutely no details of what the legislation will entail. I hope that he changes that by telling us what was in the Quayle-Munro report and exactly what the Government have in mind.

Every customer in Scotland will await price rises, existing staff can expect disruption and redundancies, and we shall get all that is unnecessary and unwanted in both local government and water services.

The local government restructuring is different in kind and nature. There has been no real consultation, no royal commission, and no cross-party consensus, except among the people who opposed it. I reject with disgust the gerrymandered boundary reorganisation and the theft of Scotland's water resources. I seek in its place a strong, autonomous local government system, based on true local communities and founded after close consultation with those communities.

Any review must meet three important criteria. Scotland must receive equal treatment. If there is a commission in England, there must be something similar in Scotland. There must be maximum consultation that reflects the views of the Scottish people, and there must be democratic control over education, police and fire which must not be switched to central Government quangos.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Welsh: No. The hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench spokesman wishes to wind up.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is winding us all up.

Mr. Welsh: It is a pity that the hon. Member is not wound up by what I am saying.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am finding great difficulty in hearing the hon. Member for Angus, East.

Mr. Welsh: May I say to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) who is trying to intervene, and to all the hon. Members making a racket behind me, that it is no use going through the motions of having photo calls outside 10 Downing street. Scotland expects more than that. That technique failed for Rosyth, it failed for Ravenscraig, and it will fail again because of the nature of the House. It is time that the Labour party joined others to ensure that Scottish views prevail.

Scotland has every right to feel betrayed by the Government's botched, unfair and undemocratic proposals. It is time that Scots united to ensure that the proposals are defeated.

6.38 pm

Mr. Henry McLeish (Fife, Central): We do not need any lectures from the Scottish National party about defending Scotland's interest in the Chamber. May I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Labour party has 49 Scottish seats and the SNP has a miserable three seats, and its work rate is nothing to commend it?

The Secretary of State today treated local government in Scotland with maximum contempt. It was a disgraceful speech that did not address the key issues. It was a knockabout speech, at a time when we deserve to know why some of the decisions in the White Paper were made. More importantly, why is the Secretary of State willing to ride on the back of the rantings of his Back Benchers over Monklands? He knows that he has the power to set up an inquiry. He should either put up or shut up on that issue.

The debate has exposed the organised hypocrisy masquerading as government in Scotland, and it has explained why the Conservatives are so deeply unpopular there. Only a rump of Tory Members, led by a ragbag of Tory Ministers, could have produced such a dog's breakfast and called it a reform. The reform of local government is irrelevant to the needs of Scottish people, damaging to the people who depend on its services and dismissive of democracy.

The Secretary of State must shoulder much of the responsibility for the mess. Why is he plumbing new depths of political dishonesty? Why is he unwilling to distinguish between the interests of the Conservative party and the interests of the country? The democratic credentials of the Secretary of State now lie in tatters. He failed in Rosyth, he has failed in local government and he has failed on the issue of water. How many failures does he need to have before he reconsiders his position?

Much of the debate has concentrated on the Tories and their gerrymandering of boundaries. We have heard pathetic excuses that the proposed action is not gerrymandering, but good government. We know that, if there is an Operation Safe Haven and the only real people who are consulted are Tory Members, one ends up with a gerrymandered map of Scotland, which carries with it all the responsibility of the governing party.

The key question is what criteria were used to gerrymander the boundaries of East Renfrewshire, Berwickshire, East Lothian and Stirling. Did they use history, geography, culture or a bit of economics? The criterion was simply the vested interests of the crew on the Government Benches, who could not care about the wishes of Scottish people and who will now do everything from that base position of 16 per cent. to win any credibility they can.

We hear the Government lecture us about the vested interests in local government. They mean the 300,000 employees who, every day of the week, provide some of the best services in Europe. If that is a vested interest, I and my colleagues will speak up for them. If our councillors, who do such sterling work, are another vested interest, I have no doubt that I and my colleagues will be willing to stand up and be counted. What is utterly disgraceful is that the Tory party stands up for its own vested interest and is unconcerned about what is happening around it.

This debate is a watershed in Scottish politics since 1929, because we have never in that period had a major reform of local government which has smacked of contempt and of a lack of concern for those who are the beneficiaries of the service. We know that there is no case.

What is the justification for this massive upheaval? There is no consensus. How on earth can the reforms endure? My hon. Friends have made the point that one cannot sustain the reforms without a consensus in which every political party and every section of Scotland is committed to them. No one will be committed to the proposals. They will not endure, because the Government have ignored the basic tenet of democratic politics, which is to arrive at a consensus. If there is no consensus, my hon. Friends will not be committed to the proposals. The proposals will have no credibility, and the people of Scotland will have little confidence in proposals that do not have that consensus.

My hon. Friends have raised the question of a commission. Even the English have a commission. Why has the Secretary of State declined to give the Scots a commission? Why will the Government not put the matter to an independent test—to an independent commission? We should be happy to contribute proposals to such a commission. Why does the Secretary of State not do the same? We know the reason. The proposals will introduce a corrupted map of local government. The proposals are all about the Conservative party, and if they were exposed to the light of an independent commission, they would simply be shown up for what they are.

The other key issue raised by the proposals is constitutional change. If we had a Scottish Parliament sitting in Scotland——

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: You will not have.

Mr. McLeish: We will.

If we had a Scottish Parliament, Scots would be allowed to look at their own boundaries sensibly and sensitively, and they would be able to draw up a future that they wanted—not a future that satisfied the Conservative party, but a future that would take local government into the next century and would carry on the proud tradition of the previous 100 years.

If there is one part of the proposals that smacks not only of gerrymandering but of manipulation, it is the section dealing with costs. The Government have brought comic farce to financial accounting in the proposals. The Government took on Touche Ross. The National Audit Office in Scotland is now interested in carrying out a study into why £50,000 of taxpayers' money was spent on such a flawed exercise. The first exercise came up with transitional costs and on-going costs over five years, but the Government did not allow that. It was suggested that there might not be any savings, but that there would be substantial costs.

What did the Government do? They went back to Touche Ross and the civil servants, and came up not with a five-year period, but with a 15-year period. They paraded around at the weekend saying that they would save £1 billion up to the year 2010. Why not 3010, in which case the figure would be £6 billion? Why not 4010, in which case the figure would be £12 billion? What an utter absurdity. The fact that we have been asked to participate in discussions on the White Paper on the basis of those bogus figures is a scandal of massive proportions. We dispute the figures for savings, because there will be none.

There is no disguising the fact that, in the next three years, £200 million of costs will be incurred. Where will the money come from? It will not come from the Treasury. The money will come from services being cut and from the council tax being increased. Will the Minister tell Scotland that our present council tax levels will be safe in Tory hands when the reforms take place? They will not be, because the council tax and cuts in service will pay for this collective madness.

A lobby is here today. We want the Secretary of State and his Ministers to reassure the 300,000 Scots who work in the service about their future. We want those workers to know, unlike the workers at Rosyth, that they have a future, that they will not simply be disregarded. Who on earth believes that only 2,200 people will leave the service over the next few years? Again I ask the Secretary of State for a reassurance for servants who have made a valuable contribution to the quality of life in Scotland. All the proposals add up to no case at all.

What about services? We have heard much talk about all-purpose authorities. Those all-purpose authorities will be multi-purpose authorities, because there will be a degree of centralisation unprecedented in Scottish politics. There will be commercialisation and then joint committees. Struggling beneath that will be the so-called "all-purpose" authorities. That is astonishing. They certainly will not be all-purpose authorities as the Government pretend.

If there is one issue above all others on which contempt has been heaped, it is the discussion about water. Many of my hon. Friends have made the point that we are at a halfway house towards ultimate privatisation. That is clear. We shall have three boards. Why three? No one has given us a reason why there should be three. Why not have six, or one? No details are given in the three paragraphs out of the 30 pages.

We are being softened up for the privatisation of water. The first step is centralisation, which will be followed by privatisation. No Conservative Member will mention the F-word—franchising. The word does not appear in the White Paper. Why not? There is no escaping the conclusion that the Government are moving surely and steadily towards the sell-off of Scottish water. It may not happen next year, but that is their intention. Scotland will not be fooled by the utterances and bogus reassurances it has received from Ministers.

If all of that was not bad enough, there is the point, which many of my hon. Friends have made, about the democratic deficit. Deep down in the debate is the question of costs and the question of consensus, but there is also the fundamental question of democracy. Democracy is being undermined by services being transferred to the marketplace and to the Scottish Office.

We are seeing an attack on the balance between local and central Government which is essential to the constitution. We are seeing a system being corrupted, and being made more unstable and more vulnerable to commercialisation and privatisation. We in Scotland are proud of our deep sense of security and our deep sense of collective provision, which are in danger of being abandoned irreversibly by the Government.

The proposals are unwanted, unnecessary, undemocratic and uniquely irrelevant to the people of Scotland. They deserve no support in the House, and we will certainly not support them. We will oppose them at every opportunity.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): We have had a most enjoyable debate. The hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish)—I shall come to his more serious points later —continued his customary rant and scaremongering. I shall deal at the outset with his point about local authority staff. We estimate that reorganisation could lead to a reduction in total staff numbers of 1 per cent. That is against a background in which local authority staff in Scotland last year increased by 2 per cent., which puts the matter into context.

A number of positive points have been made in the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) pointed out that every group leader in the city wanted a single-tier system and wanted the city of Aberdeen to be a single-tier authority. My hon. Friend asked the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) for an apology to the city of Aberdeen; an apology has not been received.

Mr. McLeish: Will the Minister accept the challenge that I offered the Secretary of State? He keeps referring to Monklands. He has the power to set up an independent inquiry. Will he put up or shut up?

Mr. Stewart: I thought I was talking about Aberdeen, but I can express some hope for the hon. Member's interest in Monklands. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) is interested in serving on the Standing Committee, and no doubt his extensive researches on Scottish local government will be available to hon. Members.

Several hon. Members: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Stewart: Not at the moment.

My hon. Friend rightly pointed out that the accusation of gerrymandering in relation to——

Mr. Wilson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It seems to me that the Minister has sought to pre-empt the work of the Committee of Selection, and has done so by referring to matters that are clearly extraneous to the contents of any Bill. I hope that you will draw the matter to the attention of the Committee of Selection.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister is responsible for his own speech, and no Standing Committee is involved in this debate. [Interruption.] Order. So far, I have had great difficulty hearing what the Minister has had to say.

Mr. Stewart: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that Opposition Members will give me the chance to develop my speech. I repeat that I said that I understood that my hon. Friend the Member for Dover might be interested in serving on the Committee. That does not pre-empt any decision of the Committee of Selection or of anyone else.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South rightly answered the charge that the Government are somehow gerrymandering through the proposal to bring Westhill into the city of Aberdeen. He rightly pointed out that Westhill does not have a single Conservative councillor at either regional or district level, so that accusation cannot be sustained.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch) reminded us of the importance of rural areas. He underlined the common sense of the proposals in the White Paper that city authorities should be surrounded by strong rural authorities where the interests were quite different.

My hon. Friend expressed his concern about particular boundaries, as did a number of Opposition Members. Frankly, it would be surprising if the Government produced a set of proposals on boundaries which received immediate and universal acclaim, because people differ.

Mr. Wallace: I think the Minister accepted that there has not been exactly total acclaim for all the boundaries that he has proposed. What level of opposition will he take account of in amending boundaries? What size of petition and what kind of opposition will he take as evidence that what he is proposing is unacceptable to a local community?

Mr. Stewart: First, we have had a period of consultation. Secondly, that will be a matter for Parliament to decide. I assure the hon. Gentleman that there can be legitimate differences of view on boundaries, but my right hon. Friend and I will take seriously the points that are made to us in the Committee.

Mr. McAvoy: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. Does he accept that the regional ward of Kings Park Toryglen, which it is recommended should be included in south Lanarkshire, is more than 50 per cent. Rutherglen and Lanarkshire area and more than 50 per cent. Rutherglen and Lanarkshire population? Bearing in mind his last statement, will the Minister also assure me that he will accept it from me, as the Member of Parliament for Toryglen, that I want that area to remain part of the city of Glasgow, where it has always been and should stay?

Mr. Stewart: I am grateful to the hon. Member. I assure him that we shall listen to people such as himself when there is a constituency question. Then we will consider whether appropriate changes need to be made during the passage of the Bill——

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Stewart: No. I have given way a number of times, and I have to sit down in a few minutes.

I welcome the excellent speech that my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) made on behalf of his constituents, in which he pointed out the importance and relevance of the Government's proposals for the best interests of his constituents. I had hoped that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) would pay a tribute to the council that he represents, which is generally recognised to be——

Mr. Graham: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My colleagues and I wish to object that we have not been able to put our point of view to the Secretary of State about our objection to the inclusion of Toryglen in our area.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that as many hon. Members as possible have been called in the time available.

Mr. Stewart: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps the Committee of Selection will choose the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) for the Committee, and he will doubtless have many hours to put forward his point of view.

I had hoped that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland would say that—on the basis of his experience as a constituency Member—although he might disagree with some of the boundaries proposed by the Government, there was a strong case for single-tier authorities.

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): No.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) is remonstrating. I will give way to her if she wishes. She walked out of the Chamber last Thursday, throwing the White Paper back to the Secretary of State—I am grateful for that, because we are running low on copies. The White Paper implements the views of Argyll and Bute for a single-tier authority based on Argyll and Bute.

Mrs. Michie: The Minister should know from our submissions to the Secretary of State that the Scottish Liberal Democrats have always been in favour of single-tier local authorities, but with a Scottish Parliament. [Laughter.] If Conservative Members care to read the submission, they will understand why.

While the Minister is talking about Argyll and Bute, I welcome the fact that it is to be a single-tier local authority, but it will be interesting to see the result of putting Helensburgh, which has no historical link with Argyll, into that area.

Mr. Stewart: The independent council and polls in the Helensburgh area are overwhelmingly in favour of that.

We turn next——

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Stewart: I regret that I cannot give way. I have only three or four minutes left.

I turn next to the Scottish National party. The hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) says that there is no support for the Government's proposals. I refer him to the following statement in The Press and Journal of 30 June:

"I will be very pleased if, as the information available indicates, the council will be retained."

His hon. Friend the Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) made that statement. She clearly supports what the White Paper proposes.

Mr. Welsh rose——

Mr. Stewart: I cannot give way.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has made it clear that he is not giving way.

Mr. Stewart: I have given way on several occasions. The hon. Member for Monklands, West refused to give way.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central is normally meticulous in his research on such matters, and he mentioned costs. I was surprised that he did not refer to the submission from his regional council. Perhaps I should remind him of what that submission said.

Mr. McLeish indicated dissent.

Mr. Stewart: Has the hon. Gentleman not read the submission of his own council? Dear me, that is not very good. It strongly supported the retention of the kingdom of Fife, and that Labour regional council argued that a single-tier Fife council would produce annual savings of £4·9 million, as opposed to transitional costs of £5·5 million. It argued that the total savings over a longer period would be more than £42 million at net present value.

Those are not the Government's figures, but figures produced by a Labour authority which is going to continue in the single-tier system. That is a good example of how much nonsense has been talked by Opposition Members. When they consult their local councillors in a number of areas, they will find that many Labour councillors, such as the convener of Fife, support what the Government are saying. Does the hon. Member want to hear what he said? The hon. Gentleman will find a constructive response from the councils in Central region, as my right hon. Friend pointed out, in marked contrast to the slogans that we have heard from hon. Members today. We do not know whether the Labour party wants a commission or whether it will reverse the proposals, if elected. The Labour party has no policy; we have the policies. I commend the Government amendment to the House.

Mr. Tom Clarke: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister says that he does not know whether the Opposition support a commission. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am having great difficulty hearing what hon. Members have to say. If we cannot hear in this Chair, we cannot conduct the business properly. I call Mr. Tom Clarke, and I hope that it is a point of order.

Mr. Clarke: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister said that he was not aware whether the Opposition supported a commission. May I through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, point out that it is clear in the motion before the House that we do indeed support a commission?

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the publication of the White Paper "Shaping the Future—The New Councils"; and considers that its proposals will lead to better and more efficient local government in Scotland, based on a single tier of strong and accountable all-purpose authorities.

Debt, Trade and Development

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.14 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to move,

That this House, noting that the indebtedness of the Southern world now exceeds £1,000 billion, which both cripples their development and holds back economic growth in the Northern world, and noting the failure of the G7 Summit to agree any new significant programme of debt relief or to ensure any adequate place for developing countries in future world trading patterns via the GATT Uruguay Round, calls upon the Government to prepare a new British and international initiative for debt write-off for the poorest countries, and also to take the lead in setting out a trading framework which will ensure that developing countries can play their full share in the world trading system and will promote environmentally sound development.

For the developing countries throughout the world, the G7 summit in Tokyo last week was not merely a disappointment; it was a cause for real despair. The situation in most of the third world, and certainly the poorest parts of it, is extremely serious and getting worse, not better. The G7 summit merely washed its hands of it.

It is not simply that indebtedness in the southern world now exceeds the astronomic level of £1 trillion—£1,000 billion; it is rather that debt levels are not falling, but increasing at an accelerating rate. According to the World bank, the increase in indebtedness in the past two years alone has been nearly £300 billion, which is equal to almost half Britain's entire gross national product.

It is not simply that the share in world trade of the poorest continent, Africa, has been falling over the past decade; it is rather that the protracted depression in world commodity prices, on which the poorest countries absolutely depend, makes their economic recovery impossible.

It is not simply that aid-flows from western nations—most notably Britain—have fallen sharply over the past decade and are continuing to fall, with overall resource flows to sub-Saharan Africa, for example, the poorest part of the world, estimated at 8 per cent. lower last year than in 1989; it is much rather that the flow of funds has gone into reverse. The southern world now pays Britain more in debt repayments than it receives in aid, with a net inflow into the United Kingdom in 1990 of £2·5 billion.

On all three counts—debt, trade and aid—the situation of the third world is clearly rapidly deteriorating and must now be a priority for international action. However, the indifference of the G7 summit to the steadily evolving disaster in the south, despite the fact that it also holds back recovery in the north, is matched only by the unreadiness of the British Government to deal effectively with any of those looming disasters.

I take debt first and foremost as it is the most important. I make it clear that I commend the Prime Minister on his initiative as Chancellor in 1989 in proposing the Trinidad terms for a two thirds write-off of debts for some of the poorest countries. I say that without qualification. It was a very useful initiative. But we must put that in perspective. It has applied to only 14 countries.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): It applies to 17 countries. I shall clarify that later.

Mr. Meacher: I am grateful for the correction. That is a marginal and welcome improvement.

The £1 billion write-off that it has secured, of which the United Kingdom's share is just £65 million, represents less than 0·1 per cent. of total third world debt. That puts it into perspective. Since the Prime Minister originally proposed it, £1 billion has been written off, but the total debt burden has increased by some £400 billion. The effect of the Prime Minister's initiative has, therefore, been extremely limited. No one could deny that. Some might say it has been infinitesimal. Indeed, the British Government have been far more concerned with paying money to British banks to protect them against possible default on their world debt than they have been to provide debt relief to third world countries. According to the Government's figures, between 1987 and 1992 the Government handed out £2·25 billion—more than the entire annual aid budget—in tax relief to United Kingdom banks against the possibility that debtor countries might default on their debt service obligations, although in fact they have not done so.

As a result of the Finance Act 1986, British taxpayers have been forced to pay huge sums to bail the banks out of a crisis which, frankly, was partly of the banks own making, when not a penny of that money has been passed to third world countries to relieve their debt. We now have the totally indefensible situation in which the Government are heavily subsidising United Kingdom banks against possible debt default, and none of that money is helping the poverty-stricken indebted countries. Yet, as the Minister said in answer to one of my questions on 15 February, from 1987 to 1991

"net payments to United Kingdom banks from developing countries over the last five years"—[Official Report, 15 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 5-6.]

totalled £4·8 billion. That is an absolutely stunning figure. How can the Minister and the Government conceivably justify it? I do not know whether the Minister wishes to intervene to answer that. I do not want to go through what happened the other night, but I shall give him the opportunity to respond if he wishes to do so. He obviously does not wish to respond, but we will expect an answer later.

Although the Trinidad terms make a tiny contribution, they do not begin to match the enormity of the problem. Over the past decade, Africa's debt has more than tripled from 28 per cent. of GNP to 109 per cent. In other words, Africa now owes more than its entire annual income. Many sub-Saharan countries, the poorest of all, and including those now embarking on post-war reconstruction and which need assistance, such as Mozambique, Ethiopia and Eritrea, owe three times their national incomes, or more. Zambia, for example, where the average wage is $300 a year, owes $1,000 in debt for every man, woman and child.

When debt reaches those astronomical levels—and they are astronomical—it is patently unrepayable. Yet for the G7, including Britain, to ignore that not only snuffs out indefinitely the prospects for recovery for much of the southern world but undermines growth prospects and job opportunities for the northern world.

For the past four years—I do not think that this statement needs qualification—the Government have done nothing new to deal with the mounting debt catastrophe. In trade, the G7, including Britain, is scarcely serving the third world any better. The protection of northern markets by northern countries costs third-world countries an estimated £100 billion a year. That, of course, does not count the damage caused by common agricultural policy food exports being offloaded on to world markets. The sums for trade greatly exceed the total of official aid.

Of course, I am the first to accept that the Uruguay round of GATT will bring benefits to the third world, but the poorest countries under the existing arrangements are still likely to be worse off. They will often be unable to take advantage of new market opportunities, yet they have to open up to foreign competition. The relative value of their current trade preferences will be reduced, and fledgling service sectors in the third world may be wiped out. New rules on intellectual property will make technology transfer and economic development more difficult.

Above all, I emphasise the fact that GATT will not tackle the commodity crisis, which is at the heart of the developing countries' problems. Their indebtedness escalated in the late 1980s because they were caught in the trap between plummeting commodity prices and soaring interest rates. What is unforgivable is that Government policy, like that, I admit, of other donor countries, makes the problem a great deal worse by supporting structural adjustment programmes which hinge on making poor countries export more. When, under pressure, they export more, they of course contribute to oversupply and thus drive prices down still further. How can the Government continue to support trade policies which reinforce the vicious spiral of poverty and decline, which is what has been happening for several years?

On aid, the G7 summit agreed that development assistance should be enhanced. I welcome that conclusion, but the Government have made no commitments to respond. I do not think it is difficult to see why. Britain's record on aid—to put it no finer—is thoroughly depressing. Since 1979, Britain's official development assistance has fallen from 0·5 per cent. to 0·3 per cent. of GNP. Last year, the Government spent less than the Development Assistance Committee average and less than half the United Nations target of 0·7 per cent. of GNP. I am well aware that the Government insist that they will hit that target as, I suppose, the English cricket team does, although the latter are more honest about their likelihood of reaching the target.

The Government's aid budget is still being cut, and it fell last year. I can give the Minister the figures if he is in any doubt. These are Government figures. Last year, the aid budget fell 4 per cent. in real terms and is now only three-quarters of the level of aid spending in 1979. Worse still, of course, is that the Government are proposing a two-year freeze on aid which even the Overseas Development Administration admits will knock a further £150 million off the aid budget. When the lower purchasing power of the pound after the black Wednesday devaluation is taken into account, it is more probable that the cut will be nearer to £250 million.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am always amazed by some of the statistics with which the hon. Gentleman is briefed, because they are always at complete variance with my figures. I wish to make two points. The aid programme has risen in real terms by 10 per cent. since 1987-88.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): What about the past 14 years?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I said since 1987-88.

Mr. Meacher: What about last year?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The hon. Gentleman says last year, but I am talking about the previous six years. Let me answer. The budget for the financial year 1993-94 has risen 1 per cent. in real terms when compared with last year.

Mr. Meacher: Listening to the Minister's weasel words, one might assume that the Government came to power in pieces and that the ODA only gained power in 1987. I remind him that the Government came to power in 1979. Since then there has been a large fall in aid levels of about 17 per cent. in real terms. The Government have done just about everything in the book to downgrade the aid programme. They have pensioned off the Minister with responsibility for aid to another place and have left the hon. Gentleman in charge in this House. After his performance in the debate two evenings ago, I will forbear to comment further as it is all there to read in the record.

The aid programme has been almost halved. It is now being frozen. In the next decade, up to 40 per cent. of it will be passed to the European Community's aid programme, which the Government have always said is inferior in quality. Much of the rest is now being transferred from the dirt-poor south to the much better-off eastern Europeon and former Soviet Union countries, and the remainder is subject to an increasingly restrictive political and economic conditionality, which is often counter-productive. Short of demanding that, in future, aid be given only in exchange for donations to the Tory party, I do not see what more the Government could do to downgrade their aid programme.

If the Tories were really concerned about aid and development, if they really cared about a vision of one world, there is a very great deal that they could and should do now.

On debt, they should prepare a new debt relief package for the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World bank and for the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers. This should propose debt write-off of 80 to 100 per cent. for the very poorest countries, whose debt, in any case, is manifestly unrepayable. The Trinidad terms should be revised to grant debt relief on the whole stock of debt—not just, as at present, on the debt falling in the next three years or incurred before a cut-off date. The Government should come forward with a strategy to reduce multilateral debt. I might add that 91 per cent., I think, of the indebtedness of sub-Saharan Africa is multilateral, not bilateral. Thus, this is a very important area, in respect of which we need a new strategy. We need a strategy to halt what is now a net transfer of resources to the IMF—either through a new issue of special drawing rights or through the sale of IMF gold stocks.

On trade, the Government certainly should, and could, be much more helpful in the renegotiation of international commodity agreements in order to tackle what I have described as the worst aspects of the commodity crisis. They should, and could, explore ways of helping to compensate the developing countries for the losses that they face under the GATT agreement, and they should support the African diversification fund, as proposed under the United Nations programme of action for African recovery, with a view to promoting the desperately needed switch into processing.

On aid, the Government should support the demand of the non-governmental organisations that official development aid to sub-Saharan Africa in 1994-95 be increased by at least £100 million. If the Minister is concerned about where the money might come from, I suggest that the aid could well be paid for by reducing the subsidy to the banks against non-existing default. The Government should also give a commitment that United Kingdom aid to sub-Saharan Africa—the poorest part of the world—will continue to increase, in real terms, during the life of this Parliament.

Finally, if the Government are really concerned about aid and development, as the Labour party is, they will drop this dog's breakfast in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and set up a Cabinet-level department of international development, as Labour is pledged to do. That would give the handling of these issues the political clout and the administrative weight that they urgently need. It is on those grounds that I strongly commend the motion to the House.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): I beg to move, to leave out from 'House' to the end of the motion, and to add instead thereof:

'noting the problems of indebtedness and restricted trade access in hampering the growth of developing countries, welcomes the agreement by the G7 countries in Tokyo to consider improved debt reduction terms for the poorest and most indebted countries, including the possibility of earlier action on reducing the stock of debt on a case by case basis in accordance with the Prime Minister's Trinidad Terms initiative, to make all efforts to enhance development assistance, and to seek to achieve a successful Uruguay Round before the end of the year.'.

I try to take the comments of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) seriously, but so often I find that his gift for exaggeration and his thrashing about in so many directions completely destroy the impact of any point he might be trying to make. I shall make a few overall comments, during the course of which I hope to give some reply to the hon. Gentleman's words. As he said, I am the Minister responsible for defending the Government in respect of aid matters. However, as hon. Members know, this debate is not just about aid; it is very much about trade and debt and about sensible policies in the developing world as well. As it is about trade as well as aid, my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade, who is responsible for these matters, will reply to the debate. He will be able to give the House some enlightenment in addition to my comments about the recent Tokyo summit and the prospects for the GATT round.

The Tokyo summit paid very close attention to the problems of the developing world. Quite contrary to the emphasis that the hon. Gentleman sought to attribute, the fruits are contained in the economic declaration. I strongly advise the hon. Gentleman to read that declaration more carefully than he can have done so far, so that he may recognise the force of what I am saying. In any case, I shall illustrate the point by further argument in the course of my remarks. First, I should like to say a few words about the Tokyo breakthrough on trade liberalisation, which is also of great importance to the developing world.

For the past four years the G7 summits, in their communiqúes, have called on the international community to work for the early completion of the Uruguay round.

[Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd]

In previous years that call had gone unanswered. This year the situation was different: the summit acted as a catalyst for the consensus on market access in certain key areas reached by the trade negotiators in the four areas known as the Quad—the United States, Canada, Japan and the European Community. This was a great sticking point in the whole process of the GATT round. To have overcome it means that the prospects for agreement on the GATT round by the end of the year are greatly enhanced. That will be enormously to the benefit of the developing world.

This is a crucial building block of the elements that will need to be put in place in Geneva by all the participants to ensure a successful conclusion to the Uruguay round. As I have indicated, that success is crucial to the developing world. The reason—and this is the context in which the debate should be placed—is that developing countries earn three times as much income from trade flows as from aid. Trade is essential to the developing world. [HON. MEMBERS: "Of course."] Hon. Members say, "Of course." They too are stating the obvious. Let me say what I think is very important, even if they find it obvious.

Success would give a terrific boost to the world economy. There would be renewed confidence in investment overseas. In specific terms for the third world, the restrictions placed on subsidised agricultural exports would give developing countries a better chance to compete at home and abroad. Such a prize will be within our grasp in Geneva in the coming months, and we intend to keep up the momentum until there is a successful resolution.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I shall give way very briefly, but I am conscious of the fact that many hon. Members want to speak.

Mr. Battle: The truth, which did not come out at the summit, is that the GATT round will leave the poorest countries worse off. As the relative value of their trade preferences declines, they will be forced to open up their markets to foreign competition, but they will not be in a position to enjoy the advantages. Therefore, their trade flows will be in the opposite direction. Why was that not appreciated at the G7 summit?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: If Opposition Members truly believe that, it is clear that there is a fundamental divide between us. I utterly reject that sort of thinking. Let me explain why. [Interruption.] I do not simply assert that. If I am given a chance, I will explain why.

I reject that thinking because the annual volume of world aid to the developing world is $60 billion. The annual volume of world trade to the developing world is worth three times that amount, $180 billion. The GATT round will increase world trade benefit to the developing world by $90 billion. That is half the trade figure that I just quoted and it represents a gigantic boost to the trading and economic prospects of the third world.

If we pursue that point any further we shall end up arguing about matters that we shall unable to resolve and all that we shall be able to do is to identify that there is a disagreement between us.

Mr. Worthington: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Yes, but for the last time.

Mr. Worthington: This is a crucial point. Can the Minister tell us whether the manufactured or processed products of the third world will now be allowed into our markets without any problems? At present, tariffs must be paid on processed goods from the third world. Have those restrictions been swept away by the G7?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The G7 is not an implementing body, but a debating one. We have, however, carried the argument about trade restrictions a stage further. The hon. Gentleman must accept that Britain, and the Conservative Government in particular, cannot be faulted in wanting to relieve the world of restrictions in trade. At every forum and at every opportunity, we seek to reduce the restrictions on world trade.

The multi-fibre arrangement was discussed at the Tokyo summit. We are arguing for further liberalisation of that arrangement, which will help the third world. I will say more about that if I can get on with my speech.

Mr. Worthington: So the answer to my question is no.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question could not be yes. Of course all restrictions were not removed by that meeting in Tokyo. As I said, the G7 is not a decision-implementing body, but one in which matters are debated and arguments taken further forward.

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): May I recommend to Opposition Members that they read the book prepared by the Overseas Development Institute, which provides detailed information about the GATT round and is extremely careful in its assessment of the impact of that round? It came to the conclusion that the third world would benefit from the GATT round.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that extremely helpful intervention, which will enable some Opposition Members to learn rather more about the subject. Even if they do not agree with the judgment given, they will come to appreciate that a large body of extremely respectable opinion shares my view—a view that my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) has also confirmed.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am not frightened of giving way, because I have given way every time I have been requested to do so, but if I continue to do that I shall deprive hon. Members of sufficient time for debate. I will give way just once more.

Mr. Enright: Which commodities coming from the least developed countries will benefit from GATT?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I intend to say something about the multi-fibre arrangement in a moment.

It is the view of the Government and of many thinkers on the subject that increased trade is the central key to development. It enables developing countries to increase their own living standards. Development involves a partnership between the developed and the developing world and a comprehensive approach is needed.

Four essential elements are required to help the poor of the world. As the hon. Member for Oldham, West highlighted, it is important that aid is well targeted. A debt strategy is also important. I hope that I shall be able to demonstrate to the House that that strategy was taken a stage further by discussion at Tokyo. The other overwhelmingly important element is trade and investment by other countries in the poor countries. [Interruption.] The figures demonstrate how important that is. That is not my blind assertion—it is backed up by the figures that I gave the House just a few moments ago.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West could have tabled a question at any stage to find out how many countries had benefited from the Trinidad terms. He asserted that 14 countries had benefited, but, so far, 17 countries have. I believe that the hon. Gentleman also said that $1 billion of debt had been written off, but in fact $2 billion has been written off.

Mr. Meacher: About £500 million quid.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The hon. Member for Oldham, West was kind enough to congratulate the Prime Minister, and I am grateful to receive the compliment on my right hon. Friend's behalf. I should like to go further, because without a shadow of doubt Britain has led the way in promoting international agreement on debt relief for the poorest developing countries. That debt relief was at the personal initiative of the British Prime Minister and, as a result, $2 billion of debt has been written off. What was significant at Tokyo, however——

Mr. Worthington: What about commercial debt?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I shall come on to that, but give me a chance. I shall not shirk the questions that I have been asked, but, as always in such debates, there is an awful lot of chuntering coming from those on the Opposition Front Bench. I am hardly being given a chance to answer the questions that I am asked.

We have long argued that more needed to be done and we are therefore delighted that the Tokyo summit called on the Paris Club of Government creditors to reconsider the issue. I am especially pleased to note that, for the first time, the possibility of action, case by case, on reducing the stock of debt was raised, again in line with the Prime Minister's original proposal at Trinidad in 1990. The stage is therefore set for building on the consensus of the seven participants at the summit for further concrete proposals within the Paris Club.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Oldham, West has been reasonably patient because I am about to discuss two issues that he raised—net flows and commercial debt. The figures from the OECD—[Interruption.] Opposition Members are always grinning. If only they would get some facts—listen and get some facts.

The figures from the OECD, which are much more comprehensive than those from any other source, for net resource transfers show that developing countries received £31·4 billion more in 1991 than they paid out. That figure confirms the encouraging recovery of recent years in resource transfers to developing countries.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West referred to the southern world. I do not know whether he was referring to sub-Saharan Africa or to the more general region. Sub-Saharan Africa is repaying the IMF more than it receives in new money at the moment. The IMF is not withdrawing from Africa, however, because it plays a vital part in catalysing financial flows from elsewhere. It is anxious to help the countries of sub-Sahara to meet their technical and financial needs. The IMF flows are only a small part of the total aid.

Sub-Saharan Africa has consistently received more than it pays out when aid, foreign direct investment and other sources are included. In 1991 it received £6·95 billion, nearly £7 billion, according to World bank figures.

Mr. Worthington: They cannot be true.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I will write to the hon. Gentleman with the references so that he can check the figures in the relevant publications. If he does not have a copy of them, they are, of course, in the Library.

Some developing countries, particularly in Latin America, owe a significant proportion of their debt to commercial banks. It is not for our Government, or any other Government, to encourage, much less force, banks to cancel debt. That would deter them from lending to developing countries ever again in the future.

Nevertheless, a tremendous amount of progress has been made multilaterally in reducing those debts. Some 90 per cent. of major debtor nations' bad debt is now covered by a commercial debt relief deal. The hon. Member for Oldham, West will be aware of the Brady plan, for which the United Kingdom has provided its share of finances, which helps debtor countries and banks to reach voluntary agreements on commercial debt reduction.

The International Development Association also helps low-income countries to reach agreements with banks on commercial debt reduction. We are an important contributor to the IDA, which also gives concessional loans and uses IDA reflow to meet debt service obligations on old World bank loans. I am happy to have answered the hon. Gentleman's points in that regard.

Mr. Meacher: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No, I shall not give way again. I have given way four times in this short debate. Not only Opposition Members but several Conservative Members want to contribute to the debate and I do not see why I should prevent them from doing so.

The summit considered measures to help eastern and central Europe and the former Soviet Union in their transformation from command to market economies. That matter is of great importance for world stability, which is affected by any instability in the former Soviet Union and eastern and central Europe. The summit welcomed Russia's renewed commitment to economic reform, which has made possible a $1·5 billion drawing facility from the IMF's new arrangement, called the Systemic Transformation Facility. A new programme worth $3 billion to promote privatisation and restructuring was also put in place.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway), who takes an interest in population, is in the Chamber, I register the importance of population. It should be registered on every occasion, but not dwelt on as I have already debated it with him. That issue was raised in Tokyo and I am pleased that the importance of helping developing countries to deal with the problems of population growth was recognised. The international conference on population and development taking place in Cairo next year will provide an opportunity to address those issues again.

[Mr. Lennox-Boyd]

The hon. Member for Oldham, West made much of the need to help the poorest in the world and I appreciate his concern. In our efforts to promote development, the poorest have been the focus of our attention. Action on trade and debt is essential for developing countries' prospects but many of them, especially the poorest and most vulnerable, will continue to need access to concessional finance for the foreseeable future.

Our aid is part of an overall international effort and has helped to bring about progress—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Oldham, West must look at the facts, not simply assert what he wishes or believes to be true. No one wants to be complacent about the matter, but let us get some facts clear. In the past 25 years, many developing countries such as Korea, Malaysia and Sri Lanka have seen a substantial rise in their per capita income. We do not give aid to Korea or Malaysia, but the aid that we give to Indonesia always irritates the Labour party. Those countries have improved the lot of their people. Life expectancy has risen and adult literacy has increased.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West described the Tokyo summit as an event not of disappointment but of despair, which overlooks the progress that has been made and should be recognised, even though the picture is not completely bright.

The problem of sub-Saharan Africa is a cause for concern. The hopes of many African countries have not been realised, but even there progress has been made with countries such as Botswana, Mauritius and Ghana, which reap the benefits of the right policies. I am pleased that Africa's problems were fully recognised at the summit. We now look ahead to the international conference on African development taking place in Tokyo in October, which will consider the problems and solutions in more detail. Africa is a priority in our aid programme and nearly 50 per cent. of our bilateral aid goes there.

It is important that developing countries should have the right policies to combine with the liberalisation of trade and the aid that we give them. To be effective, aid must be properly targeted and used in the right context, which means that developing countries must get their policies right. Those policies must support economic growth, encourage enterprise and allow their citizens to play a full part in economic and political life. That is why the focus of UNCED in Rio last year, on a national commitment to sustainable development, was so important.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West mentioned the problem of commodity prices. Of course a problem exists in commodity prices, but I support the Government's opposition to commodity price support stabilisation measures, which set artificially high prices, or in other cases distort market trends. There is no easy solution to commodity prices in developing countries, but the solution must remain diversification and not continued over-reliance on volatile commodities.

The effectiveness of our aid programme has been widely recognised, even if the hon. Member for Oldham, West is not prepared to give it that credit. Elements of quality include its focus on the poorest: 80 per cent. of bilateral aid goes to countries with per capita incomes of less than $700 a year—[Interruption.] I cannot take sedentary interventions the whole time. I have responded to many of them——

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No, I cannot allow any more interventions. I have given way four or five times and I shall not do so again.

Our programme is highly concessional. All new aid to the poorest is on grant terms, which avoids adding to their debt burden. We have the most rigorous criteria—economic, technical and environmental—to ensure the quality of the programmes and projects that we support. Our aid is well targeted on areas of key relevance to the central aim of sustainable development, as was recognised at UNCED.

Long-term aid has helped some developing countries to create the right climate for economic growth and investment by providing incentives and support for reforms. Aid cannot do it all, however. It is enormously important to accept the argument that a comprehensive approach to the problems is needed—an argument that was stressed at the summit. A comprehensive approach bringing together trade, debt relief and well-targeted bilateral and multilateral aid is the way to help the developing world.

I was deeply disappointed with the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. I was also deeply disappointed with the terms of his motion. So far as I am aware, the motion was received only very late last night, but it looked as though it had been written long before anyone went to Tokyo. It is remarkable that the objectives that the motion complains were not achieved in Tokyo were in fact achieved in Tokyo.

Mr. Meacher: Such as?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I will tell the hon. Gentleman. As I said, the economic summit is not a decision-making organisation, but the Prime Minister secured agreement on the call to the Paris Club to reconsider introducing improved debt reduction terms for those countries in greatest need. The hon. Member for Oldham, West states in his motion that the G7 summit failed "to agree any new significant programme of debt relief".

He is wrong. He goes on to state that the G7 summit failed "to ensure any adequate place for developing countries in future world trading patterns via the GATT Uruguay Round".

Developing countries stand to gain from increased and fairer flows of trade, which will result from the Uruguay round. The hon. Member further states that the Government should "prepare a new British and international initiative for debt write-off for the poorest countries".

We have no need for new initiatives as we have the Trinidad terms—the initiative launched by the Prime Minister. The rest of the world is beginning to accept the arguments that we have deployed over the years for an extension of the Trinidad terms. We are taking the initiative. We have pressed for that initiative. The hon. Member's motion is absurd.

Mr. Meacher: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Do not spoil my speech. I shall not give way as I have given way to the hon. Member several times.

The hon. Gentleman said that the Government should take the lead in setting out a trading framework which will ensure that developing countries can play a full part in the world trading system. The key to achieving that aim is to pursue with vigour the chance to conclude the GATT process and to increase the trade of the poor world by $90 billion per year.

The British Government have pushed for some time for the phasing out of the multi-fibre arrangement, and the incorporation of trade in textiles into the general agreement on tariffs and trade as part of the Uruguay round. That will improve developing countries' access to our textile markets.

I urge the House to consider those matters. It should consider the context of the aid in the correct dimension of a wider context which contains all the factors involved, and reject the motion.

8 pm

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I shall start by confessing to the House that during my long time here I have never discovered how to be in two places at once. I have an engagement which will prevent me from listening to the entire debate, but my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has kindly offered to do so. Therefore, I owe the House the courtesy of being brief. I shall deal with the issues of aid, trade and debt in that order.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is one of the most exasperating Ministers to follow in any debate. I have listened for 38 minutes to a speech which had, at the most, 18 minutes' worth of content. The Minister is so nice that he keeps interrupting himself—the asides and diversions prolonged his speech. He asked Opposition Members to stop asking questions, to stop chuntering and to stop grinning. He stopped short of asking them to stop breathing. Everything that the Opposition did appeared to prolong the speech. The Minister's most revealing aside was when he confided in us that he agreed with Government policy. That fact is worth highlighting in yellow in Hansard.

There was an exchange of statistics on aid and, as so often happens in this place when the Government and the Opposition exchange statistics, both were correct, but they were trading different ones. Sadly, in 1992 our official development assistance fell from 0·32 per cent. to 0·31 per cent. of gross domestic product. We moved away from the United Nations target, instead of moving towards half the United Nations target. That fact is incontrovertible.

As the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said, since 1991 our overseas development aid budget relay assistance budget has fallen by 4 per cent. The Minister countered that by saying that the budget for 1993-94 shows an increase of 1 per cent., which is splendid, and if we add the two together there is a net decrease of 3 per cent. He asked the Opposition if they would at least agree on the basic figure. Even my elemental arithmetic allows me to work out that one plus minus four equals minus three. The Minister produced a figure for 1987.

The Government's record on overseas aid since they came to power in 1979 has been lamentable and the fault for that lies with the previous Prime Minister. It has to be said in favour of the present Prime Minister that he has changed the record so that it is no longer totally disgraceful, but rather poor. That is all that can be said about it.

I am glad that the Minister for Trade is present and is to sum up the debate—I shall be back to hear what he has to say. I want to ask him a specific question on the future aid budget. It is a question raised by the House of Lords in the report published last month by the Select Committee on European Communities. We are committed to an increase in the European Community's aid programme. The Lords report makes interesting reading as it commends the European Community's aid programme. On page 22, paragraph (b), it states:

> "We are concerned about the potential serious effect on the United Kingdom's own bilateral programme because of the decision to increase EC aid without knowing whether there will be a corresponding increase in the ODA budget which finances both our share of the EC's programme and also our own bilateral programme. There is a risk of an unacceptable squeeze on our bilateral programme."

I hope that we can be told what the effect will be of our commitment to join in the share of the increased EC budget as well as enduring the current public expenditure squeeze on our budget.

It remains my party's firm view that we should not just make a general commitment—as the Government have—to the United Nations target on overseas aid without setting a date, but have a specific programme. No political party, even one which has been out of power as long as mine, can promise to do that tomorrow, but we should have a committed programme over a full Parliament to reach the United Nations target of 0·7 per cent., which is attainable and reasonable and should be met.

Two propositions were made, one by the Government and one by the Opposition, on which no agreement was reached across the Floor of the House. As the Minister said, there is no doubt that the developing world as a whole will benefit from increased liberalisation of trade. However, it is equally true, as one or two Opposition Members said, that the very poorest countries do not stand to benefit. Both propositions are correct. We are entitled to ask the Government what approach they take to future GATT talks—that is a direct question for the Minister for Trade. It seems that the GATT will not tackle the commodity crisis. The poorest countries naturally have to rely heavily for income on their own primary products, but the price of those products has been falling—it fell 30 per cent. in the 1980s.

The EC tariff on cocoa beans is 3 per cent., but if the beans are processed into cocoa butter in the country of origin the duty is 12 per cent. If they are further processed into chocolate it rises to 16 per cent. Such a policy discriminates against the economic development of primary products in the developing world. We are entitled to ask what the Government will do about such issues in future trade negotiations because such policies operate against countries that have few resources other than primary products that they wish to develop.

The Government must pay special attention to the commodity problem. They should consider compensation for the losses that the poorer countries would face under GATT agreements. They must consider some support to enable such countries to continue to benefit from some of their current trade preferences.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Richard Needham): I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman appreciates that GATT trade negotiations are conducted through the Commission. Given the right hon. Gentleman's federalist tendencies, I am sure that he is happy for that to remain the case. There is a limit to what the Government can do, but we shall take account of the commodity issue and press for a solution.

Sir David Steel: If that is a form of commitment, I welcome it. Of course, the decisions are made by the Community as a whole. I said that we are entitled to ask what the Government are doing in the Community to have those policies changed. Inasmuch as my party has any influence with Ministers and similar parties elsewhere, I assure the Minister that we shall press exactly the same issues. We do not speak with two voices on this matter.

Debt is the most serious of the three issues facing the developing world. I accept that the G7 leaders had a healthy debate on the debt burden, especially that of Africa, but the figures given by the hon. Member for Oldham, West are correct and show the huge increase in debt in the past half dozen years. Although my figure on Zambia's debt is different from that of the hon. Gentleman, it shows that every man, woman and child in that country owes more than twice the national income. That is intolerable.

The fact that some of us were a bit disappointed by what happened in Tokyo is illustrated by the text that I read in the Library of the detailed communiqué and the Prime Minister's statement. I shall contrast what he said about the aid to Russia with what he said about aid to the poorest countries. He said that the Group of Seven had put together an unprecedented set of measures to help Russia. He went on:

"We set out a programme worth some $3 billion to help privatisation and restructuring."

I am not in any way against those firm and specific proposals. However, later in the statement when the Prime Minister dealt with debt reduction, he said:

"I secured agreement that improved debt reduction terms should be considered for the poorest and most indebted countries. I hope this will carry implementation of the Trinidad terms further."

The Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), the hon. Member for Oldham, West and I went to see the Prime Minister before he left for Tokyo. Therefore, I am aware of that hope. However, the G7 summit did not produce the firm commitment to relieve debt in the poorest countries that it produced on the issue of aid to Russia.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I think that the right hon. Gentleman gives us credit for trying. Success will be achieved by taking consensus forward. The alternative might be to have some sort of unilateral concession by the United Kingdom on some debt, but that would be nothing like as effective for the poor world as one that had the agreement of the other parties to the Paris Club.

Sir David Steel: When the Minister reads Hansard he will see that I thanked the Prime Minister for his efforts. We should not get carried away simply because G7 countries are considering the matter. As democratic politicians we are entitled to press for more specific action. The Minister tempts me to digress a little.

In the House and privately to us, the Prime Minister said that the Japanese Government, who are one of the major players, are philosophically reluctant to engage in debt write-off. I raised that with a Japanese Government representative a few days ago. He said that that was true, but that they would compensate for that by greatly increasing grants to the developing world so that it could pay off debt. I do not know the scale of that, but if the Japanese Government are pursuing that policy, at least they are not proving an obstacle to greater agreement among the G7 countries on the debt question.

Pressure on the commercial banks should not be passed over as lightly as the Minister did. If my memory serves me right, there was a measure in last year's Finance Bill to help the banks to write off debt. I am not a Treasury expert and someone from the Treasury would be needed to speak about that. Moreover, many commercial banks have made provision in their accounts for writing off debt but have not written it off. Surely the Government should have a word with the commercial banks to persuade them to do more on this issue.

Secondly, what is the Government's strategy towards the multilateral agencies on debt? The IMF and World bank meeting will be held in September. What stance will the Government take at that meeting to try to get the agencies to do more? As we have heard, the Commonwealth Finance Ministers meeting and the international conference on African debt will be held in October. All those meetings are scheduled to be held shortly and there is scope for the Government to continue to take a high profile on debt relief. Yes, we shall thank them for trying, but we shall thank them even more when they succeed.

8.16 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on his achievements at the G7 summit in Tokyo. He has returned from all three recent summit meetings—in Copenhagen, Edinburgh and Tokyo—with the consistent message that he wishes to see measures that will encourage economic development in the industrial world and in the third world.

At the Tokyo summit, there was major progress on debt, on the GATT talks and on world trade and unemployment. Those are the problems that will beset the world and we must try to deal with them in the third world, Russia, Asia, Europe and the Americas. The theme of the Prime Minister's message to the House on Monday was that he believed that more trade produced more jobs and that economic development was the way to deal with debt issues and the alleviation of poverty, to which we are all devoted.

One of the major issues in economic development in Africa and the third world is debt. The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) rightly said that African debt is largely to the international financial institutions and not to the commercial banks or to Governments.

Therefore, the debt problem in Africa, and especially in Zambia about which the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was concerned, is a matter for the international financial institutions. To clear that debt, we must consider complete debt forgiveness. In that context, the Japanese example is important, but without debt forgiveness interest continues to mount. Debt forgiveness is needed from the Japanese and I am afraid that we shall have to press them still further, because just giving grants to repay debt will not be sufficient to pay the capital let alone the interest that has accrued on much African debt. That is especially true of the highly indebted Zambia.

Therefore, there has to be bilateral action by the member states of the G7 and others to write off debt in the Trinidad terms to which every hon. Member has referred. It was pioneered by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer and he has continued to press it throughout all the international conferences he has attended.

We have to take further initiatives and consider all the debts in each country—private debts, commercial debts, trading debts and debts to international financial institutions—make an overall settlement with each country and arrange for repayments to be made over an extended period. Some 35 years or more may be necessary for those countries to be able to afford to repay the debts on a controlled basis without taking too much of their export earnings or their gross domestic product which in some countries in Africa is entirely hypothecated to the repayment of debt.

Considerable progress has been made in debt repayment. One can point immediately to Mexico which was one of the major indebted countries when we were considering these matters in the early 1980s and when the Brady plan came into existence. A great deal of effort has gone into Mexico, and Mexican debt has now been stabilised. We are seeing inward investment into Mexico and the stopping of capital flight from Mexico which is becoming a focus for inward investment. That represents a great international success in dealing with debt worldwide. The same story applies to many countries in South America.

The international community, with Britain playing a leading role, has had considerable success which we should not underestimate or denigrate. However, we have to go further; it is never enough—but that always applies to all aid issues.

Our own aid budget, of course, is not, and never will be, enough to deal with all the problems, but I should like to make one or two suggestions. Our aid programme now, which is of high quality, is probably stretched too tightly over too many objectives to become as purposeful and effective as we should like.

The objectives for overseas aid in Command Paper 2202, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's departmental report, list a whole set of aims, which include

"the adoption of economic policies that reduce price distortions and rely more on the market; encouragement of the private sector as a source of wealth creation; investment in economic and social infrastructure; improvements in women's status; higher standards in political systems, public administration and the legal sector; projects and programmes which have a positive impact on the lives of the poorest people; and investment and planning to help protect the economy from natural disasters."

That is not a full summary of what the Overseas Development Adminstration does, but it is a considerable programme to try to implement in any country, particularly in the large number of countries to which our aid budget is devoted.

I do not believe that we should cut out aid to any particular country except those with a hostile economic and governmental structure which makes economic development impossible. To use President Reagan's expression, we must concentrate more on developing measures by which we can give people in these countries the means to cure their economic problems. We should give them more of the fishing rod and less of the fish.

For example, we must reduce our concentration on health matters, education matters and technical assistance, which involves sending executives and civil servants to help with administration or central banking functions. We have to reduce those activities and concentrate more on economic development and encouraging those countries to adopt economic policies and introduce Government measures to encourage economic development. That means that we have to encourage the private sector to develop in those countries and help them to take out public sector mismanagement. For example, appalling waste can be seen in many of the Zambian parastatals which are inefficient and corrupt. We need to take them out of that inefficient management and help them get back into prosperous and efficient operations in the private sector.

The Overseas Development Administration is to be congratulated as it has started to develop some of its programme towards that end, but it must be taken very much further forward. One of the ways in which the Overseas Development Administration is immensely successful is through the Commonwealth Development Corporation and I shall say a few words about the problems that now face that corporation which I had the honour to serve in a junior capacity before I entered the House.

At present, as a result of the public expenditure survey settlement, the corporation has been left without access to the aid programme's budget and therefore to low-interest loans. If that programme continues, the Commonwealth Development Corporation will have to come out of the very places that we need to support, such as Africa. Those countries are the most difficult places in which to get economic development started. It will become exceedingly difficult for the CDC to invest in those countries, repay the loans with interest to the Government and pay tax on those loans, which are its current terms of reference and method of operation.

If, on the other hand, the Government renew their support for the Commonwealth Development Corporation, the CDC can get beneath Government level, into the wealth-creating sectors of the economy and invest in profitable operations, including, of course, those producing commodities.

We have heard about the problem of prices. We have to recognise that GATT is a very important issue for the third world countries and begin to address the problem of low and falling commodity prices which have created many problems in the third world over the past decade.

If we begin to eliminate agricultural surpluses by the elimination of subsidy in our over-subsidised northern agriculture arenas in commodities such as sugar, we will stop exporting to the world markets. The European Community exports more than 3 million tonnes of sugar to world markets with what effect? Of course, it reduces the world price of sugar and third world countries are exporting their sugar at world prices.

If we stop subsidised sugar and other commodities coming on to the world market, we will raise the prices that third world countries get for their commodities and begin the process of enriching those countries and enabling them to buy products from our countries, thus benefiting from world trade. That would benefit third world countries and enable them to help themselves. Quite frankly, that is the only way in which those countries will begin to be able to repay debt and improve their standards of living. I am forced to conclude that we must concentrate on third world countries' wealth-creating sectors, support them through aid, and reduce or write off their debts—or at least make them capable of repaying them, so that further investment by private banks and international financial institutions is not inhibited.

Those institutions have a problem in Africa, and I hope that my hon. Friends will ensure that it is raised at the World bank meeting in September. I am concerned particularly about repaying international financial institution debt without reducing the inward flow of moneys from those institutions and investment in the economic cycle of which I have spoken.

Further progress has been made in finding a way in which the world economy can begin to work to the benefit of countries in not only the north—which we desperately need, if we are to be able to employ more people—but the third world. Only a beneficial relationship between the two will bring success in addressing world poverty problems.

8.30 pm

Mr. Mike Watson (Glasgow, Central): I did not intend to refer specifically to aid agencies—which are always helpful in providing up-to-date information on their activities and advice for the purposes of such debates. However, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs reacted like a wounded animal to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on the success or otherwise of the Tokyo summit, and the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) also seems to think that the summit was a success and that the G7 ought to be congratulated.

I will quote briefly from comments by professional agencies in the field which put aid programmes into effect, and which have regular contact with many of the countries in question. ActionAid stated:

"The tariff cuts agreed at the summit last week are unlikely to provide many benefits for developing countries. It is disappointing that the failure to include tariffs on agricultural products may postpone agreement at the GATT talks on areas (such as agriculture) essential for the future of developing countries."

Christian Aid commenteed:

"The G7 Tokyo Summit Economic Declaration . . . does little to promote debt relief for the Third World; it merely reaffirms the status quo."

Oxfam stated:

"Following the failure of the G7 meeting yet again to address the problem of debt, HMG must redouble its efforts to get the issue firmly on the international agenda."

Those comments counter the claims made by the Minister and Conservative Members in tonight's debate. I know which side I am on in reaching my conclusions.

I am in no doubt that, not for the first time, the G7 summit promised little and delivered even less to the developing world. The declaration does little more than maintain the status quo, while the Prime Minister's performance did not enhance his poor aid record, or that of this country over the past decade.

In 1989, when the Prime Minister was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he told the G7 summit that the Trinidad terms ought to be introduced with a view to easing the third world's crippling debt burden. We sought to support that initiative, and we continue to do so. I would have preferred a 66 per cent. write-off rather than the 50 per cent. for which the Toronto terms provided.

Four years later, even that modest improvement has not been delivered. That write-off would not itself be sufficient to counter the crippling effects of debt repayment, yet the Prime Minister—despite the fine words of Conservative Members—was unable to deliver even that pledge, far less his new proposal for 80 per cent. write-off.

Only last month, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, addressing the One World Action conference on debt, claimed that Britain would press for improved debt reduction terms for poor and heavily indebted countries. He said:

"for some of them, particularly those in sub-Saharan Africa, much more needs to be done. . . We in the UK would like to see the Trinidad terms improve so that they conform more closely to the proposals John Major put forward in Trinidad in 1990."

I am sorry that the Under-Secretary of State has left the Chamber, presumably to take his evening meal—although he has every right to do so. I wanted to put to him a question, of which his advisers will no doubt inform him when he returns to reply to the debate.

Where is the evidence that the good intentions espoused by the Prime Minister, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury and other Ministers were vigorously pursued at Tokyo? It is no use the Under-Secretary praising the Prime Minister. What did the British initiatives at Tokyo actually produce for the poor?

Mr. Needham: I shall be winding up the debate.

Mr. Watson: Then I hope that the Minister for Trade will answer that question.

The summit at least acknowledged the particular needs of sub-Saharan Africa, but the Under-Secretary of State made no commitment to respond to those needs. One way would be to announce additional assistance from the current public spending round. Without such a commitment, this country's already poor record of aid spending will at best remain at current levels. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West spelt out that the freeze will amount to a 4 per cent. reduction in real terms. ODA funding is already in reverse, at 0·31 per cent. of gross domestic product this year, compared with 0·32 per cent. last year, which is well short of the United Nations figure.

I wholly endorse the view of the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel), that that should be an achievable target of a Parliament. Labour made a commitment to the United Nations target in its aid proposals at the last general election, and the United Nations figure is clearly endorsed by the Liberal Democrats. If the Government had a clear commitment to aid, they would at least announce a timetable to implement the United Nations target.

How do the Minister and the Government expect us to take them seriously when they are back-peddling and making no real attempts to acknowledge or to deal with the mountain of debt that is weighing down and stunting the growth potential of the third world?

The Minister for Overseas Development, Lady Chalker, constantly talks up her Department's relatively modest aid to countries such as Ethiopia, Somalia and Sudan. The briefings that emanate from the ODA refer to £20 million of food aid here or £20 million of humanitarian assistance there. I do not mean to belittle those valuable efforts, which I commend if they meet their objectives, but they pale into insignificance alongside the crippling debt burden of many African countries.

This ought to be a time of hope for Africa. Things are looking better in terms of developing democracies in a number of countries. Ethiopia, Eritrea and Mozambique —which are populated by some of the world's most vulnerable people—have seen peace established and maintained after decades of armed conflict. However, of necessity, they remain fragile and are seriously undermined by lack of support from the international community, which allows their debt burden to rise.

Nowhere is the legacy of accumulated debt more threatening than in Ethiopia. It is estimated that its economy shrunk 6 per cent. last year, and that it will need to find £1 billion annually over the next three years just to cover debt service payments. It is surely important that such a sum should be used to develop Ethiopia's economy, feed its people in the short term, and ensure that it can sustain itself in the long term. That is more important than servicing debts which, no matter how much is repaid, seem to grow ever larger.

From the threadbare section on aid that emerged from the Tokyo declaration, it is clear that the world's richest nations failed to grasp the fundamental point. That statement was vague and complacent:

"We will continue to strengthen our support for their self-help efforts based on the principles of good governance. We will also encourage them"— the developing countries, that is—

"to follow sound and open economic policies to create a solid base for sustainable economic growth."

"Encourage" is the key word. Many of the countries concerned have been effectively strangled by structural adjustment programmes, mainly through the World bank.

The declaration continues:

"we will make all efforts"—

there is nothing more precise than that—

"to enhance development assistance in order to respond to ongoing needs as well as new requirements."

Although the Prime Minister and the other G7 leaders may have achieved some successes, I venture to suggest that tackling the issues of aid, trade and debt in the developing world was not one of them.

The massive wave of debt repayment that washes over the poorest countries every year hits Africa hardest. Between 1985 and 1992, the continent repaid more than £80 billion in servicing its debt, diverting Government spending from desperate social need and choking at birth any real chance of recovery. To concentrate on Africa—in which I have taken a particular interest—is not to ignore the need to assist other developing countries; I accept that need exists much further afield. It merely reflects the priorities at a time of scarce economic resources throughout the world.

Of course, everything is relative. In Latin America, external debt amounts to an average of 37 per cent. of gross domestic product; in the United Kingdom, the figure is about 6 per cent. In Africa, the average exceeds 100 per cent., and is much higher than that in many of the poorest nations. Zambia has already been mentioned.

The stark fact that must be spelt out repeatedly until it is both grasped and acted on is that sub-Saharan Africa owes more than it earns, and cannot hope to repay that debt in the foreseeable future. The only way in which those countries can be enabled to recover and build up their economies is the writing off of debt. The sole question should be what percentage is written off.

It could be argued that the write-off should be total, although in the past the Government have argued that full write-offs encourage debtor countries to ignore their repayment requirements. That is all very well, but to apply such a stricture to the poorest countries while applying different criteria to assistance to Russia—or the writing off of most of what Egypt and Poland owed—is to employ double standards that invite cynicism when issuing from the mouths that call for the implementation of the Trinidad terms while failing to deliver.

That tendency to cyncism is hardly diminished when we consider the performance of British banks in regard to third world lending. Most shy away from Africa, concentrating instead on Latin America—but not Lloyds and the Midland, which have done very well out of the debt built up by the developing world. Over the past three years, the developing countries have propped up the Midland, subsidising its United Kingdom operations. In 1991, without profits from third world debt, the bank would have recorded a loss of about £50 million rather than a profit of £36 million. Last year, £82 million of its operating income came from developing countries' activities.

Recently, Ben Jackson of the World Development Movement said:

"It is unacceptable for the banks to enjoy tax holidays at the expense of British taxpayers without passing a penny of that relief onto the world's poor and then, when it suits them, to write those debts back into their accounts".

For the Midland, third world debt has turned into a nice little money earner. Its shareholders may be satisfied, but the world's poor certainly are not. Debt repayments continue to flood out of the third world. I invite the Minister to condemn the banks' self-seeking approach, and to endeavour to close any loopholes that permit such an approach.

There are two main reasons why the world's poorest countries should have been offered a major programme of assistance last week. First, they have generally done their best to repay their debts, but have simply been unable to do so. For instance, 10 years ago, the total external third world debt amounted to about £550 billion; in the intervening decade, debtor countries have paid back nearly £1,000 billion more, but they now owe £1,100 billion. They are not merely running fast to stand still; they are being propelled backwards at a rate of knots. That cannot be allowed to continue.

Secondly, the crisis is not of the debtor countries' own making. I do not deny that there are examples of economic mismanagement, largely because Governments are running economies for the first time; but a cocktail of plummeting commodity prices and soaring interest rates has caused Africa's debt burden to spiral out of all control. As a result of the diversion of scarce resources, Africa now spends four times as much on debt repayments as it spends on health care. The House has already debated the dreadful health problems on that continent.

I agree with the Minister about the need to use trade as a means of assisting such countries. Certainly, there is far more to be gained from trading with them than from simply doling out aid. Trade links provide a potential lifeline for developing countries. I think the Minister said that trade with the developing world amounted to three times the value of aid; I believe that the figure is higher, but I will not quibble. The point is that most developing countries rely on a small number of primary commodities. The World bank's commodity price index has plummeted by some 30 per cent., with all-too-predictable results for the poorest countries.

As has been pointed out, the tariff cuts agreed at last week's summit are unlikely to provide many benefits for developing countries. None of the aid agencies considers that anything meaningful has emerged from Tokyo. It was a lost opportunity for the G7 nations. Of course we in the developed world have our own problems, but it is simply not good enough to pass up the opportunity to help the developing countries, instead producing a few bland paragraphs in a subsequent announcement.

Oxfam is one of the aid agencies that called for full implementation of the Trinidad terms. It was supported by a recently formed all-party parliamentary group called Africa Caucus, whose members include the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester), my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes)—who was present earlier—and myself. We urged the G7 leaders to give serious consideration to debt write-off at the summit: it would allow developing countries to gain the breathing space necessary to enable their economies to recover and begin the inevitably slow climb towards sustainable recovery.

Although that approach proved ineffective, Africa Caucus will continue to campaign for at least a year to highlight the serious plight of African countries, and to seek the support of the developed nations.

ActionAid, not being content with dwelling on the past, has targeted the future, referring to the annual meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World bank in the autumn and the international conference on African development which will take place in October. Although the declaration refers to that, and also to the population conference to be held in Cairo in 1994, it does not suggest a link between those events to help the poor. As things stand, they will prove no more significant than the Tokyo summit—perhaps even less significant.

The Government must play a much more vigorous role in ensuring that the plight of the debt-burdened nations is treated seriously at such fora, and that that consideration is translated into meaningful action. So far, that has not happened.

If both the Ministers present today—and the Prime Minister—expect to be taken seriously in regard to aid, trade and debt, I suggest that they make firm commitments. First, although it stresses the need to alleviate poverty, the ODA does not measure the amount that it spends for that purpose; it is impossible to obtain a figure showing the effects of that spending. I understand that no benchmarks are available to assess the ODA's performance. That gap ought to be filled. I ask the Minister to make attempts to get the ODA quickly to introduce indicators and benchmarks so that its record can be evaluated.

I mentioned earlier that the Government should also revoke the decision to freeze between now and 1996 the official aid figure that has already been announced. I referred to the effect that that will have. It amounts to de facto cuts, which represent a further betrayal of the developing world. Those cuts should not be forced on them after the empty hand that was shown to them at Tokyo.

The Minister should also commit additional assistance from the current public spending round to the poorest nations. Apart from increasing the assistance given to them, it might also act as an incentive to Britain's G7 partners, who are clearly in need of, shall we say, a vigorous prod in that direction. If that is not done, nothing will change.

Can the Minister assure us that the British Government will match their good intentions with tangible evidence of their determination to bring about the implementation of the Trinidad terms? They are taken along to the G7 and other summits, but nothing really meaningful seems to emerge. If the Government do not do that, I fear that, for the world's poor, it will be a case yet again—and I am sick and tired of this—of jam tomorrow. Many of those people do not have the ability to get the bread on which any jam, whatever form it might take, could be spread at any future time. It is time to act. We really must provide something more tangible than what was produced at last week's G7 summit.

8.50 pm

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson), whose views and expertise we recognise. However, the motion on the Order Paper amounts to shadow boxing by the shadow Cabinet. Most people realised that this G7 summit was perhaps the least fortuitous for a long time. The world is faced with many economic problems. The Japanese in particular were in difficulties, due to their elections. It was wrong to imagine, therefore, that one could go along to the G7 and find that people were prepared to find a way of resolving the problems faced by developing countries.

As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central said, we saw the Prime Minister before he went to the G7 summit. His commitment is as strong as it was when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer. His recognition of the debt problem is still as complete as it was when he made those voluntary moves. He did not make them for any other reason than his own interest in the subject and his commitment to it. I suspect that if it were not for the Prime Minister, this issue would not have been raised at the G7 summit, that it would not have featured in the communiqué and that there would have been no commitment to follow it up.

Furthermore, no one should underestimate the views of the new Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was also in Tokyo and with whom I have had the opportunity to discuss briefly what happened. His commitment to international order equals that of the Prime Minister. I am sure that at future international meetings the Chancellor of the Exchequer will use his influence to cajole, persuade or, dare I say it, bully other nations which do not hold the same view about some of the poorest parts of the world, or about debt that can never be repaid.

The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) referred to the fact that the Japanese do not believe in forging debt. My research work in Tanzania showed me that when that country borrowed money from the Intenational Monetary Fund about 15 years ago it borrowed a basket of currencies, most of which consisted of Japanese yen. Tanzania borrowed that money at a time when interest rates were low. Nobody told Tanzania that 10 years later, when it would have to repay the debt, it would be obliged to go on to the world market and buy yen when the interest rate was something like 350 per cent.

No one should doubt, either, the commitment of the Foreign Secretary and the Minister for Overseas Development to finding a solution to the problems that we are debating. They have shown consistent concern and they have immense practical experience of those problems. They understand the need to provide high levels of support through a combination of debt relief, better trade terms and multilateral and bilateral aid programmes.

Many of the G7 countries are concerned about the overall gap in aid levels, which continues to widen. More and more countries, under economic pressure, are reducing and redirecting their aid programmes—for example, Canada, the United States and Sweden—at a time when the needs of sub-Saharan Africa and other parts of the world have never been greater. We should be concerned about the whole international aid effort and the way in which it is moving against the incredible demands for aid, in particular from sub-Saharan Africa.

I am sure that all hon. Members who are now in the Chamber have signed my early-day motion 2099, which calls on Her Majesty's Government to find an extra £100 million for sub-Saharan Africa. I think that 124 hon. Members have already signed it. This country has particular knowledge of Africa. If we are not to the fore in arguing the case for Africa, no one else will. We must encourage the positive changes that we see taking place in southern Africa, Mozambique and Ethiopia.

Those of us who take a close interest in Africa, however, are always worried about Africa taking three steps forward and three steps back. Recent events in Angola, Nigeria and Zaire are very unwelcome. It is nevertheless in the long-term interests of those countries to know that the support of this country and of this Administration, and, I hope, more encouraging support from the Opposition than has been shown hitherto, is one way to get the richer nations of the world to recognise their plight.

I recognise how committed the non-governmental organisations are to finding the solution to these problems. It is easy to say that the G7 was a write-off if one does not appreciate how hard the negotiations can be. I have negotiated with NGOs at various international meetings and I cannot say that they are always brilliant when it comes to producing results. When I say that, I have to declare an interest. I am a member of the overseas committee of the Save the Children Fund. I am also on the board of Christian Aid—unpaid, of course.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Central referred to Poverty Focus. I was at the conference at which Action Aid initiated Poverty Focus. Those of us who have experience of overseas development find it difficult to be exact about precisely what it is that relieves poverty. I could take hon. Members to a place in Kenya where a road has done more to relieve poverty than any seemingly positive Poverty Focus programme. It led to a large number of villages having access to the market and has lifted the burden of poverty from those places. One would not necessarily say, though, that a road programme was a Poverty Focus issue. One must be careful about trying to define the criteria too closely.

I support the ODA programme, 80 per cent. of which goes to the 50 poorest countries. It is the right one. We should keep a constant eye on that sort of programme to ensure that it goes a long way to relieving poverty. I am not as convinced as others that one can define a "poverty-related programme"—one cannot say that a programme is poverty related and that is where we should be targeting our bilateral aid.

I have always supported the Government's commitment to quality aid. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), I have always argued that it should be more. In the present circumstances, I recognise that the Prime Minister is pursuing the uprating of the debt terms from what are now accepted universally and known as the enhanced Toronto terms to get to the original Trinidad terms. That would be a major step forward. I do not understand why we should go beyond the Trinidad terms in terms of international acceptance until we have the Trinidad terms. That is what the Prime Minister is pushing for and it is the direction in which we should be going.

I shall raise some concerns that are important in terms of examining the way in which aid programmes are developing. One of those concerns is the incredible pressure that the state of the world is putting on emergency relief. I am sure that not everyone recognises that emergency relief in the ODA budget has increased five-fold since 1987—it was £34 million in 1987 and is £171 million in 1992-93.

Many of us recognise that that is essential humanitarian aid. It repairs damage caused by civil wars and breakdowns in society. It is for refugees, food and immediate relief of disaster situations. If we look at what that money could do and if we look at some of the people who are causing the problems for others in their countries, there is a significant increase in development and sustainable aid if that is where it should be targeted.

I recognise that ODA has a special reputation for disaster relief. It has done that successfully for as long as I have been in the House—it goes back further than 1987 when we had the original famines in Ethiopia and other parts of Africa. We should draw more attention to the fact that the money is being diverted from sustainable developmental aid. It is not being wasted, because it is essential to protect human life, but it is being used for the opposite to what the ODA programme should be about. It is the opposite to what we believe long-term sustainable development and the money that we vote for that head should be used for.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I share the hon. Gentleman's view entirely. When there is a disaster at home, we find money from a contingency fund which we do not otherwise call on and which is not under that budget head for the year. Does he agree that the money that has often been diverted for international relief operations, which comes out of the ODA budget pocket, should be regarded as a separate head, a contingency, when we come to the rescue of fellow human beings in the world? If we did that, the ODA budget could be geared to and directed at the sustainable, long-term progressive work for which the hon. Gentleman is arguing.

Mr. Lester: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is greatly to the credit of the Prime Minister that, for the first time, the Government's contingency fund has been used to restore to ODA money that has been used for humanitarian relief. It was not true of the previous Prime Minister, but it is certainly true of this one. I know that that recommendation will be supported by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, which is currently drafting a report on the expenditure of the Foreign Office and the ODA.

[Mr. Lester]

Another pressure on the ODA budget that we should understand is the proportion of multilateral aid that is taken for peacekeeping and the proportion that goes to the European Development Fund. Like the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale, I support that principle. It has always seemed to be absolutely right that the strength of the European Community can do far more for developmental assistance than individual countries picking off a little bit here and a little bit there, however important that is.

As we see an increasing proportion of our aid budget going through multilateral agencies and the European Development Fund, we need a keen evaluation of the schemes that are taken at that level. We must take seriously the fact that that is where our aid programme is increasingly being used. We should be ensuring that everything that we do through those multilateral agencies is every bit as good as the bilateral programmes for which we are responsible.

Another concern is the increased assistance to the former Soviet Union. In the case of this Government, that is in addition to the moneys originally voted for overseas assistance. That is not true of many other countries in the European Community.

When considering overall percentages of aid, it must be remembered that aid given to the Soviet Union and to central Europe does not appear as overseas development. It comes on top of and is no part of the overseas development assistance, yet it is included under that budget.

The balance between multilateral and bilateral aid is changing fundamentally and it will not be many years before multilateral aid will be greater than our bilateral aid programme. It is therefore important that the Government and all of us who take an interest in such matters should ensure that we first look for quality and effectiveness of those multilateral programmes and, when there is an increase in the ODA budget, that we also ensure that it goes to our bilateral programme to achieve the sustainable development to which we are committed.

The Government—especially the Prime Minister and the Chancellor—must remain acutely conscious of all the concerns that are expressed internationally and nationally and by the NGOs. I am sure that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor will follow the progress made at the G7 summit in all the areas about which we are concerned and in all the places where it is most effective—debt, trade and development.

9.7 pm

Miss Joan Lestor (Eccles): I shall begin by agreeing with my namesake, the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester). He commented on the major crisis among the main aid donors and the reductions in aid given. That does not let this country off the hook. For a long time, we have ranked as one of the lowest main donors of aid. That is a tragedy for the developing countries and the world as a whole.

It is unfortunate that a Minister is not present for such a debate as this—not because I doubt the competence of those who are present, but simply because it downgrades the whole stature and nature of such a debate and rather gives the impression that we regard overseas aid as second class, which of course we do not.

Most of us who have fought elections—I have fought and won more than most—know that one of the biggest meetings held during election campaigns is on aid, development and peace, and is usually organised by the church. There is no question but that the general public want to support more aid, development and trade in the developing world. Surveys have shown that over half the people in the country are prepared to pay higher taxes if it would help to alleviate the poverty and the terrible problems of the third-world countries that they have seen depicted on their television screens.

Even though it is obvious, it needs to be restated that the examples of famine and starvation in developing countries and the pictures of floods and drought that we have all seen are much more to do with wars, with arms sales, and with debt and trade restrictions than with the indigenous problems.

Trade restrictions especially lock countries into a vicious circle of growing and unending misery. For every £1 given in aid, £2 is taken back as interest repayments on debt. The third world loses more through the trade policies of the rich north and war, often sadly fuelled by arms sales —and we seem to be at it again—which robs those countries of the resources they need, robs the children of their future and leaves behind a trail of misery.

The hon. Member for Broxtowe referred in passing to the briefing of other hon. Members by overseas aid agencies. I am not implying that he was disparaging about it, but he certainly questioned it. I do not believe that all the agencies can be wrong in their briefing or on what they have said about the recent summit and about GATT. Indeed, I pay tribute to those agencies, and to all those who work in aid and development. They often work under appalling conditions and some of them lose their lives, as we have recently seen.

Those workers obviously brief hon. Members. They want more aid and are concerned about what is happening. We have to listen to them because, although we may have an opportunity from time to time to go to those countries to see the problems for ourselves, we can never have the breadth of vision, understanding and experience that the people working there have.

Much attention has been paid to the Trinidad terms and to the whole question of trade. Those terms were welcomed by all in the House. I remember writing at the time that I was pleased that the Government had made a move in that direction. However, the matter does not end there. That is where it began, and things should have developed from there and have gone on apace.

The Prime Minister told the world leaders in Rio—no one would disagree—

> "No one who has come here can plead ignorance. More people than ever before, one billion, live in abject poverty."

In the same year, our aid budget for developing countries was frozen until 1996-97. That is disgraceful for a country that is still as rich as ours is.

One of the big problems which has already been mentioned is debt. That problem enormously undermines the development and growth of third-world countries. The difficulty about debt is that, unless there is a thorough and fundamental shift from the way in which we look at it and what we do about it, the position of third-world and developing countries will not change very much.

It is estimated that as much as 42 per cent. of the developing world's debt is a result of the deteriorating terms of trade, and that the servicing of that debt accounts for as much as one third of the foreign exports won by African and Latin American countries. The Minister was right to stress the importance of trade, but as long as those countries have to pay off the debt burden at the present level, the benefits of trade are swallowed up and many of them will never be able to repay those debts. That is a tragedy.

One of the comments made by my hon. Friends was challenged by Conservative Members. The Government were right in 1991 to switch aid so that 81 per cent. of United Kingdom bilateral aid went to the poorest 50 countries, after a great deal of pressure from many agencies and others. Yet focusing on poor countries does not go hand in hand with targeting the poorest communities.

The United Nations Children's Fund has pointed out that just 9·1 per cent. of bilateral aid was spent on basic needs in 1989. I welcome the shift to the poorest countries, but I believe that we must have a means of monitoring where the aid goes and its effectiveness if we are to reach the world's poorest people. Sadly, we are not reaching them.

We all agree that trade is vital, but I do not think that we can say that, because we have cut aid, we can now go to trade as an alternative. Debt, trade and aid all hang together. Trade produces six times more income for poor countries than aid does. We all want to reach a position where aid is not necessary because trade is doing the trick for developing countries.

Sadly, since the early 1970s, the prices paid for developing countries' primary exports have declined by more than 20 per cent., which is a tremendous decline. Over the past two decades, the share of trade of sub-Saharan Africa, about which we are all concerned, has shrunk by almost three quarters to a mere 1 per cent. of world trade. That compares to 19·3 per cent. for developing countries as a whole. Yes, we want to see trade, but we want it to be in a context beneficial to the countries involved.

The tariff cuts agreed at the G7 summit last week are unlikely, as has been said, to provide many benefits for developing countries. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) said, it is disappointing that the failure to include tariffs on agricultural products may postpone agreement at the GATT talks on such areas, which are vital for the development of many countries.

We all agree that trade is important, and the recent Uruguay round will bring some benefits for developing countries. In agriculture, some protectionism and some subsidies will fall, but the poorest countries are likely to be worse off. They will be unable to take advantage of new market opportunities, yet they will have to open up to foreign competition. They will see the relative value of their current trade preferences being undermined.

Developing service sectors in the third world could be wiped out, and new rules on property will make technology transfer and economic development more difficult. In other words, the poorest countries will be unable to benefit from the good results of many of the recent talks.

GATT will have a very limited impact on the common agricultural policy, which has been mentioned in the House again, and again because it discriminates against third-world products. The dumping of European subsidised agricultural products pulls down world prices, creates instability and wipes out markets for poor farmers. It creates dependence on food imports and develops tastes for goods that people can ill afford. The Trinidad terms were welcome, but what took place at the summit recently did very little for the world's poorest people.

The short and longer-term outlooks for Africa are very bleak. The proportion of debt has increased from the equivalent of 28 per cent. in 1982 to 108 per cent. in 1992. In effect, Britain's bilateral aid and development resources are being diverted back to donor countries through the International Monetary Fund and the World bank in the form of debt repayments. Africa's attempts to extricate itself from that burden are having terrible consequences for the world economy, and are bankrupting low-income families.

Most of Africa faces a debt service to export ratio of more than 30 per cent., and for some it is more than 100 per cent. Debt servicing is leading to investment starvation, the flight of foreign capital, mounting trade deficits and mass unemployment, and is undermining Africa's ability to repay. The continent avoids defaulting on its debt obligations only by continually rescheduling them, which often undermines the very things and services for which the debt was incurred in the first place. That is the tragedy.

The Minister referred to population. Of course population control is important. I support it because it liberalises women, who should have the right to liberalise themselves from one pregnancy after another from the time they are 15 until they are 50. But do not let us kid ourselves that population is the cause of poverty in the third world. When we have our dinner tonight, we shall eat more in one meal than many a village in parts of Africa will have in a week. We should not allow it to be said that the third world is consuming too much of the world's resources. It is not true.

Although population is important from other points of view, I remind all hon. Members that children represent some security for the future. Although population control and family planning can be introduced and should be made available, it will be difficult to persuade people to reduce their families until they are sure that their children will survive and grow up and that they will have some security, and until one deals with the economic problems in developing countries. We consume more in the Tea Room every day than a family in a developing country does in a week, and we should never forget that. The world's resources are very unfairly distributed.

I wonder whether HIV and AIDS in developing countries have been discussed in any depth, but I do not believe that it was appropriate for them to be discussed at the summit, and therefore make no complaint. What is taking place, in Africa particularly, is heart-breaking and worrying, not only because of the AIDS epidemic among adults, but because thousands of children are being born, and will be born, with the HIV virus. They will be orphaned, and what is to become of them?

The Government underestimate the effect of AIDS in this country, and have cut the grant to some charities—but that is another story. At some time, however, the developing nations must consider what is happening to

[Miss Joan Lestor]

AIDS in developing and third-world countries and take it seriously. I am pleased that some organisations, backed by the Rockefeller Foundation, have co-operated to develop a programme, working with non-governmental organisations in those countries to give them the benefit of the information that we and others have on HIV in order to tackle that grave and frightening problem.

Anyone who has seen a country in that situation knows that any discussion about third-world development, especially in relation to Africa, cannot go on without taking into consideration what is happening in this respect.

Finally, I was glad to get some information today to show that my friends in the Baby Milk Action Campaign disrupted the annual general meeting of Nestlé to point out its disgraceful campaign to persuade mothers in developing countries not to breast-feed their children, but to feed them Nestlé products. We used to call it "Nessels" when I was a child, but I believe that it is "Nessleys" these days.

Yes, there has been some progress through the World Health Organisation to stop the advertising. We were all sickened to see healthy, beautiful black women with babies sucking a bottle when those babies should be breast-fed because it is better for babies anyway. I am delighted that my friends disrupted the meeting and tried to get Nestlé —it is not the only company, but it is the main one—to explain why it continues to provide and promote its milk products in developing countries. It is an absolute scandal that that should take place.

How can UNICEF and all the organisations that are doing so much to immunise and protect children against disease possibly work against that background? They are trying to persuade mothers to breast-feed because of the protection it gives, yet as a result of advertising, babies are dying. It is estimated that hundreds of babies are dying because they are not being breast-fed, but instead are being put on milk products when there is no clean water, and water and even bottles cannot be sterilised. It is a disgrace, and I hope that all hon. Members condemn it.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on raising this subject today. We cannot separate one item from another. We cannot say that it does not matter so much about aid, that yes, we have cut it, but look what we are doing on trade, and that we have done a little to reduce debt, so let us congratulate ourselves. Congratulation does not come into it. All these items hang together. Unless those of use who are fortunate enough to live in rich countries look at it in that way, one item will be set off against another. I welcome the debate, but I hope that in future we recognise that we are slipping badly in the aid stakes, and that we do something about it.

9.21 pm

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): I start by expressing my appreciation to the Opposition for choosing this matter for debate this evening. The subject cannot arise too often. I regret the slight slant in the motion. It should not be forgotten that, in the late 1980s, this Government and the noble Lord Lawson, as he now is, led the way on debt repayment. This country wrote off more than £1 billion-worth of debt and raised the profile of debt write-off with the rest of the industrial world. That should not be forgotten in the House or the country.

I am aware of the time, and the fact that others wish to speak, so my contribution will be much shorter than I should have liked it to be. I welcome the wording of the Government amendment. It puts the truth of the position. It does no harm to see it put firmly on the record that the Government

"welcomes the agreements by the G7 countries in Tokyo to consider improved debt reduction terms for the poorest and more indebted countries, including the possibility of earlier action on reducing the stock of debt on a case by case basis in accordance with the Prime Minister's Trinidad Terms initiative."

In the past, this country and others have given money on various repayment terms to countries that have mishandled it. We have wasted our money in trying to help. It has gone to people and into accounts that it should not have got near. I should like to think that today we are much more careful in giving taxpayers' money to help bridge the gap between the industrial world and third-world countries.

Far too often, industrial countries muddle the differentiation between support for home industry and overseas aid. We need a vigorous debate to differentiate between grant support for third-world countries and boosts that are necessary from time to time to help home industry engaged in exporting or in need of some inducement to expand.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) spoke most tellingly about the difference between the industrial world and the third world, and the way in which that gap is expanding. In military terms, it is almost like people with bows and arrows trying to compete with those with machine guns. It is the duty of the industrial world to try to ensure that that gap does not become an unreasonable and unacceptable difference.

We have a duty to decide when our help is to be a grant, and when it is to be a loan. We should not muddle that. We should not give loans and then decide that they should be grants. We must make that decision right at the start. We must be far more caring and differentiating about where we give that support, and in that way show an example to other countries. We have heard quotations already this evening about how some of them operate. We must lead the way in the third world countries by giving the money as a grant. We should not expect to get the money back at a later stage.

I should mention again the slight confusion that has emerged over the Commonwealth Development Corporation. It developed substantial funds over the years. It has a capital base of nearly £800 million, and can recycle its surpluses every single year. It does not require net new capital every year to sustain its programme. It should be able to sustain gross new lending of some £200 million a year.

I suggest that it is misleading to give the impression that the Government have somehow cut its support. It will provide new loans in the years to come, and while its lending will not exceed the levels of past loan repayments, it will certainly help us go on into the future.

As a moment of mild chiding, I should like to take up the point made by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson), who made various comments about the banks. Some of those written-off debts have come back, but I suggest that many of our banks have loaned considerable sums of money on an ill-advised basis to the third world and have written off billions of pounds, which is paid for today by many British account holders and taxpayers. Should we dismiss that lightly? The banks are getting some money back, but they have had to bear tremendous pain in writing off ill-advised debts in the past.

Those who have had the forbearance to listen to me in the past on trade and industry will know that I believe that we should help our exporters and our various industrial activities. However, to come back to my original point, we should not muddle the difference between the giving of aid and our support for our exporting and internal industries. If we make that division clearer, we shall benefit the whole world.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): It is appropriate that this debate on the G7 summit, on which I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), should follow yesterday's debate. Within the past 24 hours we have debated clause 42 of the Finance Bill, which would force through VAT on fuel and thus create real poverty in Britain. What concerns me is that there are real connections to be made between the economic, social and political projects undertaken by the Government here and what is happening throughout the third world as a result of the economic and political policies pursued by the industrial nations.

I refer particularly to the pursuit of economic policies worldwide that have deliberately generated high levels of unemployment, lowered wages levels and undermined collective trade union rights. There has also been the build-up of massive public and private debt, pressure to reduce direct taxation, switches to regressive indirect taxation, drastic reductions in welfare state provision and the privatisation of essential common services.

I do not have much time in which to speak in the debate. However, I once had the privilege of meeting the Economics Minister for Benin, who was invited to go to the Paris Club meeting to renegotiate IMF terms on behalf of his country. He expressed surprise to me that at that meeting people from the western world, people from Britain, should ask why Benin did not do as Britain had done and privatise the water supply. Benin did not have a water supply, so it was a most inappropriate policy. In other words, the free market economic agenda is wrapped up by the IMF and the World bank in the language of structural adjustment, but it is the same ideological model superimposed at home and internationally.

Others have spoken about the needs of Africa and they should be high on our agenda. I shall not repeat what has been said about the needs of Africa, but we need some fresh, new, imaginative strategic thinking. I simply quote the President of Ireland, Mary Robinson, who, at her press conference at the end of her visit to Somalia last October, said:

"There needs to be a great deal more urgency about the situation. It is not acceptable that human beings are in the degrading, humiliating situation in which they find themselves, because we really have to stand back and say: 'it diminishes all of us as human beings'. I felt shamed by what I saw. Shamed. Shamed. On behalf of the European world, and the American world, and the developed world generally. What are we doing that we have not got greater conscience for it?"

She went on:

"Not only Somalis, but also the Horn of Africa in general, need new strategies, need new lateral thinking about our relationship with the continent of Africa. They need not just the United Nations and their international organisations and governments to be engaged, but women's groups, business associations, and others, to have a direct linkage of accepting responsibility."

I reiterate that plea for lateral thinking and for an injection of imagination and urgency.

Recently, a small African country, Eritrea, became independent. There was and still is great international pressure for good governance. But weeks after that country's independence a conference on the programme for the reintegration of refugees and the rehabilitation of the resettlement areas of Eritrea was held in Geneva on 6 July under the auspices of the United Nations. Apart from support for food aid and repatriation, Eritrea received pledges of only $16 million towards the $77 million requested for development.

In other words, if the promising movement towards peace and democracy now being developed in several African countries is to be supported and sustained, the flow of aid for development must be maintained and we must not move in the opposite direction. The British Government have been one of those pushing hardest for good government and democracy and are, accordingly, under a moral obligation to back the pressure with positive development aid.

9.32 pm

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): It is a particular pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). His reference to the words of Mary Robinson reminds us that the fact that 1 billion people in the world simply do not have the means to exist from day to day diminishes us all.

It is impossible to explain Somalia without remembering who armed that country. It is impossible to explain the problems of Brazil without bearing in mind the demands for tropical hardwoods. It is wrong of us to think that our actions are simply benign. It is wrong for us simply to say that, because the IMF and the World bank were set up with good intentions, they automatically have a good impact now.

During the past year, the idea that has struck me most comes from the writings of Susan George on the debt boomerang. She says that if we do not tackle these problems we may think that we are just casting off part of the world, but it will come back and hit us. It will come back and hit us on the population, the migration, the debt and the drugs fronts. If we do not turn our minds more consistently to the problems of the third world, we shall live to regret it.

What is Britain's record in this area? I want first to consider our aid record. We cannot ignore the most tangible fault, which is that there was a public commitment to 0·7 per cent. of GDP from which we are retreating year by year. The level is now 0·31 per cent. compared with 0·1 per cent. when Labour was in power. The fact that the Government have the worst growth record of any Government since the war means that the developing world is even worse off. In fact, I suspect that there is a cunning plan by the Government to attain the 0·7 per cent. target by shrinking the economy.

The developing world is threatened even more by the presence of the needy in the east of Europe. It is clear from the Foreign Secretary's choice of budget that he prefers to increase the contribution to eastern and central Europe and to cut the contribution to the developing world during the next three years. The Foreign Secretary must defend that.

The Government's defence of their aid record is extraordinary—it is that this country's aid is good. Therefore, apparently, the Government are to cut it. I could understand the defence being that they did not want to put good money after bad. But to cut aid because this country does it well is a strange defence indeed. That is especially true as the Government now distribute a higher and higher proportion of aid in a less and less efficient way. A higher proportion goes to the World bank and the IMF.

We have heard much about the damage that is done by the debt policies of those institutions, with more going through the EC. There is widespread concern that directorate-general VIII of the EC under Mr. Marin is less than efficient—even perverse—in its distribution.

Why is more and more of our aid to be deployed in a less and less efficient way? We have heard, if not convincingly, from the Prime Minister that the most vulnerable in this country will be protected from the public expenditure cuts that are on their way. We need to know from the Minister whether the poorest people in the world will be protected, or will they suffer from the dreadful hole which the Government is in?

What else have the Government done in terms of aid and development? They have disappointed many people by their failure to take the lead in many areas. The hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) reminded us of that. Africa regards this country as the pre-eminent European power, and the people of Africa look to us for guidance, certainly with regard to the World bank and IMF. The British director of that organisation holds enormous power over development policies in Africa. It is in Africa, however, that the World bank and IMF policies have failed the most. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) pointed out that more money comes out of Africa now than is put in.

The hon. Member for Broxtowe valuably pointed out, as he usually does, the amount of money that is spent on emergency relief. The reason for that is that we failed in many cases to take preventive steps early enough by diplomatic initiatives. [Interruption.] Well, I went to Somalia last year and they had plenty of water and plenty of problems. The world was deaf to Somalia for a whole year because our diplomats in Nairobi did not go to Somalia. They were forbidden to go by the Foreign Office.

If we cannot get accurate information, how can we take preventive action? The tragic situation in Somalia today, with the military intervention going wrong, has resulted from our failure to act in time. We failed to encourage the UN to take the necessary diplomatic initiatives, and we must look to the United Kingdom to take the lead in the matter.

As the Minister knows, I am also fearful about the situation in Sudan, where there is a 10-year-old civil war. I compliment the action of the Foreign Office in that case, and also the action by our ambassador in Sudan. But we should take preventive action by taking the issue to the United Nations Security Council. I am pleased that the Minister who has responsibility for foreign trade is to answer the debate, as it gives the House a chance to bring some of the issues together. He will be able to explain what the poorest of the world have gained or will gain from the G7 and GATT.

There are several major worries. Very painfully, a series of Lomé conventions—we are now up to Lomé 4—negotiated trade concessions for the poorer countries, but there are fears that GATT will wipe them out. I hope that the Minister will tell us that it is this country's objective to stop putting higher tariffs on value added goods from the third world.

Perhaps the Minister will also tell us what GATT will do about the present shameful situation whereby, through the World bank, we demand that developing countries stop subsidising their food, but we then dump subsidised EC food on them, which is what happens with beef in west Africa. The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) mentioned the destruction of the sugar cane industry in that way.

If we agree that trade is more important than aid, why, under the British presidency, was an EC development policy produced which did not mention the common agricultural policy or trade policy in general?

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Is it not a fact that successive Ministers have, through our aid budget, committed us step by step to EC programmes which lead to long-term reductions in available resources for bilateral programmes? We are being locked in incrementally so that we may not even be able to reverse the process unless there is a drastic change in the near future.

Mr. Worthington: Indeed, and that point has already been made. The reason we are locked in is that our aid is shrinking. It would be possible to increase our contribution to other organisations if we were expanding the overall amount of aid.

It has been generally agreed that debt is a matter of the utmost importance. I, too, compliment the Prime Minister on the Trinidad terms which we agree is a valuable initiative. However, as was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and confirmed by the hon. Member for Broxtowe, 91 per cent. of the debt of sub-Saharan Africa is to the international financial institutions, to the World bank and the International Monetary Fund. What can we do about that, when the constitution of those bodies forbids them to cancel debt? All that they can do is to roll over the debt from year to year. We have to ask what is going to happen to the great burden of debt which is owed to the IMF and the World bank, which now take out far more than they put in.

The World bank and the IMF are in a crisis. What can we do to make their policies more transparent? Why can we not know how our director at the World bank has voted? The Americans can. Why should an unknown civil servant and the International Development Association, which we debated on Monday evening, be allowed to spend £620 million of taxpayers' money without accounting for it? Why can we not know what is being done to increase accountability in the World bank? Why can we not know how the British director is voting on issues concerning where sustainable development is being damaged by World bank projects? What safeguards are being put in place?

The Government must surely learn from the recent scandal surrounding the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. It was an organisation which went out of control, ran amok and became self-serving. How do we know that that is not happening in the World bank or the IMF? The World bank has admitted that an increasing proportion of its projects are failing. What are we going to do to put that right?

Perhaps the Minister will tell us the World bank's philosophy, which we are supporting. It is clear that a struggle is going on in the World bank. I should like to refer to two points that have been made recently. One of them came from Larry Summers, who was previously the chief economist at the World bank—obviously a very influential person. What he said contradicted a point made by the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford. Summers said that investment in the education of girls provides far the best possible economic return through World bank activities.

The ironic thing is that the World bank and the IMF, because of their programmes, are seen as having so substantially damaged the education and health of people in the third world. Are we supporting that, or are we supporting the structural adjustment programmes?

Which side does the Minister take on the question of the struggle within the World bank with regard to debt? Does he take the side of Mr. Edward Jaycox, the vice-president for Africa, who said that the policies of the bank have been "disastrous in terms of building up the capacity of Africa to solve its own problems"?

The bank, he said, had completely failed to build up Africa's trained and skilled manpower and its institutions. The amount going into the salaries of expatriate advisers, of whom there are 100,000 in sub-Saharan Africa, was $4 billion. Do the Government agree with Mr. Jaycox?

What is the World bank policy that the Minister supports? Why cannot we be told what philosophy the Government adopt when they go to the World bank? Debt is by far the most crushing problem facing sub-Saharan Africa.

Unless the Government can give us some optimism about new thinking—lateral or of whatever other type—on how the debt burden on sub-Saharan Africa might be lifted, we will have wasted our words in this Chamber today.

9.46 pm

The Minister of Trade (Mr. Richard Needham): I do not intend to go into the debate that took place on Monday night, the report of which I read with great interest. I have a short time to wind up for the Government, but if I am unable to cover particular points that have been raised I shall write to the hon. Members concerned.

As this is an Opposition Supply day, the Government are entitled not only to defend their position but to look into some of the polices behind the Opposition's attitude to the whole question of debt, trade and development. I say to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) that we have taken the lead on debt relief for the poorest, most heavily indebted countries. I am glad that Opposition Members have given the Prime Minister credit and support for what he has done. We are taking a lead with our targeted aid programme and we have taken the lead on expanding world trade—a matter to which I shall come in a moment. In all these areas, our strategy is the same: to give developing countries as much of a stake as possible in the world economy. This matter was well referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells).

I accept that the debt crisis is not over—not least for many countries in Africa. We recognise this, as did the Tokyo summit. It is clear that there will be further financial assistance to help these countries. However, the Government have a good story to tell about debt relief for the poorest, most heavily indebted countries. We have constantly led the way in promoting international agreement on debt relief—through Toronto terms in 1988, through Trinidad terms in 1991, and now in our push for improved Trinidad terms. As my hon. Friend said, the current terms have so far benefited 17 of the poorest countries, to the tune of nearly $2 billion. I am glad that, on the question of the number of countries, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) is getting his arithmetic corrected.

Mr. Meacher: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Needham: No. I did not put any question to the hon. Gentleman, but I should like to put one to Opposition Members generally.

We are constantly asked about the 0·7 per cent. of GNP contribution to aid. It was referred to today by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel). It is the aim of all of us to reach that contribution level, but how do we get to it? It is easy to call for more aid, as the hon. Member for Oldham, West did, but it is much less easy to balance that against calls for more spending on health, education, social services, transport and every other area of public expenditure. The hon. Member for Oldham, West and his hon. Friends must face up to that difficulty.

How does the hon. Member for Oldham, West envisage that that contribution will be made in the light of the remarks of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown)? He has said that the Labour party is not proposing to raise income tax, national insurance, VAT or current borrowing. How does the hon. Member for Oldham, West square his call for an increased aid budget with the Leader of the Opposition? He has said that the Labour party will oppose the tax increases that are being imposed by the Government. He has also made it clear that the Opposition are not in favour of cuts in public expenditure when public services are in straitened circumstances.

Where is the hon. Member for Oldham, West going to find the extra £2 billion for his aid budget over the course of a Parliament if he intends to follow the advice given by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East and the Leader of the Opposition? As the hon. Gentleman knows, the figures do not add up. However important we may say the aid budget is, the hon. Gentleman cannot stand at the Dispatch Box and pretend to us that his policy is credible.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the Uruguay round and the Tokyo summit and how they had failed the developing world. He said that they were a disaster. The hon. Gentleman acknowledged, however, that ActionAid has said that trade produces six times more income for the poor countries than aid. What would the hon. Gentleman have said if the Tokyo summit had failed to reach an agreement on GATT? That would have been a true disaster.

[Mr. Needham]

I do not underestimate the importance of the problems of Africa and sub-Saharan Africa, but did the hon. Member for Oldham, West ever mention China? No. Indonesia was mentioned only by one of my hon. Friends. Vietnam, India, Pakistan, the Philippines—some of the poorest countries in the world, which stand to benefit most from improved trade—were never mentioned by Opposition Members.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Does my hon. Friend agree that, on top of restructuring debt to assist the poorest nations, Great Britain is the first to respond to famine, drought and disease all over the world? Our Hercules are in the air with surplus supplies straightaway. We can be very proud of our overseas aid. We lead the world.

Mr. Needham: I agree with my hon. Friend. Wherever disasters occur, British support and British service personnel are there.

The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) asked whether all tariffs will be abolished under the Uruguay round. He referred specifically to commodities. The hon. Gentleman knows full well, however, that not all tariffs will be abolished through negotiations under the Uruguay round. The important point is that those tariffs will be slashed and that will do a great deal to benefit the poorer countries of the world.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me about the effect of the GATT round on the developing world. The OECD study for 1992 estimated that the increase in developing countries' annual income from a successful Uruguay round could be more than $90 billion per year. The hon. Gentleman knows that that is more than the total aid budgets of the OECD countries. We do not underestimate the importance of aid, but we agree with the hon. Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor) that trade is much more important than aid.

The Opposition's policy on that will have exactly the opposite effect to what they intend because, although the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie talks about the need to open markets and ensure that goods from developing countries can be freely traded in this country, a short time later some Opposition Members come to see me, leading delegations of people who want to stop goods coming here from developing countries on the basis of social dumping. I could give the hon. Gentleman a list —I shall not do so tonight—of delegations led by his hon. Friends saying that they do not want goods from China, the Philippines, or the poorer parts of north Africa because it is social dumping. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Worthington: Which of the countries with structural adjustment programmes still have tariff barriers? Apart from the multi-fibre arrangement—eventually—will any EC barriers come down as a consequence of the Tokyo summit?

Mr. Needham: Of course EC barriers will come down as a consequence of the GATT round. They will come down across the whole range. Once we achieve an agreement on GATT, there will be massive tariff reductions.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the multi-fibre arrangement. We agree that textiles, as a commodity, should be phased out. Naturally, that should be done over a reasonable time, but it is one way to remove barriers to developing countries' exports. We would not deny them the opportunities to compete in that sector, which is why the United Kingdom supports the phasing out of textiles as a commodity and better access to our markets.

However, that was not always the view of Opposition Members. I have articles, admittedly from 1985, entitled

"Labour's plan to save the textile makers"

and

"Labour aims to curtail flood of textile imports"—

[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman asked about the multi-fibre arrangement and I am saying what the Leader of the Opposition's view was on that. The Labour party will find themselves in a muddle when trying to devise a policy to help developing countries because of their economic policy at home.

The Government believe that we must assist companies to invest in the third world. British companies know better than Opposition Members about the benefits of United Kingdom investment in the developing world. Direct investment by United Kingdom companies in the developing world is very large. In 1991, our companies invested £1·4 billion in developing countries, representing some 16 per cent. of foreign direct investment. That is how to create jobs, develop the industrial base, transfer technology and enhance economic capacity.

Opposition Members still prefer to talk about handouts instead of persuading British companies to provide long-term jobs because the effect of the Opposition's economic policy at home is to increase costs and deny developing countries the opportunity to send their products here. Last Monday the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) showed the true colours of his party. He said that we should

"reintroduce exchange controls and introduce import controls".—[Official Report, 12 July 1993; Vol. 228, c. 681.]

The hon. Member for Oldham, West laughs. He may disown those views, but if Opposition Members stand for the minimum wage and the social chapter of the Maastricht treaty, and then say that they want free trade, what are the consequences for workers in this country? What does that add up to for the workers in this country? What will happen to the workers of the developing world who want to export their goods into a country where such additional add-on costs will put our people out of work? The result will be that ever-larger numbers of delegations of hon. Members will come to my office to try to ensure that the goods stop coming in.

The choice before the House is clear: do we offer developing countries investment, training, technology, jobs and an opportunity to buy and sell in the markets of the world—as the Government believe—or do we follow the Opposition path of minimum wages, minimum hours and maximum trade barriers, which will be the inevitable consequences of their policy?

I urge my hon. Friends to reject the Opposition's contradictory position, reject protectionism, and reject an approach which encourages continued dependency for developing countries. I urge the House to support our policy of enabling developing countries to support themselves through the tools of overseas investment and free trade.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

MADAM SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House, noting the problems of indebtedness and restricted trade access in hampering the growth of developing countries, welcomes the agreements by the G7 countries in Tokyo to consider improved debt reduction terms for the poorest and most indebted countries, including the possibility of earlier action on reducing the stock of debt on a case by case basis in accordance with the Prime Minister's Trinidad Terms initiative, to make all efforts to enhance development assistance, and to seek to achieve a successful Uruguay Round before the end of the year.

PETITIONS

New Town, Cambridgeshire

10.16 pm

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I beg leave to present a petition signed by more than 2,000 of my constituents. The views that it contains are supported by many more of my constituents; local, district and county councillors; and me.

The petition concerns a wholly absurd proposal to build a new settlement in the heart of my constituency. I have twice explained the objections on the Floor of the House, once as long ago as six years. The petition reads:

The Petition of the Parishioners of twelve parishes around and including Bourne and Caxton in the county of Cambridgeshire—which may not be wholly unfamiliar to you, Madam Speaker—whose names and signatures are included herein declares that there is a substantial case against the application for planning consent to build a new town in the locality and for which there is no need. Particular attention is drawn to the state of the housing market and to the new lower housing need estimates published by the County Council as compared to those current at the time of the inquiry. Another material matter is the recently revised and lower status of the A45 west of Cambridge. The dualling of this road was identified by the inspector as a vital factor in site location. Further that the question of traffic generation through Bourn village has not been adequately addressed in the spirit suggested by the Minister in his decision letter. If built the new town would irreparably damage the environs of many local village communities. The Petitioners herein respectfully and earnestly request the House of Commons to call upon the Minister to give adequate direction to those charged with the consideration of the issues by firmly declaring that Government advice in the form of planning policy guidelines should be carefully consulted to take account of those matters where material and significant changes have occurred in the planning context since the public inquiry. Further that these changes are sufficient in themselves to justify the Minister calling in the competing applications and decide that circumstances having changed so dramatically since the inquiry there is no useful purpose to be served in pursuing the concept of a new settlement in this locality. The Petitioners herein remain your obedient servants and humbly wait upon the pleasure of the House.

To lie upon the Table.

Wellfield Hospital

10.19 pm

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn Hatfield): I am privileged to have the opportunity to present a petition on behalf of the Wellfield hospital action group. The petition, which has been signed by over 2,000 of my constituents, concerns the wellbeing of the former residents of Wellfield hospital. These people are, in the last years of their lives, unhappy and isolated from their families in their present location in Wellfield ward 2, East Herts hospital, Stansted road, Hertford.

The situation has been brought about by total mismanagement on the part of North West Thames regional health authority, under the chairmanship of Sir William Doughty, and its officers. Promises were made to the petitioners, which have been blatantly disregarded to allow further funding of the new Westminster and Chelsea hospital.

[Mr. David Evans]

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will recognise our call—by the Wellfield hospital action group—upon the East Herts NHS trust to rebuild Wellfield Hospital IMMEDIATELY. And your Petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Bypass, Ambleside

10.22 pm

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I have the honour to present to the House a petition sent to me by my constituent, Mr. Cook, of Ambleside. You will know, Madam Speaker, that Ambleside is one of the great jewels of the Lake district. The petition has been put together by Mr. Cook and eight stalwart canvassers. They have approached, or tried to contact, virtually all my 2,250 constituents who are on the electoral roll in Ambleside. They succeeded in contacting 1,314 people—that is, 58·4 per cent. of the total electoral roll.

The petition is about the need to construct a bypass round Ambleside. The petition says:

The excessive volume of traffic on the A591 road through our town is causing unacceptable levels of congestion, noise, pollution and delay, making the everyday commerce of the town difficult, dangerous and unpleasant for its residents, and further threatening its prosperity by rendering it unattractive to the visitors on whom its economic wellbeing depends.

Of the 1,314 people approached, no fewer than 1,046 —that is, 79·6 per cent.—voted for a bypass, compared with 188, or 14·3 per cent., who were against, and 80, or 6·1 per cent., who abstained.

This is a remarkable petition. It means that those who expressed their desire to have a bypass constituted 46·5 per cent. of the total electorate. Their purpose was to demonstrate to the House their hope that the petition would finally enshrine the overwhelming desire of the people of Ambleside to put a stop to the appalling traffic congestion in that beautiful town, and that a bypass would be constructed.

The petition ends:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House will take measures to require the highway authority, Cumbria county council, to initiate the construction of a bypass road following the route described as the orange route in that council's 1992 consultative documents, and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Sub-post Offices

10.24 pm

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I beg leave to present a petition against the removal by the Government of the right to receive pension and benefit payments at local sub-post offices.

The petition was collected by sub-postmasters and postmistresses and by pensioners and claimants in York, to whom I pay tribute. It is signed by county councillor Janet Lucker, of Clifton Dale, York, and by L. W. Quinn, the secretary of York Labour party, of Bramble Dene, Woodthorpe, York. The petition is supported by me and it reads as follows:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland assembled. The Humble Petition of the people of York Sheweth that the Government is proposing to make compulsory the method of paying pensions and other benefits by Automated Credit Transfer and that we, the undersigned, vigorously protest against this proposal for the following reasons:

(1) The small post office is very often the hub of the community, performing a very important social service.

(2) Many small post offices rely on paying pensions and other benefits to survive.

(3) Many people rely on the post office to cash their benefits and in some cases may not have a bank account.

(4) Compulsory payment of benefits by automated credit transfer takes away choice from people.

The petition is signed by 9,367 of my constituents and concludes with the following words:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will urge the Secretary of State for Social Services to give people the right to choose to receive pension and benefit payments at their local post office, recognising the benefits of this to the individual and community.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

VAT on Fuel

10.28 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): I have the honour to present a petition from residents of Barnsley who protest against the Government's decision to impose value added tax on domestic fuel and power.

The petition of the residents of Barnsley, some 2,000, in total,

Sheweth that the recent disgraceful announcement of VAT increases on gas and electricity bills has filled the people of Barnsley with deep concern because of the consequential hardship these increases will have on old age pensioners, one parent families and, in general, poorer members of society. They believe these increases to be to the long-term detriment of those least well off in Barnsley and throughout the nation. Hundreds of people of Barnsley have expressed their concern by signing this petitiin because they feel they are neither economically or socially justified.

The petitioners end their petition by saying:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House will take measures to see that these increases will not proceed because of the social and economic hardship for pensioners, one parent families and communities.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Hip Replacement Operations

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Patnick.]

10.28 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): This is a remarkable story. It is about a scandal at the heart of the national health service, leading to a wanton waste of millions of pounds and to an immeasurable and unnecessary amount of human suffering. Forty thousand hip operations take place in Britain every year. They provide renewed mobility and an end to acute suffering for the great majority of those who receive them. In part, it is a great success story. However, there is another side to it.

Many senior surgeons have expressed deep anxieties about the Government's policy. Earlier this year, the British Orthopaedic Association withdrew from discussions with the Government over best practice guidelines. The main charge is that there has been a deterioration in the quality of operations, possibly as a result of over-emphasis on the quantity of operations.

The number of failed operations has mushroomed. In the 1980s, the number of failures trebled to 12 per cent and it is feared that that rate will rise to 33 per cent. In an article in the British Medical Journal in March this year, Dr. Bulstrode, a former orthopaedic surgeon at the John Radcliffe Hospital, Oxford, described what he called "designer hips". They are newly developed implants that are expensively designed. Factories are tooled up and the product is developed and marketed at great cost. Most designer hips are indistinguishable from the traditional hips that have existed for a long time. Some of the new ones are successful, but others fail—they usually quietly disappear from the scene without leaving a trace because there is no register of failures.

The standard traditional hip replacement—mainly the Charnley, which was designed about 30 years ago—can be sold for as little as £100 and has a failure rate of less than 1 per cent. per year. The newer "designer" implants can cost up to £1,500. Most are untested and unproven and some are failing within four to five years.

I would like to present precise figures of what has been happening in the United Kingdom, but that is impossible—not because I have not diligently prepared for this debate, but because the figures are simply not known. On 14 February, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health told me that the Government have no record of the success and failure rates of hip prostheses used in this country. Luckily, one country has done the work. Sweden has conducted detailed research on 93,000 hip replacements. Among many other useful bits of information, it was discovered that one implant—the Christensen hip—has an atrocious record. It was used in more than 5,000 operations and virtually not one of them lasted four years.

The cost of that designer hip is an estimated $20 million in the revision operations required, plus the anguish of the thousands of victims. Do we know if there has been a similar mass failure here? There has almost certainly been such a mass failure, but we have no knowledge of it because so many of the prostheses that have been introduced in the past 20 years have quietly disappeared without any national record.

In 1971, there was only one type of implant—the Charnley. There are at least 34 on the market now. Dr. Bulstrode said:

"There is now more money in design than in success rates. Every year there is a new colour, a new shape, a new coating."

He estimates that if every surgeon used the most reliable model, the annual cost of revision operations would be £200 million. If we continue to use unproven implants, the cost will rise to about £600 million in the next 10 years.

In July 1992, the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin had this to say:

"There are no formal controls for new joint designs nor for their marketing. The newer hips should be considered experimental and this should be made explicit when seeking the patient's informed consent to surgery."

How can clinicians, let alone patients, exercise choice? How can they make informed decisions? There are no statutory tests that hip replacements must satisfy before they can be marketed, nor is there any centrally held information. I recently asked the Secretary of State for Health what plans she had to introduce a national register. She told me that she had no such plans. The manufacturing registration scheme of the Department of Health is voluntary and has in no way deterred manufacturers from launching suspect and unproven designs. The Government lack the courage to compel manufacturers to meet statutory standards and to subject them to the kind of close monitoring that takes place in the United States and in many other countries.

A point strongly made in the report by the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs in 1991 on elective surgery was why it was that drugs had to undergo rigorous tests before they could be introduced and prescribed when implants were treated differently. The dangers are just as great. The damage caused by an inadequate hip implant is not easily rectified. Dr. Michael Wroblewski—Charnley's successor in Wigan, where the technique was pioneered—says:

"The first time is the best time. After that it is salvage."

When the first operation is carried out, a great deal of the good, healthy bone has to be sacrificed. In perhaps his most stark comment, Dr. Bulstrode said:

"I could go home tonight, knock up a hip in the garden shed, bring it in tomorrow, sterilise it and just whack it into a patient and there's no law in the land to stop me."

Revision operations drain NHS resources and lengthen waiting lists. They take nearly twice as long as primary operations and require longer hospital stays. One revision means that two primary operations have to be cancelled.

The Government have long been obsessed with the methods and the language of the market. Increasingly, they apply their ideology to everything, including health care. Understandable concern about waiting times has spurred the Government into precipitate action. The Government have maximised bed throughput by minimising standards. The modern health service manager is subjected to performance-related pay and has one overriding objective—to treat as many patients as possible. That is the measure of successful management and, in isolation, it is extremely dangerous and damaging. Higher productivity cannot be the sole criterion when the raw material is a human patient. The value of an operation cannot be measured by knocking one number off the waiting list. It must be assessed carefully over months and years.

Specialist orthopaedic surgeons have a high success rate. It is surprising to know that in Britain we have the lowest percentage of specialist orthopaedic surgeons of any western country. What is happening with the conveyor-belt surgery that is being cranked up to maximum productivity is that more and more non-specialists are being employed. The specialist hip or orthopaedic centres are losing patients to general hospitals simply because they happen to have a surgeon available. A short-term reduction in waiting lists is followed by an influx of patients requiring revision. A report in The Guardian quotes one specialist, Mr. Khalid Drabu, a consultant surgeon at East Surrey hospital, as saying:

"An artificial hip can and should last 15 to 20 years, but we've got a tidal wave of patients returning within four to eight years and many sooner."

What do the Government offer? Answers to parliamentary questions reveal that the Government have no register of revisions, no statistics on which implants fail, no database to explain what is happening and no study —there is one study of Trent—as comprehensive as the Swedish one which would identify the rogue prostheses. They have no plan and they have no strategy, except perhaps the lame excuse that was given to me in a letter —that the European Community would come galloping to their rescue.

In a letter to me, the Minister says that a European CE marking will apply to hip implants, and that it is intended to come into force

"on 1 January 1995 with a transitional period that will extend to about mid 1998."

That is five long years away, whereas the misery, the tragedy and the waste is happening now, and is still evolving—a great medical scandal. We need action from the Minister now. We need him to say tonight that he will commit himself to setting up a national register of hip replacements which will identify the rogue prostheses and the least competent surgeons, both of which are formidable elements in the scandal that we are discussing.

We want immediate short-term studies on new operations. These can be done easily. It is possible to measure accurately through minute X-rays the tiny migrations that take place in the first six months after an operation. That can be plotted to show what will happen over the next five or, indeed, 20 years. The technology is there. We must do that now.

We need a thorough investigation into the selling and marketing of prostheses by manufacturers. We hear odd stories of inducements being offered. We know of cases in which improper commercial pressures are being put on surgeons and others in the health service. We need more professionally trained orthopaedic surgeons. We need a system of audit that rewards NHS managers and medical staff for the quality, not the quantity, of their work.

These are not new concerns. This letter was written by Mr. Michael Freeman, the present president of the British Orthopaedic Association. He demands that we take steps to prevent "the unlimited proliferation of indistinguishably different or bad prostheses".

That letter was written on 13 November 1973. Some 20 years later another distinguished orthopaedic surgeon wrote to Mr. Freeman, pointing out that that 1973 letter probably initiated the interest of orthopaedic surgeons in the field. He said:

"For all these years we have been struggling to get some scheme off the ground. The sadness is that even when it had been accepted by all the various bodies, even the Minister himself, absolutely nothing happened."

That letter was written on 25 March this year.

There have been 20 years of vain struggle. The legacy of Government inactivity is now exacerbated by market forces coming into the health service. Inducements are offered by greedy profiteers. The tradition of care, high science and best quality medicine is being corrupted by the Government's devotion to market forces.

10.42 pm

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on obtaining an Adjournment debate on this important topic. The debate is timely and I know that he has a long-standing, close personal interest in the topic. Not many people would give up the chance of representing Britain in the 400 metre hurdles in next year's Olympic games just to have an Adjournment debate on hip and knee joint replacement surgery.

My hon. Friend rightly referred to the topic of the debate as yet another scandal story about how the health service operates. I am pleased that, although I am speaking as Labour's Front-Bench health spokesman in Wales, it is the Government's English Under-Secretary of State for Health who will respond, because that will avoid any possible problems in relation to the quasi-judicial functions that the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Health occasionally have.

I intend to add some local interest and to refer to the Yellow Ribbon story in relation to knee and hip joint replacements that are carried out at the Prince of Wales orthopaedic hospital. It is in my constituency, but it serves virtually the whole of Wales for replacements if the waiting time has exceeded the patients charter guideline. That waiting time was 18 months, though an attempt is being made to reduce it to 12 months now. I do not criticise the unique method used by the Welsh Office under this Government of having specialist "treatment centres", which do not exist in England, simply to treat those who have been on the waiting list for a long time. The centres treat cataracts and there is one in my constituency at the Prince of Wales orthopaedic hospital, Rhydlafar, for knee and hip joint replacements.

I applaud the treatment centre phenomenon, but the surgeon in charge of the Rhydlafar centre has experienced considerable difficulties and has now been suspended on full pay pending disciplinary hearings. Those hearings will obviously take their course in the usual way, but I raise the matter in the House because I suspect that there is a strong connection between the point raised by my hon. Friend and the treatment centre.

A specialist treatment centre for patients on the waiting list for knee and hip joint replacements takes bread out of the mouths of the orthopaedic consultants who, to a man —they are all men—also operate at BUPA and other private hospitals in Cardiff and Newport. I believe that there is one private centre in Newport at a Catholic foundation hospital and there is a BUPA hospital in Cardiff. Most orthopaedic surgeons tend to share their time between the two.

If a treatment centre is set up with the specific aim of taking all the patients from anywhere in Wales who have been waiting for 18 months—I think that it is now 12 months—since first seeing a consultant for treatment, free to the purchasing health authority, that obviously takes bread out of the mouths of the private consultants who would love to be treating them at £3,000 or £4,000 a time at a BUPA hospital.

To make matters worse, on 1 April 1993 at the Prince of Wales hospital, Rhydlafar, a third operating theatre was opened. The triple suite there now means that the work can be dealt with rapidly and, in theory, the waiting list could be removed altogether. That, in turn, takes the bread out of the mouth of the BUPA and other private hospitals with orthopaedic facilities.

That places enormous pressure on orthopaedic consultants' income from private work. The more work that is done under the NHS and the more the waiting lists for hip and knee joint operations under the NHS shrink, the more one removes the incentive for private operations at BUPA and other hospitals. That sets up enormous tensions between the surgeons who are best at cutting the waiting lists and the surgeons who make most of their money from private work.

A surgeon can either be one of the boys, take it slowly and not work too fast in order to leave plenty of work to be done privately, or he can be as committed to the NHS as it is possible to be and thereby upset his colleagues. Attitudes to patient care and the functions of the NHS must be borne in mind when specific treatment centres are set up as part of Government policy.

At the Prince of Wales hospital, Rhydlafar, the top orthopaedic surgeon involved in knee and hip joint replacement, who is in charge of the contract from the Welsh Office, has been told to cut the waiting list. Patients waiting longer than the maximum time allowed by the patients charter, whether they are from north, mid or south Wales, have to be treated free, at no cost to the patient or the purchasing health authority from which the patient originates. They can be dealt with immediately at the Prince of Wales hospital. That is what should, in principle, be done.

But that has probably led to a climate of jealousy and tension between professionals which may well, in turn, have led to the suspension of the director of the treatment centre, Ian Mackie, on 17 June pending disciplinary proceedings for a series of charges of gross misconduct, professional misconduct, and so on.

Whether the charges have been trumped up, as many people believe, I am not in a position to say, but the tension between the various professionals in knee and hip joint replacement surgery has been building up for a long time. The treatment centre has been putting pressure on the private income of those who have been largely dependent on performing knee and hip joint work at BUPA and other private facility hospitals in south Wales. It is, therefore, fortunate that the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), will be dealing with the issue, because the Welsh Office Minister might at some time in the future have to deal with quasi-judicial appeals. The Minister here tonight will not have to, so he will not be embarrassed by my referring to the issue.

Since Mr. Ian Mackie has been suspended from duty, members of staff, patients and others have been wearing yellow ribbons to show their support for him. I was told of an incident only today when the acting unit manager visited the hospital to get members of staff to remove "Back Mackie" stickers from their cars while they are on hospital premises. That is getting heavy; people should be free to express their opinions about the surgeon but they are clearly not able to do so because of the health authority's sensitivity and the fact that the authority is undertaking disciplinary proceedings.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West made an extremely important point about the lack of guidelines. Biomet and Zimmer are the two companies which are in dispute and are behind the present incident that led to the suspension. They are or were American owned. Nobody knows how far such companies can go in encouraging consultants to be demonstrators or lecturers at international conferences. Are they supposed to ask consultants to demonstrate their equipment, or is it a breach of disciplinary procedures? We do not know, because there are no guidelines laid down by the British Medical Association or the hospital service. In the absence of any satisfactory guidelines from the NHS, I am pleased that my hon. Friend has raised the matter tonight so that the Minister can tell us what the Government's position is in a matter on which they do not appear to have any policy.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I congratulate the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on raising this important subject. I know of his strong interest in hip replacement operations.

The medical development of the prosthetic replacement of joints culminated in the 1960s in the first hip replacements for patients. The development of the early hip prostheses owes much to the ingenuity of Sir John Charnley in Manchester and the pioneering work carried out by Mckee and Watson-Ferrar in Norwich. In less than 30 years, other joint prostheses have been added, but the one that meets the greatest need of people all over the world remains the hip joint replacement.

Many problems have been recognised in the use of prostheses, such as that of operating on elderly patients. In the first 15 years or so, it was the elderly lady with the fractured neck or femur and those suffering from the degenerative condition of osteoarthritis who were the natural priorities. In the 1960s, however, doctors and patients immediately recognised that a hip replacement offered effective treatment for debilitating or depressing health problems. From the wheelchair or from confinement to the house and dependence on others for simple activities, people could become free of the pain of osteoarthritis and able to lead more independent lives.

The numbers of hip replacements rose rapidly. In England in 1969——

Mr. Flynn: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Sackville: If I do, I shall not be able to get through what I am trying to say, so I would rather not.

In England in 1969, there were 10,869 operations. By 1979, the number had risen to 28,788. Recently published data show that more than 50,000 operations were carried out in 1989-90. Total hip replacements have been one of the outstanding success stories of the national health service. Through this operation, skilled surgeons are making a major contribution to improving the quality of life for many thousands of people every year.

[Mr. Sackville]

As the hon. Gentleman said, many prostheses have been brought into the market since the early days of Charnley, and the majority of the 800-plus orthopaedic surgeons are performing this operation every week in the national health service. The success of the operation has brought new developments in its wake. Surgeons are now extending the range of patients for whom it is considered beneficial to provide prostheses—younger, fitter, more active people who expect to return not only to domestic activities in comfort but to the energetic pursuits they enjoyed before joint disease slowed them down. We can justifiably take pride in the achievements of the national health service in providing such a large number of operations and in extending hip prostheses——

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Sackville: I have only four minutes left.

Mr. Jones: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order.

Mr. Sackville: We must also recognise that there is an implication for the design and long-term performance of the prostheses themselves, subjected to much greater wear and tear over the longer lifespan of those younger patients. Much research and development worldwide is concentrating on the problems that this presents to patients and their doctors. The sorts of areas of research aimed at reducing the effects of wear include the materials prostheses are made of, the precise design and, thus, the distribution of stresses during movement, and the value of the use of various types of cement to fix the prostheses in place and whether cement is needed at all.

Of course, there is not consensus among clinicians about individual prostheses. Indeed, as has been said, we have insufficient knowledge in many areas. However, we know that the life expectancy of a hip prosthesis is reckoned to be between 10 and 15 years. We also know that 9·5 per cent. of all hip replacement operations in 1990-91 were revisions. Of course, this does not give us a true percentage revision rate. Estimates of revisions vary considerably. Many experts would agree on about 10 per cent. Revisions are an important load on the national health service resources, and we are all—patients, doctors and everyone involved in the service—concerned to reduce that burden of distress and to maximise the use of resources so that more patients may have a satisfactory outcome and more money may be available for providing treatment.

In the United Kingdom, total hip replacements are classified as medical devices and, as yet, are not subject to specific legislation. Voluntary controls have, however, been applied for many years by the Department of Health, under the manufacturer registration scheme, which has been in operation since 1986. This involves the assessment of the manufacturer's facilities to ensure they meet the Department's requirements for quality assurance, including control of product design. The requirements for total hip replacements are included in "Quality Systems for Orthopaedic Implants", which was published in 1990. This calls for compliance with BS 5750, as well as specific materials and product standards.

The list of approved manufacturers is supplied to the NHS and the private sector, which are strongly recommended to buy only from registered companies.

Mr. Flynn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Sackville: Another important control is the Department's——

Mr. Flynn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it a point of order for the Chair?

Mr. Flynn: It is, Sir. I appeal to you, as the defender of the rights of Back Benchers. My speech tonight was my first Back-Bench speech in the Chamber for more than 12 months. The Minister is abusing his position by ignoring all the——

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

1. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the PSBR since 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

8. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of public sector borrowing.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): In the first two months of the financial year, the public sector borrowing requirement was £9·3 billion. A deficit of that magnitude is too high and we intend to reduce it.

Mr. Williams: During the 1992 Budget debates, the Chancellor's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Kinston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), published Treasury forecasts of a borrowing requirement of £32 billion this year, falling to £25 billion next year, £19 billion the following year and £6 billion by 1996-97. In reality, we have a deficit of £50 billion this year and, far from falling away as was predicted, it is a recurring deficit, the Chancellor's biggest problem and an albatross around the neck of the country's economy, perhaps for years to come. Can he explain to me, and to the people of this country, why we were so misled at the time of the general election, and how the Government have got us into this mess?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman will find that all forecasts for the PSBR tend to be hedged around with uncertainty. A range of forecasts is being made about next year and £50 billion is the Government's current forecast, which is at the upper end of the range. One thing of which I am quite sure is that the forecasts will all have changed by the time that I get to the Budget, let alone at any other time. I propose to make a judgment in the light of the circumstances prevailing when we get to the November Budget.

The hon. Gentleman makes a valuable point, however. The deficit was not planned, or the result of anticipated action. To the surprise of almost every forecaster, the recession in this country was more persistent and lasted longer than anyone expected, thereby causing a longer fall in revenues than anyone expected. The Government have to face up to the consequences of that, and Britain will be one of the foremost countries in Europe in tackling its fiscal deficit.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, unlike the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), the Conservative party has no intention of further expanding the PSBR and placing a greater burden on future generations? Also, was it not the last Labour Government who had to run to the International Monetary Fund because they could not control public spending either?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is correct. Quite rightly, we face questioning about the size of the PSBR from the Opposition as well as from our own supporters. I get pressed by Conservative Back Benchers to take vigorous action to deal with it. It is impossible for either the Liberals or the Labour party to make a speech from the Opposition Benches without advocating measures that would increase the amount of public sector debt and borrowing. That makes their contribution to debate on the issue seem somewhat irrelevant to real life and to the task of sustaining our recovery and getting out of the recession.

Mr. Sheldon: In the light of the horrendous PSBR, why is the Chancellor of the Exchequer excluding the one area that is easy for him to handle—the level of higher rates of income tax? Those were reduced at a time when the Government thought that the economy was doing well. Now that he understand the reality, why does he not reverse the process?

Mr. Clarke: Because throughout the 1980s extremely valuable supply-side effects resulted from reducing direct taxation from the disgraceful and punitive level at which it was left by the previous Government. I have made no decisions about taxation for the Budget.

The right hon. Gentleman, with his experience, knows perfectly well that the revenue-raising consequences of increasing the top rates of income tax are quite slight, but he typifies what I just described—that the only solution that the Opposition can ever think of, in response to such problems, is to put up taxation on somebody or other. If that is the Opposition's only approach, it is damaging to the country's prospects of doing well in the economic world.

Sir Peter Tapsell: In the same spirit that I heretically urged his predecessor, in the salad days of Friedmanite monetarism, to show caution about the Treasury's capacity accurately to measure sterling M3, may I now counsel—it may not be necessary, but, as I have already prepared the question, I shall go ahead—a little caution to my right hon. and learned Friend before he prostrates himself before the altar of a £50 billion PSBR estimate, because that notoriously unreliable statistic could lead us into unnecessary difficulty? As experience has shown, the outcome may prove to be billions wide of the mark—no pun intended—either way.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend, who knows me well, realises that I have never drunk of the pure milk of monetarism, any more than he or Lord Lawson did. That remains my view, which is why I dealt with some scepticism with the question about previous forecasts of the size of the public sector borrowing requirement.

Nevertheless, it is important to underline the fact that we face a serious problem. The figure that I gave in answer to the question from the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) shows that, at present, the monthly PSBR is running in line with the forecast. If it falls faster than I expect, I can probably deal with any problems that that may cause with considerable ease.

However, it is preferable for me to take those forecasts as the best that we have and ensure that I do not just assume that things will come out better but behave prudently and ensure that we are certain that we will get our fiscal deficit down. At the moment, it is one of the principal obstacles that would otherwise lie in the way of sustaining our recovery, which is why it is so blindly irresponsible of Opposition Members simply to suggest that I put up some spending and some taxes.

Ms Harman: Will the Chancellor tell the House that he totally repudiates the proposals of the Tory 1992 Group, particularly its proposal that he should cut 5 per cent. of the public sector work force? Given that that is 300,000 people and that making them unemployed would add £2·7 billion to the dole bill, does he agree that the way to reduce the deficit is not to put more people out of work but to bring unemployment down?

Mr. Clarke: I had an extremely friendly and useful discussion with the executive of the 1992 Group, who presented me with proposals to deal with the problem. Their proposals were infinitely more worked out than any yet produced by the Labour or Liberal parties. I share the instincts of my colleagues in the 1992 committee working group—I think that they call it that—that, in the interests of the economy and taxpayers, we should look first at means of restraining public expenditure. It is hopeless to regard public services, as the hon. Lady always has, as a kind of job creation agency. We can deliver high-quality public services in a more cost-effective way. One has only to look at the effects of contracting out on local government services, and the amount that that is now saving council tax payers in various parts of the country, to see what can be achieved.

European Courts

3. Dr. Godman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last discussed with his ministerial colleagues from other member states of the European Community the question of additional financial assistance being given to the Court of Auditors and the European Court of Justice; and if he will make a statement.

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): The last formal meeting of the Budget Council of Ministers was on 16 November 1992, when we discussed the 1993 Community budget, including provision for the Court of Auditors and Court of Justice. Since then, discussions have proceeded informally and through officials.

Dr. Godman: Are Ministers aware of the serious difficulties encountered by the European Court of Justice in ensuring the timeous translation of cases submitted to it by member states, the opinions of its advocate-generals and its own judgments? Does he agree that there is no point in seeking to ensure that the European Court of Justice and the Court of Auditors carry out their work in ensuring compliance with Community law if they are so badly financed by member states by way of the budget?

Sir John Cope: I am certainly aware of some of the delays that take place in the Court of Justice, although they do not occur so much in the Court of Auditors. Both institutions have had increases in financial assistance of an average of 10 per cent. a year for the past couple of years. I do not think that is bad and it means that they do not need such a large increase this year.

Mr. Sykes: Will my right hon. Friend consider ceasing financing the antics of the European Court of Justice altogether and does he think that it is right for it to sit in judgment of the tourist beaches in Britain, especially when so many Mediterranean coastlines and beaches are awash with sewage?

Sir John Cope: One cannot agree with all the judgments that courts make, but that is not a reason for ceasing to finance them or abolishing them altogether.

Growth Rate

4. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what comparisons the European Commission has made between Britain's projected growth rate over the next two years and the growth rate in other countries of the EC.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The European Commission expects that Britain will be the fastest growing major Community country in both this year and next.

Mr. Thompson: On the day when unemployment is continuing to fall in my constituency of Norwich, North and throughout the country, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that over-regulation of the social and labour markets can damage growth, as has happened in Spain, for example, which has one of the highest unemployment rates in Europe? Will he comment on the folly of those in the House who seek to add to the burdens on industry at a time when business is reviving and unemployment is falling?

Mr. Clarke: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. We have the highest proportion of population in work of any country in the European Community with the exception of Denmark and, I think, Luxembourg. We have always shown the capacity to create jobs more quickly than other European countries because we have avoided the tightly regulated labour markets and the excessive burdens on industry, which are part of the tradition of some continental countries. It is a pity that that tradition is being reinforced by the social chapter making problems worse, in my opinion, in Germany, Spain and elsewhere. It is extremely important that we in Britain stick to our opt-out from the social chapter, which is helping to achieve a much more buoyant recovery in our labour market.

Mr. Trimble: It not it the case that better prospects for the United Kingdom growth rate are due to the fact that we were ejected from the exchange rate mechanism and were thus able to reduce interest rates and reduce the level of sterling? Is not the last thing that we want now either to see interest rates maintained at a higher level than necessary or to see sterling appreciate? Is not there a case for some action on that front?

Mr. Clarke: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question in my opinion is no. The five-points reduction in interest rates that we achieved before we left the ERM was as important a contribution to our recovery as the four-point reduction in interest rates that followed. We were seeing the beginnings of recovery before we left the ERM and we are now seeing the results of many of the supply-side changes that we made in the British economy.

Obviously, the hon. Gentleman will not expect me to answer questions on any further action on interest rates. I shall make judgments as and when they are necessary in the light of the monetary guidelines that I have laid out before the House.

Mr. David Martin: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the way in which to create real jobs is to have sustained economic growth, rather than the Keynesian-inspired spending sprees supported by the Opposition parties?

Mr. Clarke: What is now called Keynesian does not often bear much resemblance to the work of John Maynard Keynes, who was very good on monetary policy. I agree that I do not think that John Maynard Keynes or anyone else would have advocated a spending spree to boost the economy at a time of a large fiscal deficit of the kind that we are carrying and is being forecast. That is not an option open to us. Unfortunately, it is an option which is usually seized by the Labour and Liberal parties because they are so detached from the real world.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Should not the Chancellor be alarmed rather than complacent about the finding of the competitiveness unit published this week that British productivity is 25 per cent. below our main competitors, that what it calls our low skills base and research effort are among the worst in Europe, that our national income per head is falling behind that of Finland, Iceland and Italy and that it is now falling to the levels in Spain and Portugal? Amid all those challenges, and now that we have a new Chancellor, where are the new policies?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman has taken some selective readings from the extremely valuable document on competitiveness produced yesterday. At least it has enabled him to ask a question without adding to the public sector borrowing requirement, as far as I noticed. He comments on our level of productivity. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is right to point out that our productivity is still below that of some of our major competitors, most notably the Japanese.

Throughout the 1980s, we have had the fastest improvement in productivity of any of the G7 nations. It shows how bad things were in 1979 that we still have not caught up with our foremost competitors. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the good news today, yesterday and the day before, he will see that the improvements in productivity in British industry during the recovery are quite remarkable and have contributed to the 3 per cent. increase in manufacturing output compared with a year ago, which is the first substantial achievement of this recovery.

Mr. Wilkinson: Has my right hon. and learned Friend seen the latest statistics on the rapid and dramatic decline in car sales in EC countries? Sales there have dropped by no less than 17 per cent. over the past six months, whereas in this country which, thank goodness, is out of the exchange rate mechanism and can again enjoy the benefits of low interest rates and growing demand, we have had double-digit increases in car sales. Would not the French and the Spanish industrialists, for example, agree that the British are much luckier than they are because we are not constrained by artificially high interest rates?

Mr. Clarke: There are other countries that were forced out of the ERM and not all of them are enjoying a British recovery. In terms of the ERM, my hon. Friend is right to point out that the buoyant state of car sales in this country is not matched in other major centres in the European Community. The fact is—let me be cautious again—that we are showing some signs of recovery and it is being sustained at the moment, although we must persevere to keep that up and trust that it strengthens.

In Germany, in France and even in Japan, there are falls in manufacturing output on the latest figures, whereas we have just seen the encouraging figures showing 3 per cent. more than a year ago in our manufacturing output announced only two days ago.

Bank of England

6. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy regarding payment for work carried out at the Bank of England by sub-contractors; and if he will make a statement.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Portillo): Under the Bank of England charter of 1946, such management matters are for the court of directors of the Bank and not for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understand that the Bank maintains a policy of prompt payment against validated invoices for work carried out by its contractors.

Mr. Dowd: I thank the Chief Secretary for that reply and I also thank him on behalf of R. M. Simpson, a small heating contractor in my constituency, which has been waiting two years for the settlement of a £250,000 bill for work carried out at the Bank of England. The company eventually received a reply from the Chief Secretary once I raised the question in the House.

Is not it a disgrace that work done at the Bank of England cannot be regarded as secure and that the Bank does not ensure that the money is passed on to those working for contractors who are working for the Bank —those who actually do the work? The financial framework under which they execute their contracts needs a complete overhaul, especially for the sake of small businesses which are struggling in these difficult times.

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we have been in correspondence. Mr. Simpson carried out work for Taymech; in turn, Taymech worked for Bovis, and Bovis was doing some work for the Bank of England. There is a dispute about a claim for loss of expenses. The matter certainly does not rest with the Bank of England and is certainly not a matter for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is no valid invoice from Simpson to the Bank of England; nor could there be, because the contract rests not between Simpson and the Bank of England, but between Simpson and Taymech.

Mr. Jessel: As to work carried out in the Bank of England by contractors, has the Governor got a contract and is it in his contract that he must try to stifle comment in the House on the rate of interest?

Mr. Portillo: No. That is not one of the Governor's responsibilities. He plays an important part in the vital matter of controlling inflation and I pay tribute to his dedication in that matter.

Tax and National Insurance

7. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to increase income tax and national insurance contributions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall be considering options for tax changes in the next Budget over the summer and in the autumn.

Mr. Mullin: I know that the Chancellor is not readily given to embarrassment, but does he feel a tiny twinge of guilt at having been elected on a promise of lower taxes and now to be presiding over some of the largest increases in our country's history. Or am I being naive?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Clarke: I am not frequently embarrassed and the hon. Gentleman is not frequently naive. As he knows, we have made spectacular progress, beyond what anyone in his party would have thought possible, in reducing direct taxation. We did so for supply-side reasons and, when we first began to get rid of the extraordinarily high levels of direct taxation that we inherited, we found that revenue actually increased as we reduced the level of tax. We have now cut marginal rates of income tax to 25 per cent. and introduced a lower rate of 20 per cent. as well.

We are committed to continuing to reduce income tax when it is prudent to do so. I do not think that it lies in the mouth of any Labour Member to criticise the Government for their tax-cutting record.

Mr. John Townend: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, with the basic rate of income tax at 25 per cent. and national insurance at 9 per cent., the working man has to pay over one third of his income in tax? Is not that level sufficiently high? Is not the big difference between the Labour party and our party the fact that we believe in taking as little as possible from the pay packet of the working man, whereas the Labour party believes in caning taxpayers, particularly those who are hard-working and enterprising?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. If I were a Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer, my Back Benchers would be urging on me a rapid increase in taxation of all kinds. However, I am a Conservative Chancellor, and my hon. Friend reminds me of the basic commitment of the party. I will bear that in mind when I prepare my Budget in the autumn.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Chancellor said on Monday that no Chancellor could bind himself on taxation, yet at the time of the general election the Prime Minister said that there would be income tax cuts "year on year". Whom are we to believe—the present Prime Minister or the Chancellor, who clearly hopes to be the next Prime Minister?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have related the Government's record on income tax. I do not recall the Labour party voting for any of the reductions in income tax, so the idea that those tax cuts are suddenly being held against us or are being adopted by the Labour party strikes me as unlikely. The commitment of the Government is to continue to cut direct taxation and income tax when economic circumstances permit and when it is prudent to do so.

Corporation Tax

9. Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the current level of corporation tax is in Britain and in other industrialised countries; and if he will make a statement.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): The main rate of corporation tax for 1993 is 33 per cent. That is the lowest main rate in any EC or G7 country.

Mrs. Knight: Does my hon. Friend agree that the low rate of business tax, coupled with a massive increase in manufacturing productivity since 1979, is a key reason why Britain has become the most popular of the European countries for inward investment? Does he also agree that that inward investment is creating jobs in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is precisely right. The figures show that the United Kingdom attracted one third of all inward investment into the European Community in 1991. That is a vote of confidence from the internationally mobile business community. It is also an expression of what Mr. Delors called our policy of turning Britain into a paradise for Japanese investment.

Mr. Macdonald: Corporation tax is, obviously, one of a number of taxes. Will the Minister confirm that the share of national wealth paid to the Government in overall taxation is now higher than it was in 1979? Does the Minister agree that, after 14 years of a Government committed to reducing taxation as a proportion of national wealth, that is an abject failure on the Government's own terms?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman's question is yet another illustration of the total failure of the Labour party to understand how a tax system impinges on the wealth-creation process. What matters is the marginal rate at which tax is collected on wealth creation.

The difference beween the Labour party and our party on corporation tax is that, under the Labour party, 52 per cent. of every marginal £1 of profit that was earned in a corporation was paid to the Government. That has fallen to 33 per cent. under the present Government. That is the incentive to wealth creation which has attracted international investment to this country.

Mr. Jenkin: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the Government's determination that this country should be allowed to set our own rate of corporation tax without interference from the EC, because it is so vital to our competitiveness. Will he undertake to maintain that right, come what may?

Mr. Dorrell: That is indeed the Government's position. It was endorsed during the British presidency of the European Community when the subject was under discussion last year. It was not a controversial view among any of the member states of the Community.

Mr. Darling: The Chancellor has said that he may have to increase taxes in the autumn to meet the growing public sector borrowing requirement deficit. How much of that deficit do the Government estimate is structural, and how much cyclical?

Mr. Dorrell: The Chancellor has said that he will make his Budget judgments and announce his conclusions in November, and I am certainly not going to pre-empt those conclusions.

VAT on Fuel

10. Sir John Hannam: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer with which organisations he has held discussions on the impact on charities of VAT on fuel and power.

Sir John Cope: My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor and I have received representations from a number of charities and I have particularly had discussions with the Charities Tax Reform Group.

Sir John Hannam: I thank my right hon. Friend for the courtesy that he has shown the representatives from the charities at those meetings. Will he take into account the fact that in recent years charities have faced an ever-increasing burden of non-recoverable VAT, and the £25 million in VAT on fuel and power in addition to that is presenting them with major problems? Will he therefore give sympathetic consideration to the proposal for a tax refund system for charities; and will he give the Charities Tax Reform Group an opportunity to meet him between now and the Budget?

Sir John Cope: The allowances against VAT given to charities have increased since 1979 from about £23 million a year to about £150 million a year—a fact which my hon. Friend should bear in mind. Of course, I will consider any proposals put to us, and I will be pleased to see the Charities Tax Reform Group again before the Budget, if it should so wish.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: Is the Minister aware that the imposition of VAT on charities and on the people of this country would not have been necessary if the Government had collected the £1·7 billion that the Inland Revenue wrote off in uncollected taxes last year? That was about 20 times the amount uncollected in the last recession. Does he believe that this recession is 20 times as bad, or is it time for the Government to start looking at collecting taxes from those who owe them instead of imposing new burdens on charities and others who cannot afford them?

Sir John Cope: Both on VAT and on the Inland Revenue side, we go to great efforts to collect all the taxes due, and we shall continue to do so. Of course, it is to be expected that that is more difficult in a recession, when the figures, of course, go up.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: Will my right hon. Friend call in the charities again and discuss with them the thinking of the Labour and Liberal parties as set out in their policy documents, so that he can make it clear to them that a carbon tax or a tax on energy would be what those parties would advocate were they in government now?

Sir John Cope: I will certainly make that point clear.

Mr. Betts: At the general election, the Government gave an absolute commitment that there would be no increase either in the level or the range of VAT. They have broken that commitment by imposing VAT on domestic fuel, to the detriment of the elderly and the poor. Is any consideration being given to the imposition of VAT on public transport, which was also ruled out at the general election and which would be a move that would also disadvantage the poor, the elderly and the young, and create traffic congestion in our cities?

Sir John Cope: The hon. Gentleman exaggerates what was said before the election. He has obviously not paid attention to the many debates that we have had on the subject recently.

Growth Rate

11. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the level of growth for the United Kingdom economy for the last 12-month period for which figures are available; and what was the average figure for the rest of the EC.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In the first quarter of this year, GDP in the United Kingdom was 0·9 per cent. higher than a year earlier. Over the same period, GDP in Germany fell by 2·8 per cent. and GDP in France fell 0·6 per cent. In the year to the fourth quarter of 1992—the latest period for which complete figures are available—GDP in the EC as a whole fell by 0·1 per cent.

Mr. Carrington: I am grateful for that answer. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that increasing exports are vital to our economic recovery, and that the Prime Minister's championship of free trade and his excellent achievement in putting the general agreement on tariffs and trade negotiations back on the rails are the best tonic that our economy and its recovery could have?

Mr. Clarke: I do agree. It is encouraging to see British industry performing so well in non-European Community markets. We would perform even better in the EC if demand there were not dropping because our partners are still going into recession.

I also agree with my hon. Friend that, because of our record as a trading country and the need to have an export-led recovery, we have to encourage free trade. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's contribution to maintaining progress towards a successful conclusion of the Uruguay round is very much in our interest. It is also in the interest of everybody who wishes to see economic revival generally across the western world.

Mr. Mandelson: In the light of the Prime Minister's comments on Tuesday, when he made his statement following the G7 summit, that the Government were working on new ideas and initiatives to contribute to President Clinton's employment summit in the autumn, will the Chancellor tell the House what specifically new policy ideas and initiatives are being worked out in the Treasury?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad to say that the Treasury is closely involved in discussions with my right hon. Friends in the relevant Departments, such as Employment and Education, to continue to work out policy on education and training, particularly for those between the ages of 16 and 19. As we now spend two and half times as much as was spent on those sectors before we came to power, and as we have introduced a series of training initiatives, all of which were opposed—as far as I can recall—by the Labour party, it is likely that we can be expected to build on an excellent record, having inherited a somewhat bare cupboard.

Mr. Forman: The Chancellor has every reason to be satisfied with our relative performance on economic growth as compared with our partners in the Community in recent times. However, does he recognise, and will he therefore take steps to push forward the idea, that we must be competitive internationally with the new super-competitive countries in the Pacific rim, where growth rates are significantly higher?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend makes an extremely valuable point. For the next generation, we will remain at the forefront of developed and prosperous countries only if we are able to compete with our most challenging competitors—the Japanese and the countries of the Pacific rim and, probably, the north American economies if they recover their normal powerful growth. That is why we have not only to ensure that our own climate is right, but to persuade our European Community partners that Europe as a continent will fall behind if we saddle ourselves with costs on employment and restraints on economic change, which they do not impose on themselves when they are trying to earn their living in Japan or north America.

Mr. Andrew Smith: As 60 per cent. of Britain's exports are to the rest of the EC, is not there a real danger that recession there will knock back the export-led recovery, which we need to sustain us here? Does not that make it all the more important that everything possible is done jointly with our European partners to get economic recovery going in Europe and not have further deflation? What new proposals will the Chancellor put to the European Commission, which is producing the White Paper that will be the basis for the joint economic policy under the Maastricht treaty? Is not it an indictment of the new Chancellor that he has not been able to tell us one new proposal for recovery this afternoon?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question. It is extremely important to us that the rest of the Community comes out of recession, because it is our most important market and we need to see demand revived there. That is why I was glad to take part in the convergence process. I was glad that the Community welcomed the steps that the Government are taking to cut the public deficit and public finances and to improve prospects for recovery. That is why I look forward to urging the Community to take the necessary measures to tackle exactly the same problems, particularly of fiscal deficits, which many member states face.

The main proposal that I shall make to the European Commission is that it should stop putting new burdens on employment and industry. We will certainly make our suggestions for the forthcoming White Paper. They will be based on increased efforts to improve the competitiveness of European industry, including our own, ever-more flexible labour markets, improved education and training, benefits systems that ensure that incentives for work are maintained and keep the unemployed close to employment, and all the other supply-side measures on which the Government have been leading the way in Europe for the past 14 years.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the manufacturing sector of the United Kingdom can make a major contribution to continued economic growth? Therefore, will he consider not only extending capital allowances, which run out at the end of October, but increasing them—they could either run on immediately from 31 October or be introduced in his Budget—because manufacturing industry, particularly epitomised through the Machine Tool Technologies Association, can make a major contribution not only to increasing efficiency and productivity, but to aiding our economic growth?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of manufacturing industry. That is why, when asked about other matters, I kept putting stress on the figures for manufacturing output that we had two days ago. They show that, in the past few months, we have already recovered about half of the drop in output that we suffered in the depths of the recession. My hon. Friend made a Budget representation about capital allowances, which I shall carefully bear in mind. I hope that he will consult his friends in manufacturing industry about his views on the social chapter and his proposed voting intentions in the light of what I have just said about placing burdens on manufacturing industry.

Manufacturing Investment

12. Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to increase manufacturing investment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Government will continue to foster an economic climate which will encourage investment.

Mr. O'Brien: Is the Minister aware that many industrialists and business men in manufacturing do not share that complacent view of his policy? Is it not the case that manufacturing investment at constant prices year on year is still at a level below that at which it was when the Government came to office in 1979? Does he agree that that is not a good record? When will we have new policies that will start to increase manufacturing investment?

Mr. Dorrell: It is extraordinary that we have been on Treasury Questions for 35 minutes and not a single Labour Member has chosen to refer to the fact that, today, we announced that unemployment has fallen for the fifth month in succession. The hon. Gentleman thinks that he has a point that will embarrass the Government, but he is wrong. If we compare business investment in 1992 with that in 1979—1979 being the top of the nearest thing that the Labour party got to a boom and 1992 being a poor year in our record—that in 1992 was 37 per cent. higher in real terms than that in 1979.

Sir Donald Thompson: Will my hon. Friend join me in welcoming the drop in unemployment in my constituency, which is down to 7·5 per cent? Will he keep paramount in his Department the interests of manufacturing industry and the people who work in it and in commerce because it is on them that we all depend?

Mr. Dorrell: Yes, I am glad to join my hon. Friend in welcoming the fact that his constituency, among many others, is enjoying a fall in unemployment and has been for five months this year. That is, at least in part, because business investment through the 1980s grew faster than in any other G7 country, with the single exception of Japan. That is in sharp contrast to the record of business investment growth in the 1970s when the country was at the bottom of the league—seventh out of seven. In the 1980s, it was second out of seven.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Is the Minister aware that, while the House welcomes his commitment to a general economic climate that will promote growth, the two essential ingredients necessary to achieve that are a competitive exchange rate and low interest rates? While we do not expect from him or from the Chancellor any commitment on those points, could not there be a general sign from the Government that those two quintessential requirements for sustained economic growth, which we are now witnessing, will be foremost in their minds, not only as they formulate the Budget later in the year, but in the next few weeks and months?

Mr. Dorrell: If devaluation were the path to economic expansion, the 1970s would have been glory years rather than locust years. The Government believe that the best backdrop that we can deliver to allow business to invest, expand and create jobs and wealth is to provide monetary stability and price stability, which give the opportunity for long-range planning, rather than the short-termism that was imposed on the private sector when the hon. Gentleman tried to run a company against the impossible background created by the then Labour Government.

Mr. Garnier: Does my hon. Friend recognise that the good employment figures in my own constituency of Harborough are to be welcomed? They are the lowest in the county, as he, as a Leicestershire Member, will recognise. Does he accept that one of the reasons for that is that manufacturers in my constituency have continued to invest in manufacturing industry, and that we have the fullest order books for some time, both domestically and in the export market? Would he care to comment on the good performance of Leicestershire manufacturing industry at the moment?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is quite right to draw attention to the success of manufacturing and, indeed, all other forms of economic activity in the county that both of us have the honour to represent. I have referred to investment as being one of the things that brought that about. Another thing, of course, is the fact that productivity has grown in the last 12 months by 8·7 per cent. That has made possible a decline in unit wage costs in British manufacturing that is the best on record.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 July.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Waterson: Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming not only the lowest inflation rate for 30 years, but the fifth successive monthly fall in unemployment? Does he agree that the House deserves an apology from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) for predicting a steady rise in unemployment over the spring and summer?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is unkind to remind the House of the predictions by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. There have been a great deal of them—all wrong. If it would be for the convenience of the House, I will place a copy of them in the Library. The further fall in unemployment and inflation is very good news indeed. Unemployment has fallen by over 80,000 since the beginning of the year, and, taken with the remarkable figures on Tuesday for manufacturing output, we can now say with some certainty that there is clear evidence of recovery gathering pace.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Prime Minister accept that it should be for the House to decide whether the social chapter is included in the British version of the Maastricht treaty?

The Prime Minister: The House has examined the whole of the treaty. I expect to ratify the treaty that I signed at Maastricht. The House has shown its support for the treaty; I expect that it will do so again.

Mr. John Smith: The Prime Minister has carefully not answered the question. Let me put it to him plainly and clearly. Whichever way the House votes on the social chapter, will the Government accept the decision?

The Prime Minister: I have said to the right hon. and learned Gentleman before, and I repeat, that I expect the Government's motion to be carried, and I expect to ratify the treaty that I signed.

Mr. John Smith: The House and the country will have noticed another failure to answer the question directly. Does the Prime Minister understand that, were he to defy the will of the House of Commons, it would be a monstrous violation of the rights of the House, and would at one fell swoop undermine our parliamentary democracy?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman perhaps does not understand the answers. I will make them more clear for him, so that he is in no doubt. We expect to ratify the treaty that I signed at Maastricht. The House has shown its support for the treaty; I expect it to do so again.

Mr. Lamont: This month, like last, has seen a remarkable catalogue of good economic indicators. Is it not the case that, in addition to the fifth fall in monthly unemployment, we have seen the largest increase in industrial production for four years and the lowest inflation record for nearly 30 years? When one puts that into a European context and sees that Britain has a lower than average rate of inflation in the European Community, is the only country in the European Community in which unemployment is falling, and is the only country in the European Community in which industrial production is rising, I congratulate the new Chancellor on the rapid success of his policies.

The Prime Minister: I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be most grateful for my right hon. Friend's support for his policies. It is entirely clear that we are coming out of recession and into recovery. It is equally clear that we are leading Europe into recovery.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Prime Minister reflect on the fact that the Government have said to their rebels that nothing will stop them from ratifying the Maastricht treaty, but they have said to the House that adopting the social chapter would jeopardise the treaty? Both statements cannot be true; which is?

The Prime Minister: I think that the right hon. Gentleman has forgotten what he said about the social chapter. [Interruption.] I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has not forgotten, but perhaps I can remind the House what he said:

"I believe what is now being put forward in the social chapter may well lead to a form of Euro-sclerosis."

He continued:

"The social chapter in the Maastricht agreement, it seems to me, is a really worrying attempt by Europe to try and rebuild in Britain the things that we have dismantled over the last 12 or 15 years."

If that is the view of the right hon. Gentleman and his party, and he is true to his view, I shall expect to see him in our Lobby next Thursday.

Portsmouth

Q2. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Prime Minister whether he has plans to pay an official visit to Portsmouth.

The Prime Minister: I have no immediate plans to do so.

Mr. Martin: Does my right hon. Friend recall that he has not visited Portsmouth since the general election, at a time when the so-called poll experts were predicting not only a Government defeat in general but, even more shamefully, the loss of my seat in particular? Will my right hon. Friend visit us again soon, preferably in the 50th anniversary year of D-day? Such a visit would not only mark the premier naval port of Portsmouth's vital contribution to our defence needs in the past, but mark its present contribution and the efforts it will make for many years in the future.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is an extremely forceful advocate for Portsmouth, and I am grateful for his invitation. I understand how important the defence industry is to his constituents, and I hope that he will take every opportunity to remind them of two facts: that the Labour party would cut defence spending by a quarter, and that the Liberal Democrats would cut it by half. We hear a lot from the leader of the Liberal Democrats about taking military action in Bosnia; we hear rather less from him about how we would be able to take that action after his policy had dismantled the Army, the Navy and the Royal Air Force.

Engagements

Q3. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McAllion: Is the Prime Minister aware that, because of the legal shackles on British trades unions, this week sacked Timex workers were banned from taking part in the national launch of the Timex boycott campaign, and banned from calling on the support of other British trade unionists?

What is banned here is legal elsewhere in Europe. Sacked Timex workers have been in France this week, exercising the democratic rights denied to them in their own country. Is the Prime Minister not ashamed of the Government's record on labour law, which has isolated Britain in Europe and left British workers on their own, with no social chapter, no wages councils and no effective right to strike? The Government have turned Britain, once one of the workshops of the world, into one of the world's sweatshop economies.

The Prime Minister: The sort of behaviour that we saw from trade unionists at Timex is nothing for the hon. Gentleman to be proud of. I dare say that the jobs lost at Timex as a result will stand as the clearest evidence that the hon. Gentleman's policy is utterly the wrong way to look at labour and trade union relationships.

Q4. Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Kynoch: Will my right hon. Friend thank and congratulate the anti-terrorist branch and MI5 for its continuing efforts to protect the public from terrorist crimes, and especially their efforts yesterday? Does he agree that had we failed to pass the prevention of terrorism Act and gone down the path of giving away Northern Ireland—the policy of the Opposition—the anti-terrorist branch and MI5 might as well have been told by us to pack up their things and go back to traffic duty?

The Prime Minister: The police and the Security Service deserve our congratulations on their professionalism and vigilance. They have demonstrated that in fighting terrorism over many years. It is clear, and it has been endorsed repeatedly by the House, that we need the prevention of terrorism Act to defeat the terrorists. With the greatest goodwill in the world, I cannot understand why, year after year, Opposition Members have voted it down.

Mr. Boyce: In view of the Prime Minister's utterances in recent days about nuclear weapons being defensive measures, may I ask him to take this opportunity to assure the House, the country and the world that Britain will never use them first?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman should know better than to ask such a daft question.

Q5. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winterton: My right hon. Friend has announced this afternoon dramatic improvements in a number of economic indicators which are of immense interest to the House and the country. Will he continue to encourage manufacturing industry as a way of improving our economy, and will he ensure that in the Budget to be announced in December, the fragile recovery of our manufacturing base, which is vital to our future, will continue to be encouraged and that measures will be introduced to ensure that recovery and continued economic growth?

The Prime Minister: The whole House knows and respects my hon. Friend's advocacy of manufacturing, so he will be as pleased as I am about the growing success of British manufacturers. As he knows, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) introduced measures in the Budget and autumn statement to help manufacturing industry. I say also to my hon. Friend that the one thing that would do great damage to manufacturing industry would be the provisions of the social chapter.

Mrs. Mahon: Does the Prime Minister realise that 500,000 of the present unemployed are aged between 18 and 24 and that, because of the cuts that he helped to introduce, they are having to manage on £4·97 a day? Does he think that that is enough to keep them in food and on which they can live? Will he take action now to end the discrimination against that age group, instead of making cheap political points at the expense of the unemployed?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the hon. Lady has grasped the training opportunities that exist for young people. I want youngsters to take up those training opportunities. That is what they are there for and it is in their interest to take them up.

Q6. Mr. Amess: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Amess: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government's trade union reforms have made a significant contribution to Britain's increased industrial competitiveness over the past 10 years, while the trade unions have made a significant contribution to the Labour party's electoral uncompetitiveness over the same period?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend, and I came across an interesting quote last week from a delegate at a Transport and General Workers Union conference, who said:

"We are not the tail wagging the dog. We are the dog."

That is the true relationship between Labour and the unions. The unions are the dog and Labour is the lamp post.

Q7. Mr. Hain: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 15 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hain: What is the Prime Minister going to do about corruption in his flagship council in Westminster? When will he stop crooks financing the Conservative party? Why did he allow 44 of his own Members to vote themselves tax privileges in the Lloyd's amendments on Tuesday? Is that why he is the most unpopular Prime Minister on record?

The Prime Minister: The best that can be said about that compendium question is that it is worthy of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Fry: In welcoming the unemployment figure, will my right hon. Friend also take time to express vividly to all those in employment the cost of the social security budget, currently running at more than £60 a week for every worker? Does not that large sum justify the Government's intention to re-examine that budget?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right about that for the reasons that I have set out on a number of occasions in recent weeks. That problem is faced not only in Britain, but right across the European Community, in Japan, the United States and other industrial countries.

Open Government

3.30 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. William Waldegrave): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement about open government. I am publishing today a White Paper——

Madam Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members who are leaving the Chamber do so not only quickly but quietly so that we can hear the statement?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am publishing today a White Paper which marks the conclusion of a review that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister asked me to undertake in May last year. It is a significant step forward towards more openness, on which the Government have already made considerable progress.

The White Paper draws together two strands of policy that are not always associated by those who have campaigned for freedom of information—the citizen's right to find out and the Government's duty to inform. Governments can wait to be asked, but, across a whole range of policy areas, the objective should be to initiate the publication of information that is of practical use to people. That is a principle of the citizens charter, aimed at providing more information about services in a form that helps users of services to understand, to compare, to assert their rights and, wherever possible, to exercise choice.

That is why we are determined, for example, to publish comparative information on schools and why we have attached such importance to the publication of information measuring performance in transport, health and many other areas.

The White Paper builds on what has been achieved and takes progress further with six new steps. First, it sets out a new code of practice on access to information held by central Government. It commits the Government, for the first time, to a clear set of principles governing what information will be available and what can properly be withheld. It deals with the information that we shall aim to provide as a matter of course, including the facts, analysis and reasoning that lie behind decisions; and explanatory material, including internal guidance, dealing with Departments' rules and procedures in their dealings with the public.

The code includes a commitment to meet reasonable requests for factual information relating to the policies, actions and decisions of Departments, filling the gaps in the framework of published information.

Obviously, some categories of information will be exempt from that commitment. They are set out in part II of the draft code in annex A to the White Paper. Those categories will be familiar to those who have studied overseas access legislation and many areas of confidentiality would have been exempt also under the Right to Know Bill introduced this Session by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher). Chapter 3 of the White Paper explains the rationale for those exemptions, and for some issues on which we have taken a different approach from that adopted in the Bill.

The second and crucial step is that the new code will be independently policed by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration—the ombudsman—who has agreed to consider complaints that a Department has failed to provide information that should have been provided under the code. This can be done under his existing powers if referred to him through a Member of Parliament.

Citizens will thus have an independent investigator working on their behalf. The ombudsman will be able to report to Parliament if he finds that information has been improperly withheld. Ministers and their Departments can be called to account if they are criticised by the ombudsman, as they can now be called to account for maladministration and injustice. Parliamentary accountability is enhanced, not diminished.

The code will apply in the first instance to Departments and other bodies within the jurisdiction of the Parliamentary Commissioner and his opposite number in Northern Ireland. However, the Government believe that similar codes could apply with advantage to the national health service and to local authorities. We shall consult representative interests, including the relevant professions and the local authority associations, before publishing further proposals covering those areas.

People have a direct interest in the accuracy and privacy of information held about them by Government. That is why our third proposal is to introduce a new statutory right of access for the subject to see such personal information, applying to a wide range of public sector authorities. There will be exemptions broadly in line with the Data Protection Act 1984, for example, where disclosure would prejudice the prevention or detection of crime, the apprehension or prosecution of offenders, or the assessment or collection of tax. Confidential references will also be protected, as will certain other specified categories of personal information such as records relating to immigration, nationality and consular records.

The greatest number of representations received over the last year by my Department related to information held by Government in the area of public health and safety. That is why our fourth proposal is a new statutory access right to health and safety information held by public authorities, on the lines of the existing access right to environmental information. That will go beyond health and safety at work to include information on such matters as the safety of public places, transport, food and consumer goods and environmental health risks. Obviously, proper protection must be offered to genuine trade secrets and manufacturing know-how and we must honour past commitments where information has been given in confidence. However, it will be a key aim to make the process of regulation more transparent both to the public—in whose interest it is carried out—and to the industries affected, which have sometimes found regulatory requirements to be unclear or poorly explained.

Where there is a statutory right of access, there should be a right of appeal to an external authority on matters in dispute. The Government will be consulting further on whether new tribunals should be established to hear appeals arising from the two new access rights.

Fifthly, we have identified and listed in the White Paper the many statutory provisions that limit the ability of the Government to disclose information. Where those provisions run across the new access rights, provision can be made to set them aside. However, in the other cases we see no reason to revise the opinion of the Franks committee in 1972 that there is no contradiction between proper openness and the necessary protection of private information that has been entrusted to the state in confidence. Parliament has approved all those provisions, often on the basis that protection of confidentiality was quid pro quo for some invasion of privacy. The majority of them should stand. In future, however, we shall consider the selective introduction of harm tests into those statutory offences.

Sixthly, and finally among the main White Paper proposals, I come to the review and release of public records. An invitation that I issued to historians last summer has produced useful suggestions, which have led to some significant publications. Examples of those and of records released as a result of other initiatives are listed in annex D to the White Paper. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is releasing further papers today relating to the early history of intelligence operations.

A working party established by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has recommended, and my noble and learned Friend has accepted, changes in the criteria for closing records, reductions in the periods of extended closure and the application of a harm test, which will mean that, in future, records will not be closed for longer than 30 years unless actual damage would be caused by their release. That will lead to a substantial increase in the material available to historians.

I think it relevant to mention to the House that, in addition to the six main proposals in the White Paper, the Defence, Press and Broadcasting Committee is reviewing the D notice procedure in order to modernise it and to make it more open. Parliament will be notified of the outcome of that review shortly.

I believe that the House will recognise that those proposals, taken together, lay down a sure and lasting foundation for more open public administration and government. They are a series of practical steps that meet the principal objectives of those who have advocated a full statutory freedom of information regime, without the legal complexities that that would entail. They do so while strengthening the role of Parliament in calling Ministers to account, rather than sidelining it. I commend the White Paper to the House.

Ms Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): I begin by briefly acknowledging the work of Maurice Frankel of the Campaign for Freedom of Information, as well as the sterling work of my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher). Other hon. Members on both sides of the House, many of whom are here today, have also put in much work to try to bring more openness into our system of government.

I congratulate the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on having, at last, after many months of tough negotiations with other Ministers, brought into the open a White Paper on open government. We have had to wait some time for it. When hon. Members have time to read the report, they will see that it is a well-researched, carefully documented account. Nevertheless, unfortunately, it epitomises exactly the qualities for which the Chancellor is gaining a reputation, and which we have just seen him demonstrate. There were a lot of nice words and good intentions, the statement was high on rhetoric, but, in the end, there was a deep failure to deliver the policy of open government that many Members want.

The fundamental flaw in the White Paper and the basic problem with it, which the Chancellor tried to skirt, is the fact that, in the end, it will be a Minister who decides what information is available to the public. I ask hon. Members to reflect on the fact that that Minister will be one of the very Ministers who, in the past year, have refused to give information on the legal advice on Maastricht and the Matrix Churchill affair—the Minister who refused to put Lord Scott into the public domain, and refused to publish the accounts and records of the pits, the facts about the privatised prisons—[HON. MEMBERS: "Asil Nadir."]—and Asil Nadir and political donations. [Interruption.] As my hon. Friends are telling me, the list goes on and on.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Rubbish.

Ms Mowlam: The hon. Gentleman may shout rubbish, but will he deny that the Scott inquiry was carried out in private? Will he deny that Asil Nadir's donations are not in the public domain? That is the deep problem with the report, and that is the reason why it is flawed. Ministers will decide what is released. That is why, sadly, the White Paper will be the epitaph to what will in the end be seen as a weak ministerial career.

Will the Chancellor confirm that, under the code of practice that he outlined today, which I readily acknowledge covers many of the right areas and includes many of the right exemptions—I welcome the test of exemptions—it will be Ministers who can refuse access to information in the first place? If people want to appeal, they will have to do so to the parliamentary ombudsman. Will the Minister confirm that that is the same ombudsman whose average response time to queries is now 13 months and 18 days?

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): That is cheap.

Ms Mowlam: If the hon. Gentleman had used the parliamentary ombudsman system, he would know that it is slow, bureaucratic and toothless.

Mr. David Nicholson: Even cheaper.

Ms Mowlam: To suggest that that will be the mechanism for appeals will not work—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): What about——

Madam Speaker: Order. I resent interventions from sedentary positions, especially when they continue, as in the case of the hon. Member.

Ms Mowlam: Will the Minister also confirm that a year ago he identified 200 Acts or other statutes that would be swept from the statute book? I remember the Prime Minister talking about the "cobwebs of secrecy" that would be removed when that happened. Will the Minister confirm that, ironically, as he has just told us, those 200 statutes cannot now be abolished, so they will remain? Three pages in the document argue with good All Souls logic why those statutes have to stay. In the end, they will stay.

Will the right hon. Gentleman further acknowledge that the real parentage of this White Paper is a 1979 Green Paper by Lord Callaghan, which contained exactly the same sections, section by section, covering a code of practice, tribunals and the ombudsman? Will the right hon. Gentleman admit that, in terms of the past 14 years, the Government have just caught up with 1979 and have learnt nothing from the freedom of information legislation that has been practised over the past 10 years in Australia, New Zealand and Canada?

[Ms Mowlam]

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that whistle-blowers, who have been gagged by current legislation and are unable to disclose information when that is in the public interest, will still be subjected to criminal sanctions after the publication of his White Paper?

I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's comments about individual rights in respect of health and safety. However, will he please tell me why that proposal cannot go back before 1991, as many people with disabilities and those who are terminally ill would like to see those historical health records? The same applies to the exemptions on immigration to which the right hon. Gentleman referred.

With regard to talking about the Government's commitment to open government, it is difficult to examine the details of the section on immigration, because it was only when I entered the Chamber at 3.30 pm that I was passed the White Paper. I received a copy of the Minister's statement 22 minutes before that. If that is an indication of open government, I should like to know what the Government's record is.

When the Minister replies, will he tell us why Opposition Members, in particular my hon. Friends the Members for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie), for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) and for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell), are not allowed to visit scientific institutions in this country without a ministerial chaperon? That has just been confirmed by the Leader of the House. We cannot visit such institutions without a Minister being present.

Without substantive changes and without the kind of Right to Know Bill for which we have argued, and despite the many pages of rhetoric in the White Paper, ours will continue to be the most secretive Government in the western world.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Lady was almost as impressive on this subject as she was on science. When her colleagues greeted the science White Paper, they made such a pig's ear of it that even the Opposition spokesman in the House of Lords took the opposite view. They have taken the precaution today of not asking for a statement in the House of Lords so that they do not fall into that trap again.

When the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) has done her homework—which her colleagues tell me she very seldom does—she will find that she has made a fool of herself. I am absolutely happy to acknowledge that many of the ideas in this White Paper were also endorsed by the Labour party. I do not think that that is a weakness for my argument. I believe that it is a weakness in the hon. Lady's argument.

Let me remind the House of the last Labour Government's record on openness. In 1974, the Labour manifesto promised to increase openness and to replace the Official Secrets Act 1911. In 1975, the Queen's Speech promised to increase openness and to amend the Official Secrets Act. In 1976, the then Home Secretary promised to replace section 2 of the Official Secrets Act with an official information Act. In 1977, the Queen's Speech promised to increase openness and to replace the Official Secrets Act. In 1978, the Government published a White Paper—and so it went on until 1979. I could read out the rest, but Labour did absolutely nothing and the Opposition have no right whatsoever to talk on this subject.

The hon. Lady asked, more or less, a couple of questions. She asked about the speed of the ombudsman. She may like to know that in freedom of information regimes—the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, (Mr. Fisher) will remember this, as it was at the Campaign for Freedom of Information's conference that Mr. Grace warned of it—the legislative route, or Freedom of Information Act route, is much slower than the ombudsman route. In Canada, it takes about two years, as Mr. Grace himself said.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) indicated dissent.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman may shake his head, but I have the quotation with me. It is true that overseas regimes are much slower. I have already had discussions with the ombudsman, and it will be his objective to speed inquiries as much as he can, and that is right.

The hon. Lady said also that investigations of the statutes protecting privacy should be swept away. She cannot have thought about what she said. Is she really saying that statutes that protect privacy and make it a criminal offence to release private information should be swept away? Of course not. Lord Franks was perfectly right about that, and we have re-endorsed what he said.

There was very little else in what the hon. Lady said, except for her usual round of abuse about my college at Oxford, which obviously causes her to have a chip on her shoulder. I apologise for that. [Interruption.] She asked a question about retrospection; that is perfectly true. In relation to retrospection, we have taken the view that information given in good faith under one regime should not be released under another. It would be bad faith to release information when it was provided on the basis that it was going to be kept confidential. Most hon. Members, on reflection, would support that.

Mr. Paul Channon (Southend, West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, far from the carping attitude of the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam), most hon. Members think that he has taken a larger step forward in this matter than any of his predecessors? Is not my right hon. Friend proposing that only when there are overwhelming reasons for it should information remain secret? Is not that a great step forward?

Is not it a further great step forward that the rights of the House are preserved, because the Parliamentary Commissioner will be taking a role and it will be left to an Officer of the House to decide whether a Department has behaved reasonably if it has refused access to a document in the described circumstances?

Will not the Parliamentary Commissioner criticise a Department for failing to produce a document, and will it not then be up to the relevant Committees of the House to decide whether his criticism is right? That is a great step forward, and I congratulate my right hon. Friend on it.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend is right. The Parliamentary Commissioner will have the capacity to investigate whether the code has been properly followed. He will, as he does at present, have the right to say to Departments that he believes that it has not been followd and that they should put matters right. If a Department is so unwise as to resist him, he has the right to come to his all-party Committee and to the House.

Recommendations of the Parliamentary Commissioner have invariably been followed by Governments, and it is right that they should be. The case is strengthened further by the fact that, in a sense, the Parliamentary Commissioner has the redress in his own hands in that he has the information. We have discussed the issue with him and he has fairly said that he has always given a Department the first opportunity to put the matter right; that is fair.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): The right hon. Gentleman's statement confirms that he has decided not to introduce a freedom of information Act and, therefore, the right of recourse to the courts for freedom of information, as successive Labour and Conservative Governments have refused to do. However, his proposals are a step forward and they are welcome in that respect.

In the proposals for the implementation of the new code, the right hon. Gentleman places reliance on the ombudsman. Will he provide extra resources to speed the work of the ombudsman, who will have a whole new work load as result? Will he extend the ombudsman's investigative powers to include consumer groups, interest groups, lobbies and others who, in other countries, use freedom of information provision to campaign on behalf of people, or will he stick with the current provision that the ombudsman can take up cases only when there is loss to an individual? That would invalidate the ability of the legislation to allow Governments to be properly scrutinised by other bodies.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his fair recognition that this measure represents a major step forward. It is perfectly fair to say that there is a resource implication for the ombudsman's work. We made it clear in the White Paper that the additional work load must not damage the already large work load that he has, so he will have to have more resources.

Under the code, the ombudsman does not need to demonstrate that there has been loss to an individual. If the code has not been followed, that will be evidence that the person does not have his rights. That will enable the ombudsman to make a recommendation. It is not for me to say what the scope of the ombudsman is; that is for the all-party Select Committee. At present, I have no plans to recommend any widening of his scope.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): I thank my right hon. Friend for the statement and urge him to disregard the remarks of the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam). I fear that she spoke without giving the matter her usual consideration. The statement does much to enhance the principle of open government. I certainly welcome the idea of a code of practice that will be closely supervised by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration. As my right hon. Friend knows, the Parliamentary Commissioner is not responsible to Ministers or the Government—he is responsible directly to Parliament. That is, he is responsible to hon. Members on both sides of the House. As my right hon. Friend mentioned, the Select Committee——

Madam Speaker: Order. A number of hon. Members want to put questions to the Minister. On these occasions, I often ask for one question and a brief exchange, and I insist on that now.

Mr. Pawsey: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the Parliamentary Commissioner is the right person to administer the code of practice? Will he ensure that all adequate resources are available to the Parliamentary Commissioner? As the Select Committee is likely to suggest enhanced powers, will my right hon. Friend support them when they come before the House?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend, who chairs the Select Committee, correctly reports the situation. The Parliamentary Commissioner is a servant of the House and it is not for the Government to lay down the law about how he should behave. He has said how he will take forward this new duty, which his present powers enable him to carry through. In William Reid, we are lucky to have a formidable Parliamentary Commissioner. I will listen carefully to what my hon. Friend and his Select Committee say in so far as it relates to the responsibilities of the Government, especially with regard to resources.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): The White Paper rightly identifies section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968 as a barrier to openness. Why does not the White Paper recommend the abolition of that section, which was provided for in my Medicines Information Bill? That Bill was supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Waldegrave: The reason, which is set out in the White Paper, is that we believe that there should be further openness in this area. However, we believe that this is a classic case where steps should be taken on a Europewide basis. As the hon. Gentleman knows, European legislation is in preparation. There would be dangers to the extremely important pharmaceutical industry in this country if we did not proceed on a Europewide basis.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid-Sussex): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in practice, it is hard to find the right balance between the ideal of freedom of information and chaotic government in which both Ministers and civil servants are reluctant to commit anything confidential to paper? I congratulate him on taking many steps forward to more open government in the White Paper that he has announced today, especially the two new statutory rights for individuals which seem to meet many of the objectives of those who wrote in to support the Right to Know Bill.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. We have taken major steps forward. It was noticeable that the campaign of cards that were sent to many hon. Members—certainly to me—by the Campaign for Freedom of Information concentrated, understandably, on practical rights and acces that ordinary people want in their daily lives, especially with regard to health and safety. We are meeting those rights properly by statutory access and that will be welcomed by many of those people who lobbied hon. Members.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock and Burntwood): I congratulate the Chancellor on his ingenuity. He has taken the existing system as far as it can possibly go. He finds himself in the same position as the last Labour Government, who struggled mightily to prevent themselves from having to introduce a freedom of information Bill. They succeeded, and he has succeeded. I welcome some of his ingenuity and the increased powers for the Parliamentary Commissioner. Can he tell the House and the country why, having come to the point at which the Government decided not to give a statutory right to know or to introduce a freedom of information Bill, he decided to do that?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his first remarks. The one difference between this Government and the Labour Government is that they agonised for seven years and did nothing, whereas our Prime Minister pledged in our last manifesto to increase openness and we have done something about it a year later.

The argument for not taking a statutory route was set out by the Labour Government at the time. Opposition Members below the Gangway, who are stalwart upholders of the rights of this House, seem to be on my side in this matter. Their hon. Friends seem to be arguing for moving responsibility for key matters away from the House to judges. On the rare occasions when there will be conflict —I do not believe that there will be conflict often between the Parliamentary Commissioner's advice and the Departments—it will be on a serious matter. Do we really want to delegate those decisions to appointed judges? We would not avoid the politics by that; the political decisions would simply be taken by appointed judges rather than, ultimately, by the House. That is why we, like the Labour Government, believe that we need to increase information at the same time as enhancing the powers of the House.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): My right hon. Friend and his officials deserve warm congratulations on what has been a long march through the institutions. I particularly welcome the innovation in respect of the Parliamentary Commissioner. Will my right hon. Friend remind those who are, rightly, concerned to make progress with this issue that, because openness in Government depends on everyday decisions by Ministers and officials, it is just as important to get a new culture and attitude in Whitehall as it is to create new rights and entitlements?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right. In many ways, it would be much easier, putting aside the inevitable arguments about getting parliamentary time, to pass an Act and say that by creating that confrontation the problem is solved. That would not be the case. Let me quote again the advice given to the information commissioner. In talking about legal compunction, he said:

> "The power to compel means confrontation; it could put the information commissioner"— in the Right to Know Bill of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central——

> "in a chronic state of war with government institutions and would inevitably result in the most narrow legalistic application of the law."

I believe that to be right. It is far better for the ombudsman to work with Departments and get them to improve their practices, as he has done on administrative procedures, while having in the background the power to compel them, if need be. That is much more likely to change the culture in Whitehall.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South) rose——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Madam Speaker: I call Mr. Dennis—no, Bob Cryer. I call Mr. Cryer.

Mr. Skinner: I thought you said me, Madam Speaker. Hold on a minute. What is going on here?

Madam Speaker: Mr. Dennis Cryer means Mr. Bob Cryer.

Mr. Cryer: It is a very comradely arrangement——

Mr. Skinner: It is on this occasion.

Mr. Cryer: Will the proposals for a code of practice, as opposed to legislation, enable ordinary citizens to gain access to, for example, the secrets of installations such as Menwith Hill near Harrogate? For many years, concern has been expressed about that institution which has not had formal parliamentary approval. The Minister wants to give Parliament more power. Surely people have a right to know what is going on there, particularly now that any military justification, even by the Government's standards, has long since gone and especially as Menwith Hill is a spy on external, ordinary civilian telecommunications.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman will understand that under my code, as under the Bill of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, proper national security will be protected. It should be protected. If information is requested and a refusal to give it is challenged, there will be an independent adjudicator, in the shape of the Parliamentary Commissioner, to assess whether the Department's decision has been fair.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): As a former civil servant, an occasional historian and a member of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, I welcome what my right hon. Friend has announced and greatly regret the unnecessary traducing of aspects of the Parliamentary Commissioner's work by the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam).

In view of the concern of my constituents about such matters as organophosphorus sheep dips and the results of an important derailing of a train carrying noxious liquids some 18 months ago, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the measures he is proposing on health and safety will greatly help the right to know on those matters?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend should not worry too much about the hon. Member for Redcar. She always does that.

On health and safety, the new statutory right will provide the sort of legislative clout that is based on statute, because it is proper that it should. In the process of passing the statute, we may need to override some of the statutory bars to the release of information that are listed, which we could not do through a code, and they will help my hon. Friend with the questions that he raised.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): If the Minister is so keen on open government, will he abolish the Osmotherley rules, which so severely restrict civil servants' ability to give evidence to Select Committees? Will he, his colleagues and their civil servants tell us the criteria for the privatisation of Government agencies?

Mr. Waldegrave: There is no secret about the latter as those matters are debated widely. The Osmotherley rules cover the distinction between what it is right for civil servants to answer and what it is right for Ministers to answer. The rules are broadly correct, but, from time to time, the Select Committee on which the hon. Member serves considers them and the guidance given to civil servants, and comments on them.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): Apart from that information to which we have a statutory right and information that is classified for some reason of privacy or national security, what is the status of all the rest of the information that may be given voluntarily, or may have to be prised out of the civil service and Government by the ombudsman?

Furthermore, is it consistent with any sort of freedom of information that the great wisdom and experience of one Government should continue to be denied to their successor Government by the arrangements that exist, or will it be open to the ombudsman to say that some of the things that were done by the Government or their predecessor should be made available, if requested, by their successors?

Mr. Waldegrave: All the information laid down in the code belongs, by right, to those who want it. As I said in my original statement, however, the Government should not wait to be asked. We should improve the practice of initiating the publication of information on many subjects, as we are doing.

Advice given to Ministers by officials should be covered by privacy laws, and I think that all freedom of information regimes throughout the world cover it. I believe that the rule that Ministers of a successor Government cannot demand by right to see the previous Government's papers on those matters is correct. It would damage the openness and frankness between officials and Ministers if officials thought that they would constantly have to explain to a successor Minister why they argued in a particular way.

Mr. Fisher: It happens in the United States.

Mr. Waldegrave: That seems to me to be an extremely bad analogy, because in the United States large parts of the bureaucracy change with the Government, at great cost to good government there.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why should anybody take a blind bit of notice of this Tory Government when they talk about open government? We have just witnessed the Prime Minister refusing to answer a question that the Leader of the Opposition put to him three times and he has refused to give an answer about summat that is going to happen next Thursday. If they believe in open government, why do they not tell us where they get the money from for the Tory party—from all the sleazebags round the world? Why does the Minister not tell us the names of the eight Tory Members of Parliament who are in Asil Nadir's pocket? That is open government.

Mr. Waldegrave: Perhaps one day the hon. Member will think up a really smart question to ask the Prime Minister, such as when he stopped beating his wife, and be cross when he refuses to answer.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the publication of the code of practice. I also thank him for his generosity in agreeing to meet me and to publish the criteria for the retention of official documents within Departments and their release by the Public Record Office. Can he confirm that, under the new regime, the advisory committee that allows the Lord Chancellor to retain documents beyond the 30-year limit will now at least be allowed to read them?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right. The advisory committee, which advises the Lord Chancellor and is chaired by the Master of the Rolls, will have access to papers when there is a dispute. Disputes between Departments about releasing documents are rare, but arrangements are in hand to see how that can best be done so that access to documents will be available.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): I congratulate the Chancellor on the White Paper and many of the details in it. However, in responding for the Opposition, my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) was right to say that, although the White Paper is well argued and researched and the code of practice furthers the principles of open government well, in practice it will not make much difference, because it contains no means of enforcement.

The Chancellor rests on the ombudsman, but the ombudsman is slower. He rests on Mr. Grace, but everybody knows—and his own research shows—that Canada has the worst form of enforcement. Australia has a better system, with delivery of material in 30 days, as my Bill provides. The Chancellor knows that the ombudsman's present record is, as my hon. Friend said, 14 months and 18 days. What specific extra resources will he provide? Will he publish a target for response times for the ombudsman?

The White Paper's real weakness is that Ministers will continue to decide. That is the position now and nothing will change. Ministers will be in the dock for not releasing information and will be judge and jury in their own case. They have been hiding information consistently throughout last year.

We need a freedom of information Bill and we shall have one, as Australia, Canada, New Zealand, the United States and every other country have. The Government know that they have lost this argument this year. They are like King Canute. Having brought themselves to the brink of freedom of information with the White Paper, they have not the courage to jump in the water and accept that the game is up. We cannot be behind the rest of the world by not having freedom of information legislation any longer. I believe that the Conservative party will include freedom of information legislation in the next Tory party manifesto, but they will not have a chance to implement it because we shall be in government.

The British people want the right to know and they will get it. But the White Paper does not give people the right to know.

Mr. Waldegrave: Unfortunately for the hon. Member who is a real expert on the subject—unlike the hon. Member for Redcar—the Labour Government's record was outstandingly bad. When we measure progress under the two parties since the war, my party does much better. A famous example was quoted by a former Member of Parliament, Clement Freud, of the resounding minute written by the great Mr. Herbert Morrison saying that people had a right to know which he classified "secret". So that made little progress.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned timing. He said that the response time was 30 days and that is fair enough. We must have proper targets for Departments to respond.

[Mr. Waldegrave]

That is not the comparison with the two years which Mr. Grace was talking about. Mr. Grace meant the time that it took for disputes to go through the courts. It does not take 30 days to settle court disputes in Australia.

If the hon. Gentleman is saying that this country is likely to produce a much faster procedure in the courts than Canada, with all respect to my noble and learned Friends, he is a little optimistic. The ombudsman is much more likely to act more swiftly. It will be cheaper for the citizen because there is no need to employ lawyers and others, who tend to waste a lot of money. I believe that the ombudsman has worked extremely well. His recommendations have been invariably accepted by Governments and he is the obvious enforcement agency to use.

Business of the House

4.15 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the business for next week and a day or two beyond that. The business will be as follows:

MONDAY 19 JULY—Supplemental timetable motion on and consideration of Lords amendments to the Education Bill.

TUESDAY 20 JULY—Opposition day (18th allotted day).

There will be a debate described as "The Threat of Government Policies to the Social Fabric and the Security of the Individual", on an Opposition motion.

Motions relating to immigration and asylum. Details will be given in the Official Report.

WEDNESDAY 21 JULY—Estimates day (first allotted day, second part). There will be a debate relating to domestic violence.

Details of the estimates concerned and the relevant Select Committee reports will be given in the Official Report.

Motion on the Suppression of Terrorism Act 1978 (Application of Provisions) (India) order.

Motion on the Incumbents (Vacation of Benefices) (Amendment) measure.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

At 10 o'clock, the House will be asked to agree the outstanding estimates for 1993-94.

THURSDAY 22 JULY—Subject to Royal Assent being signified to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, there will be a debate on a motion considering the question of adopting the protocol on social policy.

FRIDAY 23 JULY—There will be a debate on the environment on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

MONDAY 26 JULY—Motion for the summer Adjournment.

Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) (No.2) Bill.

TUESDAY 27 JULY—Debates on the summer Adjournment.

In view of what I have said about those last two days, the House will obviously wish me to say something about the contents of the motion for the Adjournment. Subject to the progress of business, it will be proposed that the House should rise for the summer Adjournment on Tuesday 27 July until Monday 18 October. The House may be also asked to consider any Lords messages that may be received.

I have already announced that the debate for Thursday 22 July is subject to the signifying of Royal Assent to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. It may be helpful to the House to know that the Government motion for that debate would be

That this House, in compliance with the requirements of section 7 of the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1993, notes the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the adoption of the protocol on social policy.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committees will meet on Wednesday 21 July to consider European Community documents as follows:

Committee A, document No. 6654/93 on control of residues in meat; Committee B, document No. 9909/92 on human rights, democracy and development.

[Tuesday 20 July

Immigration and Asylum

1. Statement of changes in Immigration Rules (HC 725)

2. Asylum Appeals (Procedure) Rules (SI 1661)

3. Immigration Appeals (Procedure) (Amendment) Rules (SI 1662)

4. Immigration (Restricted Right of Appeal Against Deportation) (Exemption) Order (SI 1656)

Wednesday 21 July

Estimates Day

Class VIII, Vote 1, Police, Criminal Injuries Compensation Board and other grants, England and Wales; Class VIII, Vote 3, Home Office Administration, Immigration, Probation and Police Support Services, England and Wales; Class IX, Vote 1, Lord Chancellor's Department: Administration of Justice: England and Wales; and Class IX, Vote 5, the Crown Prosecution Service: Administration, in so far as they related to Domestic Violence.

The Third Report of the Home Affairs Committee, Session 1992-93 (HC 245-1) and the Government reply to the Third Report from the Home Affairs Committee, Session 1992-93 (CM 2269) are relevant.

Wednesday 21 July

European Standing Committee A—Relevant European Community document: 6654/93, control of residues in meat; relevant European Legislation Committee report: HC 79-xxxiv (1992-93).

European Standing Committee B—Relevant European Community document: 9909/92, human rights, democracy and development co-operation; relevant European Legislation Committee reports: HC 79-xviii (1992-93); HC 79-xxv (1992-93).]

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): The Lord President of the Council will know that we have pressed on a number of occasions for a debate in Government time on the stocktaking exercise that was announced for Scotland. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman recalls that the major part of those proposals was the offer of extra meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee.

Is he aware that, despite an extra long Session, the Scottish Grand Committee has met less often than usual, rather than more? I understand from my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland that we would normally expect two or three meetings at such a stage in the Session. It is said that the Secretary of State has issued instructions to cancel all the meetings scheduled before the summer recess. Is not that a betrayal of the undertakings given in the House and of the people of Scotland? Should not the Secretary of State therefore come to the House to answer for that decision, preferably in a debate in Government time?

Is the Lord President also aware that the Opposition are concerned about the somewhat last-minute switch of Friday's debate? We were hoping for and would still press for a debate on the affairs of London. There is also concern at the guillotining of the sole day's debate allowed for the Education Bill, to which, I understand, some 600 amendments have been tabled in another place.

The Leader of the House should be aware that it is our view that, first, it is not fair to the House to allow only one day with a guillotine motion to debate that number of amendments. Secondly, amendments on that scale and scope do not suggest Government responsiveness to outside pressure, but either indecision in policy-making or incompetence in the execution of legislation.

I ask the Leader of the House to recognise that, although we all appreciate his statement that the Government's plans for the final week allow for some fluidity, we hope that he will accept that the House should be told officially by him if there are likely to be major votes in the final week.

Mr. Newton: I shall take the points in the order in which they were raised. On the Scottish stocktaking exercise, I understand that the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) cancelled the meeting due this week with the Secretary of State to discuss strengthening the Scottish Grand Committee.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West) indicated dissent.

Mr. Newton: I understand that the Opposition have repeatedly failed to take up all the opportunities available to them to debate issues in the Scottish Grand Committee. I note that there is some dispute about that from a sedentary position by the hon. Gentleman. I will certainly draw that and what the right hon. Lady has said to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

The right hon. Lady asked about a debate on London. Her request left me slightly wondering whether I had inadvertently failed to announce the business for Friday 23 July. If I did, I shall put the matter right. There will be a debate on the environment, on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. That is the debate that the right hon. Lady had hoped would be on London. The Government have concluded that it would be more appropriate for it to be on the environment. It is fair to say that there will clearly be opportunities for matters concerned with London to be raised on a number of occasions of the kind that take place before the House adjourns for the summer recess.

The arrangements announced for the Education Bill are for the general convenience of the House. I believe that the time that we have allocated is adequate for consideration of the Lords amendments. It is our intention that the opportunity for discussion should extend to midnight rather than to 10 pm, to take account of the concerns that the right hon. Lady expressed.

The right hon. Lady asked whether there would be votes in the final week. She will be aware that the motion for the Adjournment can technically be voted on, as can the motion that paves the way for the Consolidated Fund debate. She and her right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench may be able to have some influence on the question whether such votes take place.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): Will my right hon. Friend be able to arrange an early debate on law and order issues, which are of great concern to my constituents and no doubt to the constituents of other hon. Members? Will he endeavour to ensure that such a debate takes into account the Government's announcements and the recent release of the Sheehy report? Will he ensure that law and order is shown as being at the top of the Government's priorities?

Mr. Newton: I very much appreciate my hon. Friend's reasons for adverting to this extremely important subject. It was only a fortnight ago, in the immediate aftermath of the Sheehy report, the royal commission report and the White Paper on the police, that the Government arranged for a full day's debate on law and order matters. However, the importance of the subject is such that I hope in due course to be able to provide further opportunities. My hon. Friend, whom I know to be an assiduous attender, may find an opportunity to raise the matter on the summer Adjournment, or he may wish to put in for a debate on the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the Leader of the House turn his mind to the possibility of a debate in Government time at the earliest opportunity on GATT? I understand that some progress was made at the G7 summit, but I know that there is a great deal of concern in textile communities and agricultural communities that there should be an early statement or debate on this very important subject.

Mr. Newton: I am sure that many share the hon. Gentleman's view of the importance of the subject, as the Government clearly do. It is difficult to see how to fit such a debate into the programme that I have announced. I have a feeling that the hon. Gentleman may wish to go on holiday as much as others do.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): To avoid any confusion about Thursday's business, can the Leader of the House confirm that, in the event of the House on Thursday approving an amendment that gives support to the social chapter, there will be an opportunity immediately thereafter, if the House so wishes, to vote down the motion as amended, and thereby to remove any commitment to or support for the social chapter?

Mr. Newton: It would be inappropriate for me to attempt to dictate the handling of the procedures of the House with you, Madam Speaker, sitting there with your eagle eye upon me. I will leave that matter to you.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 2317 on the siege of Sarajevo?

[That this House notes with grave concern that Sarajevo has been under siege for 15 months and that its people are living in atrocious conditions, including having to boil up sewage water for drinking water as there is no fuel to operate the pumps that could clean the water due to the Serb paramilitaries' refusal to allow United Nations fuel convoys through to the city; further notes that surgeons cannot wash their hands before performing operations, that the first cases of typhus have been reported and that the World Health Organisation is predicting imminent epidemics of typhus, dysentery and cholera; believes that the United Nations has the authority to lift the siege of Sarajevo; urges urgent action to lift the siege and save a multi-ethnic and multi-cultural community which has so far resisted ethnic division and which symbolises the values of the United Nations Charter; and welcomes the decision of the Helsinki Citizens' Assembly to hand in its appeal for action to lift the siege to the Prime Minister at 10 Downing Street, at 10 am on 15 July, along with samples of untreated sewage water, as a reminder of the atrocious conditions in which the people of Sarajevo are forced to exist.]

Sarajevo is a multi-ethnic, multicultural mixed community which has been under siege for 15 months and is now at the end of its tether. Water supplies have been cut off by Serbian paramilitaries, and there is a great danger of typhus and other epidemics spreading within the area.

Can we debate the situation in Sarajevo? Would the right hon. Gentleman like to drink the water that I have here in the Chamber, which is the sewage and untreated water presently being used in Sarajevo?

Mr. Newton: I need hardly say that the Government share the hon. Gentleman's concern about the critical humanitarian situation in Sarajevo and in other safe areas that have been established under UN Security Council resolution 836. It is deplorable that the parties involved in the conflict should withhold supplies of vital utilities. It is increasingly important that the early arrival of troops and equipments to implement the safe areas resolution should be secured. It is also important for Governments to step up their contributions to the humanitarian effort.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): The Leader of the House will be aware that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has just made a statement to the House on open government. In that statement, he went as far as he reasonably could down the road towards open government, without being sidetracked into the primrose path of ungovernability.

It would be wrong of me to suggest that the summer Session be extended any further than has been proposed, but does my right hon. Friend agree that it might be helpful for the House to have an opportunity to debate freedom of information, as until now that opportunity has been given only to Standing Committee Members for a short time on one Friday earlier this month?

Mr. Newton: It would indeed be helpful, but it may be easier for me to be helpful later in the year, rather than next week.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): When can we expect to have a debate on the report of the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice? Many hon. Members were surprised that there was not a statement from the Secretary of State for the Home Department. There is widespread curiosity about the Government's plans for implementing some of the reforms that are proposed in the report. When can we expect a debate on the subject?

Mr. Newton: Not next week, Madam Speaker. However, there may be time during Home Office questions on Thursday 22 July to raise the matter. As to the rest of the hon. Gentleman's question, I should have thought that probably everybody would think it sensible for the Government to spend time studying the royal commission's report before rushing to conclusions.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson (Aberdeen, South): Will my right hon. Friend consider having an early debate on early-day motion 2319, which deals with the subject of an energy tax as outlined in a recent edition of Labour Party News?

[This this House notes the discrepancy between the policy expressed in the House and elsewhere by the Leader of the Opposition, especially regarding VAT on domestic fuel, and the latest edition of Labour Party News which invites Labour Party members to consider shifting taxation from 'good things', such as income, towards bad things, such as 'resource depletion', specifically suggesting an energy tax as one alternative; and calls upon the Leader of the Opposition to clarify his or his party's position by making a statement to the House at the earliest opportunity.]

As the right hon. Member for Derby South (Mrs. Beckett) seems reluctant to use an Opposition day for a debate on the subject, will my right hon. Friend consider using a Government day?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the somewhat curious position of the Leader of the Opposition and his hon. Friends. They have made a good deal of noise about VAT, but have also made it clear that they are considering wide-ranging proposals for energy taxes.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Govan): Will the Leader of the House take note of the revelations on television and in newspapers this week about outdoor pursuit centres? Some of those centres are still taking on staff without checking their qualifications. Those members of staff are likely to undertake hazardous activity with children.

Will the right hon. Gentleman note that one of the centres concerned was the St. Alban's centre in Lyme Regis, which was involved in a tragedy in which four of my constituents lost their lives? In view of the deep and bitter anger that is felt by my constituents who lost their children in that tragedy, and the fact that hundreds of thousands of children will be undertaking such holidays in the next few weeks, will the Leader of the House find time next week to debate that important matter?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to find such time, despite the undoubted importance of the matter that the hon. Gentleman has raised—although he may be able to find his own opportunity to raise it on one of the occasions to which I have already referred. I shall of course ensure that his remarks are drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friends who are concerned with these matters.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Will my right hon. Friend consider the fact that my constituents will be surprised that Parliament will not next week be holding a debate, at the request of the Opposition, to express pleasure at the fall in the unemployment figures? It seems that we are not to have a debate on the justice system, either. That, too, is surprising.

A music teacher's killer, who was high on drugs, who had been vandalising cars and threatening people in the neighbourhood, and who had a knife in his pocket, has not been found guilty of murder or of manslaughter and has been let off as a result of a clever legal plea of self-defence. Surely that constitutes a major problem, and Parliament should debate the justice system as early as possible.

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's request, which is similar to one from my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason). Manifestly, I am not in a position to promise a full-scale debate next week. My hon. Friend will know that the Home Secretary has asked officials closely to examine the case to which he has referred to see whether there are lessons that can be learned. I am sure that the whole House supports such an examination.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): Given today's statement on open government, will the Leader of the House arrange for his colleagues from the Department of Transport to make a statement on their policies of open government, especially in the light of a letter that they sent me yesterday about the extension of the A550 and the public inquiry associated with it? They should explain why, in this era of open government, the public inquiry is not to be held in the area cut through by the road; it is to be held outside the constituency—indeed, in the country next door, Wales. The place where it is to be held is not even known to my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones)—although I suspect that that may come up in the debate later this afternoon.

Mr. Newton: The safest course for me on this occasion is to draw attention to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is due to answer questions on Monday 26 July. If the hon. Gentleman cares to stay on that long—I might encourage him to go on holiday earlier—he might get an opportunity.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): My right hon. Friend will know of the concern in my constituency about the redrawing of the assisted areas map. Can he assure me that there will be a statement on that before we rise for the summer, and if possible next week?

Mr. Newton: I can certainly assure my hon. Friend that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry will aim to make a statement at the earliest possible opportunity; but at the moment we are awaiting the European Commission's conclusions on the proposals that the British Government have put to it.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): As the Leader of the House already recognised the importance that hon. Members attach to the report of the Sheehy inquiry, could he arrange next week, or certainly before the House rises, to give us an idea of the legislative programme that will be followed in this context? Many Members will be discussing the matter with representatives of police forces during the summer recess, and it would be helpful to know whether there will be separate Scottish legislation, given the differences between Home Office and Scottish Office responsibilities.

Mr. Newton: The position on the Sheehy report is pretty much the same as that on the royal commission, about which I was asked earlier. It is not a report by the Government or a set of conclusions by the Government: it is a report which the Government and others need to consider.

As for the rest of her question, the hon. Lady has been here long enough to know that the Leader of the House does not anticipate the Gracious Speech in the autumn.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): Will it be possible at an early stage for the House to discuss the changes taking place in the Province of Northern Ireland, to allow us to debate the obvious abandonment of that Province by the Opposition, and the obvious failings of the Anglo-Irish Agreement? In such a debate, we could also put in context the Government's efforts to defeat terrorism and repeat our commitment to the people of Northern Ireland and to the union that it represents.

Mr. Newton: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is perhaps surprising that the Opposition have chosen to use their Opposition day next week to discuss the subject that I read out, rather than the extremely important signs that have been given about a major change in their policy towards Northern Ireland, which would call into question the whole constitutional basis of the arrangements.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to the fact that, this morning, the West Midlands regional health authority decided that the Department of Health has no moral obligation to the pensioners of Qa Business Services. Will he arrange for his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House next week to explain why it is felt that there is a moral obligation to give £10,000 to a discredited chairman of a regional health authority, yet pay nothing to people who have lost their security in their old age as a result of a bungled privatisation?

Mr. Newton: I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend to that question.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): My right hon. Friend will recall that, during the statement on the Defence White Paper a few days ago, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State said that he would make a separate statement concerning the procurement of tanks for future British Army requirements. As there will be several opportunities for export sales of the Challenger 2 tank —opportunities that would be much enhanced by an early and positive statement, which would benefit greatly my constituents and the industrial infrastructure in Leeds— will my right hon. Friend see whether such a statement could be made as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Newton: I shall brief my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, who is due to be here on Tuesday, on at least one of the questions that he may be asked.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): As the Leader of the House has already suggested that the Home Secretary will want to give time to debate the Runciman report, will he be willing to bring forward for discussion, with particular urgency, the recommendation for a criminal cases review authority?

Just as many hon. Members share the concerns of the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) about the case that has occurred recently, it is also true that there are many instances where people are in prison and have maintained their innocence over several years. There is an urgent need for an authority to be set up, preferably with its own independent investigating officers.

Mr. Newton: I shall take that as a clear sign of support for one of the recommendations, but I do not want to add to what I said earlier about it being right for the Government to consider the report before jumping to conclusions.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): While I acknowledge the response that my right hon. Friend gave to an earlier question, will he reconsider, for the sake of the minority parties, the decision to hold an urgent debate for a day on law and order, as only one of the Liberal Democrats managed to attend the last such debate? Perhaps that would give them a chance to reassess the importance that they attach to the issue.

Mr. Newton: That is a helpful question. I note that it has been heard by the Liberal Chief Whip, who will no doubt ensure better attendance on a future occasion.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Will the Leader of the House consider having a debate next week on the White Paper that the Government published on Tuesday about Sunday trading? Is he aware that the House should at least have had a statement from the Home Secretary on their complex document? Those who support one particular option would like to know why the Government are dictating to the House the terms of the option that any organisation may wish to offer regarding employment protection. The Government are under an obligation to present the House with a statement so that they can qualify on what grounds they are dictating the options that will be presented to the House.

Mr. Newton: My understanding is that there is no question whatever of the Government trying to dictate to anybody. There has been some difficulty in getting sufficient details of proposals from some quarters to turn them into the form in which they have appeared in the White Paper. As to the question of an early debate, the whole purpose of publishing the document at this time was to give all Members of the House a good opportunity to study the whole range of options and think about the issues before we debate them in detail later in the year.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Will it be appropriate in the Adjournment debate on the environment on Friday to discuss carbon taxes and their role in preserving the environment? If it will be, could my right hon. Friend arrange to have copies of "Costing the Earth", "Looking to the Future" and the Labour and Liberal manifestos available in the Vote Office, so that people can look at those documents and their contribution to the debate on carbon taxes, particularly as the Liberal Democrats' manifesto called for a larger than VAT tax on energy, with the money so raised being used to reduce the VAT scales on luxury items?

Madam Speaker: Order. That is hardly a matter for next week.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend has made some good points. I am not sure whether it would be proper for me to make the documents available, but I shall do everything I can to ensure that as many people as possible are made further aware of them, together with some other recent documents about an energy tax published by the Labour party. My hon. Friend makes a good point about next week's business, in that it would seem to me that there is a jolly good chance that it would be in order to consider such matters in the debate on the environment.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): It is unfortunate that the Secretary of State for Employment has not taken the opportunity to make an announcement about the future of May day. There are three possible reasons for that: first, he intends to make an announcement in the recess, when it cannot be subject to scrutiny; secondly, he will make an announcement in the autumn, which will cause considerable inconvenience to the leisure trade and to the printing industry, which will be preparing diaries and calendars; thirdly, he has realised that the whole idea is a load of dogmatic nonsense and is trying to get rid of it.

Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State to come to the House to make a statement and clarify the matter?

Mr. Newton: I will bring to my right hon. Friend's attention the hon. Gentleman's engaging speculations. All that I can say is that an announcement on those matters will be made in due course.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 2100 and my amendment to it?

[That this House condemns the heavy-handed and bullying methods employed by GrandMet in its manoeuvres against the Morning Advertiser's campaign on behalf of Inntrepreneur tenants; notes that the Agriculture Select Committee believed that the Government's policy towards the brewing industry has done nothing to help tenants whilst the six giant breweries have increased their market share by five per cent. to 82 per cent. since the introduction of the Beer Orders; believes that the issues raised by the Morning Advertiser report of 21st May call in question both the fair trading policy of Her Majesty's Government and the actual working practices of GrandMet; and calls upon the President of the Board of Trade to instigate and immediate inquiry into the state of the brewing and licensed trade before more tenants are forced out of business.]

It refers to the bully-boy tactics of Inntrepreneur Estates, the unacceptable face of the brewing industry, which is charging exorbitant rents, driving people into bankruptcy and causing disturbances in an industry whose problems were supposed to be solved after the report from the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Despite the fact that the brewers distribute largesse to Conservative party funds, can we have a statement from a Trade and Industry Minister on what will be done to help the tenants and the consumers of the brewery industry's products?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman can ask that question directly of Trade and Industry Ministers, with luck, on Wednesday 21 July.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement and a debate next week on local government reorganisation in Wales? On 1 March, the Secretary of State for Wales announced proposals for reorganisation, only for hon. Members to find yesterday, in the Welsh Grand Committee, that large chunks of these proposals had been ripped out and new ones put in. That is an affront to democracy, particularly as Parliament will have no opportunity to scrutinise the White Paper before the Bill is produced in October. That is a disgrace, and the Secretary of State should make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise either a debate or a statement, but the organisation of parliamentary questions next week is turning out rather well, because the Secretary of State for Wales is here on Monday.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will the Leader of the House ensure that, when we have our debate on open government, it will include consideration of the procedures used in the House to correct untruthful parliamentary answers received by hon. Members?

Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that today I received a letter from the Minister of State for the Armed Forces telling me that information given to me last month —that British soldiers in the Gulf were warned of the danger of depleted uranium shells—was completely untrue? Is it not right that, when untrue answers are given, they are corrected in Hansard with a supplementary answer and not given to individual Members in a private letter?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman has clearly found a way to draw attention to the letter that he received. I shall draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to that point.

Mr. Cryer: Can I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 2315, headed "Questions of procedure for Ministers"?

[That this House notes that section 107 of the Rules for Ministers says 'Ministers must resign any directorships they hold when they take up office' and is concerned to note that in recent company returns Viscount Cranbourne is a director of Stalbury Trustees, which is devoted to the promotion of conservative principles; further notes that the honourable Member for Conwy is a director of Professional Secretarial Services Ltd., that the honourable Member for Richmond and Barnes is a director of Sheridon-Hanley Enterprises Ltd., and that the honourable Member for Suffolk South is a director of Aracol Holdings Ltd., a subsidiary of which has principally been engaged in security dealing; and calls on the Prime Minister to investigate these breaches of Ministerial rules and publish his conclusions.]

Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that the Prime Minister published that document? Therefore, breaches of rule 107 by four Ministers—there are more—holding directorships should be answered by the Prime Minister in a statement. It is no good publishing the rules for Ministers if they are to be breached behind closed doors. There should be accountability to the House to demonstrate that Ministers are not breaching the rules. The companies listed have nothing to do with Ministers' family estates.

Mr. Newton: I understand that, in all the cases that the hon. Gentleman has in mind, the companies are wholly concerned with private family financial affairs. The Ministers concerned are satisfied that there is no conflict between their private interests and their public duties. In those circumstances, there would appear to be nothing further to investigate.

Points of Order

4.45 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Questions to the Leader of the House are an important moment in the parliamentary week and one that Back-Bench Members treasure because it gives them access to a discussion of the subjects that are to be debated next week. Increasingly, that time is being used by some hon. Members to ask the Leader of the House to comment on party political points. That is a derogation of the rights of hon. Members and does neither the Government nor individual Conservative Members any credit.

Madam Speaker: That gives me an opportunity to remind the House that business questions should relate to the business next week. Far too many hon. Members go into great detail, making long comments about personal and constituency cases. It is an important period in our proceedings and I hope that hon. Members will take to heart the fact that they should ask questions relating directly to the business for the next week. They should be put briskly and directly to the Lord President, who, I am sure, will do his best to give short replies.

Summer Adjournment Debate

4.46 pm

Madam Speaker: I have a short statement to make about arrangements for the debate on the motion for the Adjournment which will follow the passing of the Consolidated Fund Bill on Monday 26 July.

Members should submit their subjects to my office not later than 10 pm on Wednesday 21 July. A list showing the subjects and times will be published the following day. Normally, the time allotted will not exceed one and a half hours, but I propose to exercise a discretion to allow one or two debates to continue for rather longer, up to a maximum of three hours.

Where identical or similar subjects have been entered by different Members whose names are drawn in the ballot, only the first name will be shown on the list. As some debates may not last the full time allotted to them, it is the responsibility of Members to keep in touch with developments if they are not to miss their turn.

Orders of the Day

Welsh Language Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair.]

New clause 1

OFFICIAL STATUS OF THE WELSH LANGUAGE (NO. 1)

'That the official status of the Welsh language shall be not less than the official status of English in the conduct of public business and the administration of justice in Wales.'.—[Mr. Morgan]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.51 pm

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss also the following: New clause 2—Official status of the Welsh language (No. 2)—

'(1) For the avoidance of doubt, the Welsh language shall be regarded as having official status in the conduct of official or public business and in the administration of justice in Wales and shall be treated on a basis of equality with the English language in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

(2) Official or public business for the purposes of this Act means business conducted in Wales or with persons resident in Wales by the Crown and by public bodies as defined in section 6 of this Act.'.

New clause 8—National status of the Welsh language

'As the national language of Wales, the Welsh language shall be regarded, along with the English language, as an official language of Wales for the conduct of public business and the administration of justice in Wales, as defined by this Act, and both languages shall be treated on a basis of equality.'.

New clause 9—Official status within Wales of the Welsh language for European Community purposes—

'For the avoidance of doubt, in matters relating to which the European Community institutions may have jurisdiction, the Welsh and English languages shall be regarded as official languages in Wales and both languages shall be treated on a basis of equality.'.

Mr. Morgan: With new clause 1, we come to what, by common consent, is the moment of truth for the Bill. It has been a long time getting to Report stage as we are the second House to deal with it, so the Government have had many opportunities to fulfil their promises to be a listening Government and to be conscious of the fact that the Conservatives are in a minority in Wales. When the Minister gives his final comments on the Government's opinion on the issue of official status and the Welsh Language Bill, he will have something constructive to say.

The Minister is probably as aware as any other hon. Member that, throughout the passage of the Bill, the Government have promised that, at the next stage or the stage after, they will have considered the objections made to the omission of reference to official status. There is no longer a next stage. Today is the day. Report is the penultimate stage, with only Third Reading to come. This is the last opportunity that the Government have—I am pleased to see that the Secretary of State has arrived for the moment of truth—to convert this Bill into what it says in its title. It says that it is the Welsh Language Bill, but unfortunately what we actually have is a Welsh language quango Bill—what might be called a quango for the lingo. We want it to be a genuine Welsh Language Bill, not a Bill simply about setting up another quango.

When people in Wales hear that the Government have it in mind to set up another quango, they say, "Lord save us from another quango; do not create it, cremate it; cremate it before you create it"—or whatever their phrase might be. They are deeply suspicious about the Bill. It is all very well to have a Welsh Language Board, but there has to be a context within which it can operate, or Parliament is simply washing its hands of issues relating to the Welsh language and passing them on to a nominated body.

We are therefore worried that the title of this Bill is a misnomer. It is rather like the incident in the 13th century —I am sure that some of the historians on the B[illegible] Benches will correct me if necessary—when Edward II told the Welsh princes that he was going to create a Prince of Wales who did not speak a word of English. They thought that he intended to choose one of them for the job, but he produced a babe in arms who did not speak any language at all.

In presenting the House with a Welsh Language Bill, but not giving it a legal context within which to work in relation to aims, objectives, goals, status and rights, the Government have left the quango completely dependent on definitions of common sense, and all being good chaps and understanding roughly what the Government want in terms of doing something, but not going too far, not pressurising people too much, not spending too much money, and not conferring rights, which would be inconvenient. It is all far too reliant on what has been referred to elsewhere as the good chap theory of government. It is not our job as legislators to leave it to the good chaps, with the occasional statutory woman, perhaps, on the quango. Our job is to write good, tight, comprehensive, well-thought-out, long-lasting legislation and this is the last opportunity that we in this place will have to make sure that the legislation does last.

Our new clause 1 is based on what we believe to be a compromise between new clause 2, which contains a declaratory statement about official status for the language, and the Government's use of the verbal device of the Welsh language being treated on a basis of equality. We are acting in the spirit of trying to meet the Government halfway and hope that the Government will respond by trying to meet us halfway.

It sounded as though there had been no further movement on the Government's part—but there may have been further consideration since then—in the exchanges between the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and the Prime Minister in Prime Minister's questions on Tuesday. They were not promising at all, but we are hopeful that, if this Report stage is to have a meaning and is not some sort of charade, the Government have the ability and the freedom to consider what we shall be saying this afternoon. They have had two further days now to think about what the consequences will be if they completely reject any idea of linking the Bill with some form of official status.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I agree wholeheartedly with what the hon. Gentleman is saying. Has he noticed that, during the last two or three days, the Government have had representations from Beata Brookes, chairperson of the Consumer Council, urging official status, and from the Archbishop of Wales, numerous members of the other place, and different denominations of churches and chapels in Wales? The will of Wales on this matter has been quite clearly declared. Is not it time that the Government listened to Wales rather than their own advisers?

Mr. Morgan: I could not agree more. I believe that the Government would like to be judge and jury in their own house because they won the election, but judges and juries in Wales have been pressing on them very strongly the idea that official status must be a part of the Bill if it is to have any meaning. The Government must show some humility with respect to their weak political position in Wales and their lack of democratic sanction for what they are doing. That is not to say that we expect them suddenly to resign over the issue, but they should recognise that they are not the majority party, or anything like it, and never have been since the secret ballot was introduced. They must be conscious, therefore, of who can, roughly speaking, say that they represent feelings in Wales, and not ride roughshod over the feelings expressed by people who can claim majority representation in Wales.

We are very concerned that the Welsh Language Board, in the absence of a reference to official status, will be working in a vacuum. There is a difference between

"on a basis of equality"

and

"that the official status of the Welsh language shall be not less than the official status of English."

This amendment attempts to meet the objection that the Government have already mentioned in the other place and at different stages in this House: that the Bill might open up a legal Pandora's box and legal cases for years to come. Obviously, the Secretary of State is something of an expert on Pandora's boxes after his efforts on local government yesterday. Nevertheless, we believe that the Government must be conscious that, when they do things in relation to the Welsh language, they must not act like a colonial governor-general.

We are not criticising the Government's lack of generosity in financial terms to the Welsh language. We can see from the Government's expenditure plans that they hand out a considerable amount of money to Welsh language organisations. They can boast about it in their mauve-coloured book. They can say that the Urdd Gobaith Cymru—the Welsh youth movement—gets so many hundreds of thousands of pounds every year, the Welsh Books Council gets a subsidy, the Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin—the Welsh nursery schools movement—gets a subsidy, and the National Eisteddfod gets £360,000, but these are all handouts.

The age of the handout and the quango is considered very demeaning in Wales. People in Wales want rights, not handouts. There is always the thought of Secretaries of State, and even Ministers of State, who are from Wales —which makes a change—calling up the tribal chieftains, as it were, in their grass skirts and carrying their spears, and saying that they can have a collection of Gideon bibles, beads, and so on, but they cannot have rights; the natives must be kept quiet, but they are not to be given rights, although we will give them £150,000 for this and £250,000 for that.

It can be said that, except in the context of a Welsh Language Bill, the Government do not have an opportunity to confer rights on people. They are in the handout business each year when they are looking at the budget for the Welsh Books Council, and so on, but we have an opportunity now with the Welsh Language Bill before us. That is why it is important to confer these rights on the Welsh language, the speakers of the Welsh language, and those who may not be Welsh-speaking themselves, but want their children to be educated in Welsh, as a matter of right.

The Government have probably not, so far, understood the importance of the Welsh language to Welsh identity. They are probably misunderstanding the nature of the union of the United Kingdom, which this Parliament represents, and the difference between Scottish and the Welsh circumstances.

The Scottish Acts of Union were not based on absorption; they were based on allowing the Scottish people to retain all their separate legal, administrative, educational and religious separateness, and their separate identity, because it was a relatively voluntary arrangement. The Welsh Acts of Union were not voluntary at all; they were based on the principle of absorption.

Mr. Jonathan Evans (Brecon and Radnor): No. We absorbed the English.

Mr. Morgan: Well, it may be possible to make out a case on one historic reading, but there was no doubt where the power lay, as distinct from where the office lay—although I do not want to go into the remarks of the previous Chancellor of the Exchequer on the difference between being in office and being in power now, because that would be a very considerable diversion.

Wales did not have—except in relation to markets ouverts and, later on, Sunday drinking—any separate legal, administrative or educational structures; and, until the disestablishment of the Church in Wales, it had no separate religious structures either. So the only thing that prevented the complete absorption of Wales into England, until the arrival, possibly, of international rugby and football matches between Wales and England in the 1870s, was the language.

In the preservation of Welsh identity in the 17th and 18th centuries, and most of the 19th, the language performed the function provided in Scotland by its separate administrative, educational and religious structures. We did not have that; our language was all that we had to prevent our being absorbed. That is why it is so important to appreciate the extent to which—even for those who do not speak Welsh—the language defines Welsh identity. Most people in Wales secure their national identity either by supporting Welsh rugby, soccer or other sports teams, or by speaking Welsh.

5 pm

I do not think that that point has been fully appreciated, especially by Conservative Members who are not Welsh. I remember when Billy Boston opened the Welsh Sports Hall of Fame in Cardiff. In the introduction to the ceremony, his wonderful rugby league career was described: it was said that he was the biggest rugby league scorer ever and had made more appearances in cup finals for Wigan and won more Great Britain caps in matches played against Australia than anyone else in the history of the game. When asked to say a few words, he said, "Yes, but I would have given all that up if I could only have won a cap for Wales." Every grown man present was suddenly in floods of tears. To Billy Boston, gaining a Welsh identity would have meant putting on the red jersey of Wales. Before 1880, it was not possible to play rugby league for Wales because it did not yet exist in any significant sense; in those days, the language linked people with their roots and gave them the identity about which the Scots do not need to worry.

New clause 1 is critical. It refers to "official status", but in not making it declaratory we have attempted to meet the Government's objections. We believe that it also covers the point about reciprocity of European Community legislation. Those wishing to sell Welsh goods on the continent, and to list ingredients and the like in Welsh, would have the right to do so. They would have the right to put Welsh lava bread in bijou little containers and have it sold in delicatessens on the Champs Elysees, Unter-den-Linden or the Via Venezia, listing all the ingredients in Welsh, just as Greek ouzo is now sold in Queen street or St. Mary's street in Cardiff.

The Government refer to "a basis of equality" in the Bill, but make no reference to official status. New clause 2 goes much further, including a declaratory statement with regard to official status—although it also defines and confines it in a way that I hope to discuss later. We have a few bob staked on new clause 2, but we basically believe that the Government should meet us half way by dispensing with the weasel words "a basis of".

I have mentioned the importance of the Welsh language to Welsh identity and the importance of official status in repairing the damage done to the language—not only by the Acts of Union, but by the introduction of universal primary education exclusively in English in the 1870s and 1880s. That period marked the beginning of the numerical decline of the language from its peak in the 1880s and the start of the inexorable westward march of the English-Welsh dividing line across industrial south Wales. At roughly that time, it began in the eastern valleys of Monmouthshire; more or less every decade another valley has been picked off. Now, in the 1990s, the battle lines—although that may not be an appropriate term—for the future of the language have reached the Tawe and Swansea valleys and, to an extent, the Neath valley.

The language continues to decline in one sense. There has been an apparent slowing down of that decline, caused by the number of children between the ages of three and 15 attending Welsh schools. However, if we ignore that age group, we find that, between 1981 and 1991, the decline in the census was very sharp. There was a fall of some seven percentage points in the number of people outside the school age group who spoke Welsh; the position was therefore rather artificial. The fear that the westward march of the English language across industrial south Wales will continue into the year 2000 is very damaging.

The fact that informal official status has been given to the Welsh language by administrative action and devolution to Wales is a purely coincidental by-product of the rise to political importance of Lloyd George, the United Kingdom's only Welsh Prime Minister, and the arrival of Tom Jones as the United Kingdom's only Welsh Cabinet Secretary in the late 1910s and the early 1920s. From that arose the concept of public business with which the Bill deals.

It was fortunate, perhaps, that in its early days the BBC was headed by a Scot, who was reasonably sympathetic towards matters Celtic. There were some counteracting forces in the public world. Nevertheless, even as late as the 1960s, the average person bringing up children in Wales probably thought it preferable for his children not to learn Welsh if they were to get on in life. That phrase was continually heard among the common people. Perhaps the middle classes picked up the idea first from the gradual re-establishment of Welsh in the world of education and the expansion of the university system, which placed some emphasis on the language.

Gradually, the world of public business achieved a turnround in the status of the Welsh language and over the past 20 or 30 years people have thought about whether they want their children to be brought up speaking Welsh. However, it has been purely an informal process. Some of the residual damage done by the Acts of Union and the use of the Welsh knot to extirpate the language after the introduction of primary education on a universal and English-only basis in the 1870s is still present. Over the generations, fewer families have been Welsh-speaking and thus able to bring up their children as Welsh speakers.

The Bill can act as the culmination of a gradual turnround that has been taking place since shortly after the first world war. The Government's attitude to the Welsh language has been converted: rather than trying to uproot it, on the basis that it was bad for everyone in Wales to speak Welsh—that it held them back from economic expansion—they have gradually perceived that that approach constitutes a denial of rights, identity and people's connection with their historic roots.

The Government are introducing a Welsh Language Bill, but they have made no reference to what it seeks to achieve. As I have said, we want it to represent the culmination of the process that I have described. We believe that the Government should not only cease to try to uproot the language and get rid of it altogether, but confer official status on it to right the wrongs of the period between the 16th and 19th centuries.

The Secretary of State is gradually learning about matters Welsh. He experienced a great conversion on the road to St. Mellons in regard to unmarried mothers: indeed, he thinks that he may be the first person to speak about the matter publicly in Wales. Strangely enough, however, the main attempt to uproot the language was made by commissioners appointed by the House in the 1840s. The House was extremely worried about the Rebecca and Merthyr riots and about the Chartists; so three commissioners were sent to try to work out what was wrong with the Welsh.

The commissioners said that there were two things wrong with the Welsh: they kept having babies without marrying and they spoke Welsh. I must tell the Secretary of State that the St. Mellons estate had not been built at that time. The commissioners arrived in Wales knowing nothing about it and believing that there was something seriously wrong with the Welsh—largely because they could not understand them and because their habits did not seem to meet the standards of Balliol or Wokingham.

The Bill provides an opportunity to remedy that damage and repression. I commend new clause 1 to the House.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I shall be brief because I am anxious not to take time from hon. Members whose names are appended to the new clauses, and I wish only to make a point of principle in relation to those clauses.

The Bill starts with a preamble, as do all measures. But any lawyer who is used to addressing courts on the meaning of statutes knows that it is rarely appropriate, and even more rarely helpful, to address the court on the preamble. The substance of any Act of Parliament is contained in the text, not in the preamble.

When examining a Bill of this kind, one looks to clause 1 for the principle underlying the measure. What are the people being told? Parliament speaks to the people of Wales by the way it acts in the measure. The message that clause 1 sends to the people of Wales is that there shall be established a Welsh Language Board.

The establishment of that body has been welcomed. It has already done some excellent work, work which in some ways surpasses the excellence of the Bill. The creation of a statutory Welsh Language Board is at least equally welcome, but the people of Wales will not be satisfied with the creation of such a board and the consequent legal framework as an end in itself.

We have few opportunities to create for Wales legislation which is as specific and momentous as this. So let us not run away from this opportunity to do something momentous for Wales. Many people in Wales are speaking Welsh fluently, many children from non-Welsh speaking homes are learning to speak Welsh fluently and many youngsters who have perhaps learnt Welsh at school and not at home have become fluent speakers. They are ambitious, not to leave but to stay in Wales.

We should recognise those achievements by giving Welsh a status that is not a vague statement in the preamble to the Bill but is recognised in the first clause as setting out the aspiration of the measure and the determination of Parliament to provide something new and momentous for the people of Wales.

There could be no better way to achieve that than by giving Welsh its true and proper official status as an equal language in Wales in all official respects. I have read with care all the reasons that have been given for preferring the phrase "equal validity" and leaving it in the preamble, compared with giving the Welsh language enacted official status in the body of the measure.

The reasons given for that preference seem to be distilled into an assertion that there may be legal problems and that it may do nothing more than provide work for lawyers. Perhaps I should declare my interest as a lawyer practising in Wales. I have done that for the last 21 years. I am proud of that achievement—[Interruption.]—and I answer the catcalls by saying that, in a sense, I have been doing it for part of this week. I make no apology for fulfilling public duty in Wales in the courts earlier this week. Indeed, there are other Welsh lawyers in the House today who fulfil public duties in Wales of a similar nature, and there are others who would probably like to do so.

We in Parliament should not be afraid to take the occasional risk of doing something bold which might mean the Government, the Welsh Language Board or some other public body finding itself the subject of an application for judicial review because it is not putting into effect the terms of the Act, as the measure will become. Without the availability of judicial review, by which citizens of Wales can establish that the status of the Welsh language has been sustained, what will the Bill really be worth?

5.15 pm

I do not demur from the view that goodwill for the Welsh language is the subject of attempted expression in the Bill. I do not say that the Government have acted out of bad faith. I simply suggest that by running away from the declaration of official status for Welsh—I much prefer new clauses 2 and 8 to new clause 1—the Government are running away from the aspirations of the people of Wales.

Mr. Roger Evans (Monmouth): If Welsh had official status under new clause 1, what, as a matter of law, would that mean? Would it mean that anybody—however few people in a constituency spoke Welsh; only 2 per cent. of my constituents say that they speak Welsh—could insist that community councils or local authorities must conduct their business in Welsh and publish their records, minutes and reports in Welsh? That would seem to be the inevitable general universal application of the type of argument and drafting that the hon. and learned Gentleman is suggesting.

Mr. Carlile: The simple answer to that question is no. There is nothing in the new clauses which would lay down a requirement that the sort of extreme action to which the hon. Gentleman referred would have to be taken. I agree that it would be absurd for a community council in his constituency, in which 2 per cent. of the population speak Welsh as their first language, to have to publish minutes in the Welsh language. Indeed, in my constituency some community councils would find it extremely difficult to publish minutes in the Welsh language.

That is beside the point. We are not speaking of a requirement that every document should be in the Welsh language. To insist on that would be a patent absurdity. We are talking about the status of the Welsh language, and the Government should recognise that the only way to enable the aspirations of the people of Wales to be met by the Bill is to include that declaration of official status.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): I need not delay the House because my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) covered most aspects of Welsh history relating to the matters that we are discussing.

New clause 1 takes a minimalist approach. It is an attempt to draw the Government beyond the statement in the preamble. They should find our proposal acceptable because it provides a way to give definition to the official status of the Welsh language in Wales alongside that of English.

Some weeks ago, the Welsh Language Board wrote to hon. Members pointing out that for the new board and its chairman to be effective, the Welsh language should have official status in Wales. More recently, to my surprise, the former Member of the European Parliament for North Wales, Beata Brookes, came out strongly in favour of the Welsh language having official status. I am sure that she is well known to Conservative Members. I imagine that, privately, she will have forcibly told them her views.

I shall read one sentence from her letter, as chairwoman of the Welsh Consumer Council, to remind Conservative Members of the views of that redoubtable lady. She wrote:

"But unless the Welsh language is given official status, the ability of the Board to give real support to the language will be seriously undermined".

I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will take full account of her words.

My constituent who was the chairman of the Welsh Language Board and who recommended that it should have official status was unable to continue as chairman of the board. I do not know whether it was because the Government did not offer him the job or whether he did not wish to continue, but whatever the circumstances, there is no doubt that, given his view that it was essential for the Welsh language to have official status, he could not continue as chairman because that was not the will of the Government.

I hope today that the Government will at least accept new clause 1. I hope that they will accept new clause 2 as well, but let us hope that, on the ground of accepting a minimal compromise solution, they will accept new clause 1.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): We are as much concerned with the status of the Welsh language as we are with the establishment of the Welsh Language Board. The feeling in Wales is that without a solution to the former, the latter will be an incomplete vehicle which will be hampered from the very beginning in the object for which it was set up.

New clause 2, to which I speak, is of immense practical importance as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) has said. It is of even greater psychological importance.

Time and again on Second Reading, in Committee and in debates in the other place, the Government's view has been that a declaration of official status for the language would somehow open up a legal can of worms or an administrative Pandora's box.

The Welsh Office view is best described as excessive legal caution. Time and again we are told that the lawyers have come out against a declaration, saying that the language already enjoys official status in Wales. However, if that is true, why can we not encapsulate it in legislation so that there can be no doubt whatsoever?

The noble Earl Ferrers, on several occasions in the other place, referred to the need to clarify the position of the language and this is a great opportunity so to do. He said:

"The concept of Welsh being an official language raises similar concepts of definition and uncertainty. It is the Government view that whatever uncertainty there may have been in the past concerning the official language of Welsh, it should be removed by the Bill."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 2 February 1993; Vol. 542, c. 152.]

In reality, there is no lack of clarity. The Welsh speaker in Wales is a second class citizen in his or her own country and the amendment tries to address that. Failure to embody a declaration of status, even in the simplest terms, will merely perpetuate that unacceptable position. Worse still, it will defeat the object of the Bill.

The noble lord Lord Williams said in the other place that all the good in the rest of the Bill will be lost without a declaration of status. He said that there were many helpful measures in the Bill and I add my voice to that. I am not here to be a full-time critic, but without a declaration of status it will be an empty Bill.

The noble lord Lord Hooson said that it is necessary to have a declaration of this kind within the Act to make it totally acceptable and I shall return to that in a few minutes.

The Welsh Language Board has stated its clear view that a declaration is vital. The board took the view it should have been encapsulated in the long title. That could and should have been provided for; what is more, it could have been drafted without any problem whatsoever.

Since the somewhat turbulent passage of the Bill through the House, the immediate past chairman of the Welsh Language Board, Mr. John Elfed Jones, a man whose obvious virtues are held in high regard by many in the Chamber and elsewhere, has expressed his opinion. On a previous occasion, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) said somewhat mischievously that Mr. John Elfed Jones had done more for the language than Mr. Saunders Lewis.

I shall not debase the debate by pursuing that point, but it typifies the Government's esteem for Mr. John Elfed Jones who wrote to the Standing Committee on 18 June saying that, if the Bill omitted to include a declaration of status, the arguing and the tension in Wales would persist. Furthermore, and all-importantly, he said that the work of the board would be hampered ab initio and he spoke with the authority of having chaired the board.

When I raised that important point with the Minister of State, I received a sarcastic comment from him to the effect that anything that that gentleman says is unacceptable to the Government. He went on to say, with a smile on his face, that the comment was made ex cathedra, referring to the fact that that gentleman had left his post. However, ex cathedra, in cathedra, in chapel or anywhere else, thousands of people in Wales agree with the past chairman of the board that there must be a declaration of status embodied in the Bill. By failing to make such a declaration after decades of waiting and agonising delay, the Government will fail the people of Wales.

I have frequently said that I welcome the fact that the debates were not characterised by political point scoring. More importantly, the language was not sullied by such a scenario, but it should be asked whether it is acceptable for the Government in Westminster to deny the Welsh people. In any event, they have no mandate to rule Wales. They packed the Standing Committee with parachutists from England, people who went there to read their correspondence, who knew nothing about the Welsh language and cared even less. We had to argue our case against that brick wall. The Welsh language is our most valuable asset and we have to continue arguing against that dumb opposition.

My amendment in favour of Welsh jury trials was lost on the casting vote of the Chair. The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), somewhat uncharacteristically, sided with the Government. The cards were yet again stacked against the Welsh people. I deeply regret that I, who live my life through the medium of the Welsh language, have to plead, here in London, for the very existence of my own language. I am dismayed and angry about it.

In the past few weeks, many eminent people have been writing to No. 10. They include judges, academics, bishops and the Archbishop himself, pleading with the Government to think again. My hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) raised the matter with the Prime Minister who said in his usual bumbling way that the language had an official status but no doubt we will be denied that in statute today.

Even the Government's most ardent supporter and apologist, Miss Beata Brookes, the chairwoman of the Welsh Consumer Council and of the Conservative party for Wales, wrote to all right hon. and hon. Members on 12 July. Her letter has been referred to, but it is important none the less. It states:

"unless the Welsh langugage is given official status, the ability of the Board to give real support to the language will be seriously undermined. The Welsh Consumer Council has consistently argued, in its response to Fforwm Iaith's Strategy and the Welsh Language Bill, that there needs to be"——

5.30 pm

Mr. Win Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman is concentrating on an official status for the Welsh language in Wales. Has he had the opportunity to ask his fellow party member, who now holds a distinguished position of power and influence in this matter, whether he intends to treat Welsh as though it has official status in Wales?

Mr. Llwyd: I am aware that the person concerned—Lord Elis Thomas—is within the confines of the House at this moment. I sincerely hope that he hears the pleas of hon. Members on the Opposition Benches. Had any hon. Members on the Conservative Benches any regard for the language, there would be pleas from them also. I have no doubt that Lord Elis Thomas will take into account what has been said today.

Has the Minister accepted the view of many eminent people in Wales? There is no doubt that English is, de facto, an official language in Wales. It runs through every piece of legislation, going back over centuries. Because of that, the Welsh language has been treated as inferior. We now have an opportunity to put that right. Failure to do so will be to fail the people of Wales.

On past occasions, I have referred to the wealth of good will in Wales towards the language and the large number of people each year who seek to learn it. I applaud and welcome that. I also applaud the fact that many of those who have moved to Wales recognise the need to nurture the language and its culture. They are aware of the great value that attaches to the language.

When the Bill was first presented, there was a consensus. It did not meet with any vociferous opposition because we all accepted that there was good will behind it. For reasons that I have already explained, the language was not treated as a political football because a consensus was reached on the implicit understanding that the Government would table numerous strengthening amendments. Where are they? Last December we were told, "Don't worry—it is not what you want, but it will be strengthened." Now, after a great deal of debate, not one of the 70 or more amendments tabled by the Opposition parties has been accepted by the Government. That is a said indictment of the Government and of their real intention.

The Minister said that he would strengthen the Bill—have we all been duped?

Mr. Wigley: My hon. Friend could also ask whether the members of the Welsh Language Board have been duped. They were on the point of resigning last December, and would have resigned were it not for the Minister's promise that the Bill would be strengthened. Were they duped, too? Has everybody been duped at every stage simply to pass a Bill that does not give the Welsh language the rights to which it is entitled?

Mr. Llwyd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments, which are heartfelt across the party divide.

[Mr. Llwyd]

Because not a single amendment was accepted by the Government, they have driven a coach and horses through the welcome consensus that they enjoyed when the Bill was first presented. Not only has the consensus in the Chamber disappeared, but in Wales the mood is one of anger, betrayal and exasperation. Many societies feel that their reasoned arguments have been dispatched without consideration or comment.

We have presented the Minister with numerous amendments dealing with the official status of the Welsh language. Some of them were designed to meet his objection that granting official status would militate against the language's perceived status in other legislation. Some amendments were designed to meet the opposite view, which he also gave us, that the wording covered too broad an application. Some amendments were drafted by eminent lawyers in Wales. They have knowledge of the everyday working of the language in Wales and of the various pieces of legislation. It was all to no avail.

The issue is important not just in this Chamber and in the United Kingdom, but in Europe. We will soon again be considering the Maastricht Bill; the Government must be wondering what that has in store for them. They have yet to ratify the charter on minority languages. In Committee, we were told that they were still considering it. I do not understand why they have had to take nine months to do so. I sincerely hope that that consideration will come to fruition before too long. If it does not and if the new clause fails, the language will not be official and neither will it have the protection of a minority language in Europe. It will be denied support from both this Chamber and the European Chamber. The Irish language has been recognised as an official language in Europe and it will receive European assistance. Whatever the outcome of our sad proceedings tonight, I hope that the Government will again consider the charter, without further hopeless prevarication.

The retired archdruid of Wales, Dr. William George —a person whose views I hold in great regard—said about the Bill that half a loaf is better than no bread. On this occasion, I must disagree with him. The half loaf is stale and it will not provide sustenance to the Welsh language. If the new clause does not succeed, history will record that a truly golden opportunity has been missed, to the great sadness of hon. Members and the people of Wales.

Some months ago, Cymdeithas yr Iaith Gymraeg and other societies urged me to vote down the Bill at the first opportunity. I said that as a Member representing a Welsh constituency, my job was to try to strengthen the Bill. I reminded them that, last Christmas, the Minister had said that it would be strengthened. It was because I was confident of that that I told them that I would not vote against it.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Sir Wyn Roberts): Does not the hon. Gentleman regard the amendments that we have made to the Bill—21 in all—as strengthening it? Have not we strengthened it by what we have said about written evidence, about charities and by our changes to company legislation? I resent some of the comments made by the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues.

Mr. Llwyd: Those amendments concern the minutiae of the Bill. I agree that the changes to company law, those relating to charities and the changes to one or two other words are welcome. However, the core issue is that for centuries the Welsh language has been treated as inferior, yet nothing in the Bill deals with that problem. I do not deny that there have been some cosmetic changes, one or two of them quite substantial—but by and large the important amendments dealing with the core issue have been ignored by the Government. [Interruption.] It appears that those of us who live and work in Wales do not know as much about Wales as those who live and work across the border. That is what they think and it saddens me.

If the new clause is not successful, it will be a betrayal of the people of Wales and a denial of their legitimate aspirations. The Government will be directly responsible for any divisiveness and disharmony. I urge hon. Members to vote for the new clause.

Mr. Roger Evans: What does new clause 1 as drafted mean? Does the phrase "official status" carry any legal practical weight whatever? If it does, it is dangerous, general and universal, and undermines the good will behind the Bill. If it is simply window dressing, what is the point of putting it in, except as a symbol? I respect the need for a symbol, but perhaps it would have been better to have put a grand statement in the preface, as Henry VIII's advisers would no doubt have done.

Mr. Llwyd: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was listening to me, but I tried to make the explanation fairly explicit. One short example is the fact that Welsh is currently denied any assistance from the European sphere. That is one aspect that the hon. Gentleman may like to ponder.

Mr. Evans: The effect in Europe is not clear. If the phrase had any meaning, the immediate practical effect of the amendment and others like it would be that, instead of a system that has been most carefully devised by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, with piecemeal schemes where they are appropriate and reasonably practical in the circumstances, we should have a general, universal rule that had to be applied equally in all circumstances.

I am prepared to listen to and even to accept the argument that there is something to be said for putting something suitably Welsh and passionate into the preamble to address the point that has been made—although it is now too late to do so. However, I object strongly to the corruption of the statute book by grandiloquent, general, American-sounding statements such as "the pursuit of happiness", which are legally imprecise and which will undoubtedly lead to litigation.

I am not satisfied by the answer given by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) when I asked him what more we should have than we have at present if Welsh were to have a statutory official status. Would an individual citizen in Wales be entitled to have a document addressed to him in Welsh? Would he be entitled to have the committee minutes of my community council given to him in Welsh? What does the phrase mean? If the amendments were accepted, such decisions would have to be taken by the High Court, not by an expert body such as the Welsh Language Board.

My right hon. Friend has devised a scheme whereby the needs of every part of Wales would be covered. The Bill is a monumental historical achievement. It is undoubtedly the best thing that has happened to the Welsh language for half a millennium and it is deeply saddening that an imaginative, effective Bill, well drafted to promote good will in Wales, should be so unfairly belittled.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South-West): I shall not detain the House too long, because I know that many Members wish to speak and there is a lot of business to conduct on the Bill.

As the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) told us, Lord Ferrers said in the other place:

"Welsh already enjoys official status"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 February 1993; Vol. 543, c. 347.]

If that is the case, and if that is the Government's view, is it too naive to expect them to state the fact in the Bill? I do not believe so. That status should be declared in the Bill.

It has been argued that that is not necessary, because the fact that Welsh is an official language is implicitly recognised in other statutes. However, the Bill must be the right place in which duly to recognise the statutory position of the Welsh language. If the legislation had been considered by the Welsh Grand Committee, as it should have been according to the rules of the House, the Welsh language would have been given official status and the Bill would have been stronger. It would have been considered by Members from Wales and there would have been more Members in the Chamber tonight. As we see, the Conservative Members who do not represent seats in Wales and yet were on the Committee have not chosen to come here tonight. Presumably they have decided to deal with their mail somewhere else.

The Bill should promote the greater use of the language, which would promote its development and give it equal validity with English in the life of Wales. We have heard many quotations tonight, but here is another, from the Welsh Language Board:

"Equal validity for the Welsh and English languages in Wales is a prerequisite for a fair society. Any status for the Welsh language that falls short of this is demeaning".

It demeans the Welsh language.

We have already heard some history tonight. Welsh is the oldest language in the United Kingdom. The Gododdin, the oldest Welsh document, dates from the 9th century, I believe, so Welsh is considerably older than the English that is known and used in the House today.

The Government's policies will once again fail the people of Wales unless the principle of official status for Welsh is incorporated in the Bill. That is a fundamental request and if it were granted it would give the Welsh language new life and vigour. The Welsh Language Board put the position succinctly in paragraph 36 of its recommendations for a new Welsh Language Act:

"Unless it be declared by an Act of Parliament that the Welsh language shall have equality of status with the English language it will continue in its existing state of inequality. It is therefore imperative that Parliament uses this opportunity to right some wrongs of the past and to provide the Welsh language with the status it deserves".

If our new clause is not accepted, an historic opportunity to right 450 years of wrong done to the language will have been missed.

Unlike the hon. Member of Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, I shall not oppose Third Reading, if only on the ground that half a loaf is better than no bread. I agree that the half loaf is probably stale, but at least it is something. It is a shame that we shall have only that stale half loaf and not a whole loaf for the people of Wales.

5.45 pm

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): I shall be brief, not only because what I wanted to say has been said already, but because of my deep reverence for the Whips. I heard what the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) said about the Welsh Language Board being duped and his extremely passionate denunciation. I hope that he will have a brief word with Lord Elis Thomas and ask him to consider his position.

The key difference between the two sides of the House is that the Government have clearly failed to understand the importance of symbolism for the language. New clause 1 offers them an olive branch and a way out. We do not know what "official status" and "a basis of equality" mean precisely, but whatever they mean we want Welsh to have the same status as English. I am not sure whether there is a Welsh word for "me too-ism". My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) suggests "fi hefyd-ism". If it is good enough for them, it is good enough for us.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): The Bill has been received in Wales with a deep disappointment, felt most by those who are most committed to the future of the Welsh language—those who have campaigned long and hard to bring about such a Bill, and without whom the Bill would never have been introduced.

The disappointment springs first from the total failure to establish in the Bill rights of any kind—crucially, perhaps, the right to receive education through the medium of the Welsh language. The second disappointment is the failure to make an unequivocal declaration of official and equal status. There is talk about "the principle that in the conduct of public business and the administration of justice in Wales the English and Welsh languages should be treated on a basis of equality".

However, that statement is ambiguous and the ambiguity is compounded by phrases such as,

"so far as is appropriate in the circumstances and reasonably practicable".

The principle is hedged about by all kinds of conditions, so it is both ambiguous and limited in scope. As we shall no doubt hear later, there is no reference to the privatised utilities and other such organisations.

Campaigners for the Welsh language have seen a language Act not simply as a kind of totem, nor even as a symbol, but as a necessary basis for a practical process and for the restoration of the Welsh language to its proper position in the life of Wales. That is what the campaign for a Welsh Language Act has been all about. To use current jargon, the campaign has been designed to set in motion a process that some people call the reversal of language shift. That means bringing about an ever-wider knowledge and use of the Welsh language in Wales. The Welsh language has been undergoing the contrary process to that for the past century.

Reversing language shift is no mean task. It is a serious business and is difficult to achieve, although not impossible. It is a major task that requires a great deal of understanding and much commitment of resources. Whether or not that task is undertaken, how seriously it is attempted and its prospects of success depend on the good will of one person—the Secretary of State for Wales, whoever he or she may be at the time. That is deeply unsatisfactory. In the absence of the establishment of rights and of an unequivocal declaration of official status, my colleagues and I find it impossible to support the Bill.

Despite what I have said so far, I am prepared to concede that those who drafted the Bill, and in particular the Minister of State, seem to have been well intentioned. Theoretically, through the mechanism of the schemes, much could be achieved on certain conditions. What are the conditions which must be fulfilled? [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] I am entitled to say what I want to say and I am trying to do that. I believe that I am saying something that has not been said before.

What are the conditions which must be fulfilled to ensure that the schemes' mechanism delivers something? The membership of the board must be determined on the basis of a commitment to, and an understanding of, the needs of the Welsh language. It must be based on that and not merely on acceptability to the Government of the day. The board's professional staff should have commitment, application, knowledge and ability. The board must be adequately resourced to fulfil its extraordinarily broad remit. It must be adequately staffed to carry out the complex procedures of dealing with the schemes with expedition to provide momentum to the process of increasing knowledge and use of the language. Momentum is all-important at this stage. At the end of the day, the legislation and the board should have the backing of the Secretary of State.

If those conditions are met, the Bill might provide the means to strengthen the position of the Welsh language. In addition, the Bill might create a new political context within which voluntary campaigning and action on behalf of the Welsh language could flourish.

If those conditions are not fulfilled—and that is what we fear—there will be disenchantment and frustration. We have no doubt about which of those two scenarios we want to be fulfilled. That is why we are so disappointed at the failure to establish rights and incorporate a statement on the principle of status. We want the positive scenario to reign in relation to the Welsh language in Wales.

The irony is that the nature of the Bill that has emerged, and the success that may attend it, depend on the political will of the Government of the day in London. If I may say so, that places a heavy responsibility on that Government.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have been accused of excessive legal caution. I have been urged by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) to take a risk. I have been told by the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) that I am not concerned about symbolism. I must remind the House that we are legislating. It is all very well to include something in a Bill which gives us a great glow of satisfaction, but it may not actually mean anything.

Let me be quite clear. The Government start from the simple premise that the Welsh language already enjoys "official status" and can therefore be said to be an official language in Wales. That is, of course, what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on Tuesday.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Minister give way?

Sir Wyn Roberts: While the Bill serves to confirm the status which the language enjoys, it is not the intention of the Bill to confer that status on the language—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. Hon. Members on both sides of the House should contain themselves and listen to the Minister. This is an important subject and hon. Members want to listen to the Minister.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I was saying that this immediately gives rise to one of my concerns with some of the general declarations of status that have been proposed in the new clauses. If the purpose of the Bill is seen to be to confer "official status" upon the Welsh language, it follows that the language does not currently enjoy that status. The Government's view is that it does.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Minister give way now?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment.

I believe that that ignores the current reality and would lessen the status of the language in matters not covered by schemes. That is the acid test and one of the criteria that we have applied to the new clauses.

The other criterion which, as I explained in Committee, we have applied to the proposals on this matter was that amendments on status should not have the effect of including in the Bill a general declaration of uncertain effect which could be interpreted only by the courts. The amendments should not include a provision which could be interpreted as corresponding to statutory bilingualism and they should not constrain the status of the language so as to be entirely dependent upon measures provided for in the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) was quite right to ask about the meaning of the phrase "official status". He is well aware of the point that I am making. The inclusion of that phrase would have an uncertain effect and lead to confusion. We do not require the inclusion of the phrase "official status" in the Bill to empower the board to perform its function which is already covered by other clauses.

Mr. Wigley: The Minister said that there is doubt about the meaning of the term "official status". Only a few moments ago, he said that Welsh has official status. He cannot have it both ways. There may be doubts about the meaning of the "basis of equality", but he includes that in the Bill although it is open to interpretation.

A case in the European courts involving a Dutch citizen and the Irish Government related to whether the Irish language was recognised as an official language within Ireland. Unless the Welsh language is recognised in law as having official status within Wales, we are open to similar cases being taken in the European courts. This matter must be cleared up now in the context of the Bill. If it is not cleared up tonight, it should be cleared up in the other place when the Bill finally returns there.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The official status of the language in Europe can arise only from the unanimous agreement of the European Council. It does not depend on there being a legal declaration of status in domestic law in this country. I could tell the hon. Gentleman much about the situation in Europe because I have examined it most carefully. Passage of the Bill and its recognition of the Welsh language and its official status could be extremely helpful to the Welsh language in Europe.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): The right hon. Gentleman tells us that the Welsh language now has official status in Wales, whatever that might strictly mean. Is not his fear that, if it is written into the statute, it will become an official language of the United Kingdom? Is not that the difference?

6 pm

Sir Wyn Roberts: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman heard what I said and what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on Tuesday—namely, that Welsh is an official language in this country. That does not have to be stated in law. It is not stated in law in respect of English. English is also an official language.

Mr. Alex Carlile: The right hon. Gentleman said something interesting in answer to the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). Does the Minister say that Welsh is an official language in the United Kingdom, or does he say that it is an official language merely in Wales? There seems to be great confusion about that and, of itself, that confusion is surely evidence for defining status clearly in the Bill.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I do not agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said that Welsh is an official language. The hon. and learned Gentleman should read what my right hon. Friend and I have said.

Mr. Llwyd: If, as the Minister says, Welsh is an official language, surely his answer to me about the minority charter should have been that we cannot ratify it because it is an official language.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The hon. Gentleman is somewhat confused about the status of the European charter. We are still considering whether we should subscribe to it and take further steps. The hon. Gentleman is aware that we meet all the requirements of that charter in respect of Welsh.

I have considered the new clauses very carefully. They do not meet our requirements and they do not meet the criteria that I have set out. The inclusion of any of the new clauses would be contrary to the preamble of the Bill and they would certainly not provide a proper basis for the Welsh Language Board to pursue its function of promoting and facilitating use of the Welsh language.

Mr. Morgan: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister should be aware that what he said about not wishing to express noble declaratory sentiments is in absolute contrast with what the Secretary of State said yesterday about local government. The Secretary of State said that we must legislate in a way that resonates with the people and agrees with the people's sentiments in respect of local government reform. The same applies on Thursdays as applies on Wednesdays. One cannot enunciate a principle one day and deny it the following day.

In the main, the Minister addressed objections to the declaratory statements which characterise new clause 2. He barely addressed new clause 1, which would align the status of the Welsh language by way of official status in Wales with the de facto and de jure status of the English language. The right hon. Gentleman shuffled papers and accepted interventions in a way that I have never seen him do before. He criticised the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) for being in a state of confusion. Perhaps the confusion is among Conservative Members. Perhaps the Minister has lost a battle that might have gone to Cabinet.

A Bill which merely transfers from the Welsh Office to the new Welsh Language Board the right to hand out lollipops to the National Eisteddfod and the Welsh Books Council will not satisfy the demands of the people of Wales. The Government must recognise that. Therefore, I ask right hon. and hon. Members to support us in the Lobby.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 3

PARLIAMENTARY COMMISSIONER FOR ADMINISTRATION (WELSH LANGUAGE)

'.—(1) For the purpose of conducting investigations in accordance with subsection (3) below, the Board, after having consulted the Secretary of State, shall appoint a Commissioner, to be known as the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration (Welsh Language).

(2) The Commissioner shall be appointed within twelve months from the date on which the Board is established.

(3) The Commissioner may investigate any action taken by or on behalf of a public body in respect of the preparation or carrying out of a scheme, in any case where—

(a) a written complaint is duly made to a member of the House of Commons by a member of the public who claims to have sustained injustice in consequence of maladministration in connection with the action so taken; and

(b) the complaint is referred to the Commissioner, with the consent of the person who made it, by a member of that House with a request to conduct an investigation thereon.

(4) The Commissioner may exercise the powers to conduct investigations, call for evidence and issue reports referred to in sections 7 to 10 of the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967.

(5) The Commissioner may appoint such staff as he may determine, with the approval of the Secretary of State and the Treasury as to numbers and conditions of service.

(6) The Commissioner and his staff shall receive such remuneration, travelling and other allowances, and pension entitlements as the Secretary of State, with the approval of the Treasury, may determine.'.—[Mr. Alan W. Williams].

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause provides for the appointment of a Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration for Welsh language matters—that is, an ombudsman specifically for Welsh language matters.

In Committee, we discussed at some length the complaints procedure in clauses 17 to 20. When there is a complaint against the operations of the Welsh Language Board, the board is required to set up an investigation. It was pointed out by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd

Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) that the procedure may be inadequate. An amendment tabled by Plaid Cymru called for a judicial review procedure if the Welsh Language Board is not receptive to a complainant.

Under the new clause, the Welsh Language Board could take over such complaints. It would require the board, once established, to initiate discussions with the Welsh Office for the establishment of an ombudsman on language matters within 12 months of the language board being set up. That ombudsman would be a neutral referee, as we are used to in local government affairs.

When the ombudsman service was introduced, it was a novelty to British administration, but, over the years, it has earned the tremendous respect of the general public and local authorities. It is unbiased, thorough and fearless. Generally, when recommendations are made, the ombudsman recommends fair solutions to, and reasonable settlements for, all problems.

In the correspondence that we received before the Bill was introduced, the Welsh Language Forum pointed out the need for a neutral arbiter. The forum proposed a Bwrdd Cymodi Ieithyddol. That is a language reconciliation board. The Welsh Consumer Council in its submission to us elaborated in detail on the need for an independent complaints procedure. In January 1993, all Welsh Members received a briefing on the Bill from the council. In paragraph 9 it says of the language board:

"We argued that an organisation set up 'to promote and protect' the Welsh language could not also provide a complaints and conciliation service."

The council then recommends an ombudsman to handle complaints. It further states:

"The positive handling of complaints and prejudice is an extremely difficult matter. Proper complaints procedures are central to consumer rights."

The one cannot exist without the other. My hon. Friends and I believe that there is a need for a neutral arbiter.

Complainants can come from both sides of the fence. An individual may not be able to get a particular service in Welsh and may find that the Welsh Language Board is deaf to complaints. The complaint could be about a scheme devised by a public body not being sufficiently rigorous in a particular district, or the complaint could relate to employment.

There is the danger of employment discrimination if a public body is over-zealous in insisting on Welsh speaking being a requirement for too many jobs. The Bill establishes the Welsh Language Board to promote the language—very properly. A complainant on one side of the fence would not expect justice from such a board.

At present, the Race Relations Act 1976 is the only vehicle for complaints. Later, under a new clause, we shall discuss the inappropriateness of that Act. Its use it not liked by the people of Wales.

The Labour party document before the last election, entitled "The Better Way for the Welsh Language", states:

"Labour believes that the Race Relations Act is not an ideal mechanism for dealing with abuses in this field."

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I have been trying to understand the new clause. My hon. Friend raises the issue of people seeking employment complaining of discrimination because they do not speak Welsh. Many jobs in public bodies in Wales require Welsh. That prevents a large number of people—90 per cent. of my constituents—from applying. How would they act under this procedure?

I am not saying that I am against positive discrimination. It must exist to solve the problems of history, but how would my constituents act and what would the ombudsman do? Would he say that there had been an offence against the law or would he provide a conciliation and arbitration service? I find it difficult to see the mechanics under which this will operate.

Mr. Williams The issue is complicated and, obviously, there are strong emotions on both sides. The Bill makes frequent use of the words "reasonably practicable" and "appropriate in the circumstances". What are the accurate definitions of those terms? There must be a pragmatic definition. The situation in the Rhondda will be different from that in Cardiff, Dyfed or Gwynedd. We need some sort of referee to ensure that the interpretation of those terms is fair to English speakers and Welsh speakers in particular communities. I acknowledge that there are dangers. I tabled the new clause in an attempt to deal with the complex problem of employment discrimination.

I would expect there to be more individual complaints about an inadequate service in Welsh than from the other side of the fence. As I said earlier, the Labour party recognised the problem before the last election and suggested in its policy document the establishment of an ombudsman.

All Opposition Members want a much stronger language Bill than the Government have presented. We believe strongly in the principle of equality for the Welsh language and a status for it no less than that of English in Wales. At the same time, we want the legislation to be fairly administered to both Welsh and English speakers. The Bill simply embeds a complaints procedure in the Welsh Language Board. It does not provide a neutral arbiter. We need an ombudsman to whom to refer complaints.

Sir Wyn Roberts: It may be helpful if I explain how the Government see the relationship between the Welsh Language Board and the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, the local government ombudsman and the health service commissioner.

Schedule 1 makes it clear that the board will be an organisation whose activities may be the subject of an investigation by the Parliamentary Commissioner. The commissioner will be able to investigate complaints of maladministration made against the board. The existence of the board may influence the way in which the commissioner investigates complaints of maladministration made against other public bodies that come within his jurisdiction, which concern the use of the Welsh language.

To the extent that such cases involve the operation of Welsh language schemes under the Bill, we envisage that the commissioner and the board would have to reach agreement on the extent to which they would expect the machinery that we are providing for the board to investigate complaints to have been used before the commissioner decides to investigate. That would be a matter for the commissioner to decide in the light of individual cases.

We would expect similar considerations to apply to the bodies that come within the purview of the local government ombudsman and the national health service commissioner. The Bill provides a means of redress for individuals who believe that they have been disadvantaged by the operation of a scheme.

Mr. Rogers: The Minister mentioned two public areas: health and local government. He has said that the ombudsman has a right to look into problems of discrimination. Often when we refer a case to the ombudsman he says that it is outside his purview. Would the local government ombudsman, the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration or whoever be able to take up employment issues in relation to the national museum of Wales, the Wales tourist board or any other organisation that may say that Welsh is compulsory as a condition of employment? Would not the ombudsman come back on that?

In this case, would it not be better to accept the new clause for a separate ombudsman who could then deal with this specific problem? One of the big issues is that if the case goes back to the board, which becomes an arbiter, it must be partial in promoting the language. That would be wrong.

Sir Wyn Roberts: May we leave the problem of employment until we discuss a later clause?

In the first instance, ombudsmen are concerned about maladministration, rather than the specific subjects to which we have referred. I think that the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) understands what I have said about the relationship between the complaints procedure under the board and the procedure that could arise because the board will be subject to the Parliamentary Commissioner. The schemes may also involve either the local government ombudsman or the national health service commissioner.

We envisage that the ombudsman would expect the board's complaints procedure to have been exercised before agreeing to mount an investigation. Those matters will also be determined by agreement between the ombudsman and the board.

The board will, therefore, have a distinct role, which is analogous to that of the existing ombudsmen but complementary to both. Nothing in the legislation will limit the locus of the existing ombudsmen. In particular, nothing in the Bill expressly prevents the ombudsmen from investigating complaints of maladministration involving the Welsh language.

6.30 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I believe that one of the reasons why the new clause was tabled is vividly illustrated by an example that has been given by my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams). He mentioned a school in Carmarthenshire in which science was taught entirely in English, but the authority imposed a Welsh language qualification on the job of laboratory technician. What redress would a person seeking that post, and finding himself discriminated against on grounds of language, have under the system that the Minister describes?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I should have thought that the system did not apply to such an example. Ombudsmen are concerned about maladministration. If there has been maladministration, there is a role for the ombudsman, but he has to be shown that it has occurred or that there is a prima facie case. Given what I have said about how we would expect the system of investigating complaints to operate, we would not gain anything by the introduction of yet another commissioner, as provided for in new clause 3. I regret, therefore, that I cannot support the introduction of the new clause.

Mr. Rogers: I did not intend to speak on new clause 3 because my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) put the arguments well. However, I have listened to what the Minister said about the narrow range of complaints with which a commissioner can deal—as is the case with the present ombudsmen. I think that it ought to be incumbent on the Minister to come up with some form of alternative—if not now, certainly later.

The crux of the argument about the development of the Welsh language is that one can spend all the money and resources in the world, but, without the good will of the English-speaking population in Wales, the language will not be developed as many of us want. When those of us who come from areas where the majority of people speak English developed our policies on Welsh language education in schools, we had to convince many English-speaking communities of the value of spending resources on the Welsh language. Gradually, that view has become more accepted.

The Welsh language will develop only if hostility is not produced. We do not want people to say, "Our schools are falling down; classroom resources are not available for English-speaking children, but Welsh-speaking children, or people being taught in the medium of Welsh, can have those resources." It would be awful if there were a conflict in the community.

The same principle applies to jobs. When English-speaking people find that they cannot get jobs because they cannot speak Welsh—let us not forget that we are talking about at least 80 to 90 per cent. of the population—hostility towards the language will build up, which none of us wants. It will also create an exclusive class of people who get preference as a result of speaking Welsh—as it already has in certain parts of Wales, especially in public organisations—which creates a great deal of hostility.

What will the Welsh Language Board do in that situation? If complaints are made to the board and it has to be partial and make judgments, the basis of good will for the board will disappear. One side or the other will gain or lose. There will be a few contentious cases and the press will whip it up as a good story. Before one knows it, the issue of the Welsh language will again become a football to be kicked around.

Frankly, the Government have rejected the new clause without thinking through the issue. The Minister should have said, "Yes, the arguments are valid; the answers may not be ideal, but we shall consider the subject and come back with something." That is the proper way to deal with the problem. I hope that the Minister will accept my criticism constructively, and realise the potential for damage to the language that will exist unless there is a reasonable forum for complaining and sorting out issues without their becoming a source of conflict.

Mr. Rowlands: One of the unresolved questions in Committee was the extent to which the new language board would be a major instrument of positive discrimination in favour of the Welsh language. We asked that question over and over again and will come to it again later. There are huge legislative blanks in the Bill, which unfortunately do not allow us to deal with the issues that my hon. Friend is describing to the House.

Mr. Rogers: My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has put his finger on it. That question has been considered by hon. Members who had the privilege to sit on the Standing Committee. Some of us were not able to do so, but the Minister must take note of what we say.

The Secretary of State can dream up policies on his feet, responding to the winds in whichever direction they blow. The Minister might find that difficult, but I appeal to him to suggest an alternative way of approaching the problem when the Bill comes back from the Lords.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: I thank the Minister for his comments. When Hansard is published I shall study them carefully, but I do not think that it is enough for there to be discussions between the commissioner and the language board about the potential problems. That is a behind-the-scenes dialogue and, in the last analysis, power to investigate complaints will rest with the language board.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) highlighted the fact that there is a void in the law for people making complaints. They can have recourse only to the Race Relations Act 1976, which is an unfortunate piece of legislation to use in that context. So, in the spirit of the comments made by my hon. Friend, I hope that the Government will consider the matter more carefully, perhaps come up with a more carefully worked-out solution in the Lords, and will find a way to accept the new clause.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Bill is all about establishing good will and trying to remove many of the difficulties that we have experienced in the past. The board set up under the Bill will deal with many sensitive areas where it must exercise a great deal of caution. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) mentioned some of those sensitive areas.

However, clauses 17 and 18 provide for a procedure for conducting investigations, and investigations could also arise in the context of the Parliamentary Commissioner, the local government ombudsman and the national health ombudsman. Moreover, in the event of disagreement, people will have a right to approach my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. We have, therefore, covered most complaints.

I remind the House that the Bill's entire purpose is to sustain good will, eliminate obstacles and induce as much harmony as possible into the language issue.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 5

RIGHT TO HAVE LEGAL PROCEEDINGS WHOLLY THROUGH THE MEDIUM OF WELSH

'.—(1) In any legal proceedings in the courts in Wales, or in any tribunal, commission or other judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings, the officer in charge shall ascertain at the outset of proceedings whether the defendant or litigant, or whoever the principal party may be, wishes the hearing to be in Welsh or English, and shall proceed accordingly; and after having chosen the language of the hearing, that person shall not be required to furnish translation of any statement or comment which he or she makes.

(2) Where, in accordance with subsection (1) above, a case is to be heard in Welsh, it shall be the duty of the officer of the court to notify the Lord Chancellor's Department, who shall ensure that the hearing is conducted by a Welsh speaking judge and by Welsh speaking court officers and attendants.

(3) In all prosecutions brought by the Crown in Wales, the prosecuting officer shall conduct the prosecution in the language in which the defendant has chosen to have his hearing.

(4) In cases involving two or more principal parties, who disagree as to the language of the hearing, the judge, chairman, magistrate or inspector shall exercise discretion as to balance of languages at the hearing.

(5) Section 3(2) of the Welsh Courts Act 1942 is hereby repealed.

(6) In Wales, the judge or magistrate presiding at any trial, or hearing, the chairman of any tribunal or commission established by Act of Parliament and an inspector presiding at a public inquiry held by virtue of statutory authority may require the whole or any part of the proceedings conducted in Welsh to be translated into English or from English into Welsh if, in his opinion, the translation thereof is necessary in the interests of justice.

(7) In the Welsh Courts Act 1942 there shall be inserted in section 3 after subsection (1), the following new subsections:

"(1A) Such rules as specified in 3(1) above shall include a provision that only translators registered as having reached a sufficient standard of professional competence shall be employed in the proceedings of courts, tribunals, commissions established by Act of Parliament and public inquiry held by virtue of statutory authority in Wales, and translations by any other persons not so registered, shall not be admissable.

(1B) The Lord Chancellor shall keep a register of authorised translators for the purposes of subsection 3(1A) above".

(8) In order to make adequate provision for the purposes of the foregoing subsections of this Act, the Lord Chancellor shall, in making recommendations for the appointment of persons to judicial office, make reasonable provision to ensure that there is a sufficient number of persons holding judicial office who can use Welsh in the conduct of their office.

(9) In appointing justices of the peace for the counties of Wales, the Lord Chancellor shall make reasonable provision for each county of justices able to use Welsh in the conduct of their office.

(10) In appointing to the office in Wales clerks to magistrates, court clerks, Crown prosecutors, probation officers, police officers and inspectors charged with holding public inquiries and members of the clerical and administrative staff and ancillary staff attached to such officers, the appointing authority shall make reasonable provision for officers and staff able and willing to use Welsh in the conduct of their duties at all stages before to as well as at the hearing of any matter.'.—[Mr. Llwyd.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Llwyd: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss also new clause 6—Amendment of the Juries Act 1974—

'In section 10 of the Juries Act 1974, there shall be added after the words "on account of physical disability or insufficient knowledge of English" the words "or, in the case of a trial in Wales, where the language appearing likely to be used by the defendant or a principal witness is Welsh, insufficient knowledge of Welsh".'.

Mr. Llwyd: I shall try to be brief, because I have already argued the point at length. It concerns the right of a person in Wales to have a trial conducted exclusively through the medium of the Welsh language.

[Mr. Llwyd]

Every time the matter has been raised, it has been argued that the fact that jurors are selected from a pool of Welsh speakers somehow detracts from the principle of random selection. That principle was dreamed up this century. It is not centuries old and cast in stone. Women were not included on jury panels until 1919 and, until 1972, there was a property qualification, which was subsequently broadened. Since 1974, persons over the age of 65, and latterly over the age of 70, have become ineligible to sit on juries.

The main argument against the new clause in the other place and in Committee—somewhat slavishly—was that the principle of random selection has been called into question. I have practised as a solicitor for 15 years, and I understand that a jury should be drawn from one's peers. Including a Welsh language qualification will have no effect on that.

Furthermore, it would be easy to do, because nowadays most juries are drawn from a computer sheet, and one simply needs to take the census figures. When people register to vote, they should be specifically asked whether they speak and understand the Welsh language. That information should then be taken on board when those facts and figures are produced in connection with trials by jury.

I realise that others may have different opinions on this matter, but I adhere to the view that the principle of random selection, such as it is, would not be imperilled by this procedure, to which I have referred on the hoof. I am sure that other more apt arguments could be thought up.

Random selection was discussed last week in connection with the Law Commission's report. I know what the Minister will say, because I have heard it before and have read his speech in the Lords Hansard. Indeed, I argued the point in Committee on that basis.

Dr. Kim Howells (Pontypridd): Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the novel idea of people ticking a box to confirm whether they speak Welsh, may I point out that, before the last census was taken, advocates of the Welsh language advised people that, if they understood any Welsh at all, they should say that they spoke Welsh. That would not be helpful for someone accused of fraud, for instance, and opting for an all-Welsh trial. A case would be extremely difficult for jurors to understand if they had ticked the box simply because they could say, "Shw ma'i."

6.45 pm

Mr. Llwyd: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will know that Wales has always been referred to as "Gwlad y menyg gwynion" and I am sure that few large fraud trials emanate from Wales—[Interruption.] Some hon. Members seem to make a decent living out of them.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's important point, but it is already catered for. Part of a judge's function is to ensure that jurors can understand what will be transacted before the court. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) will confirm that. If there is any doubt about it, the judge must decide whether a person is fit and able to sit as a juror, so the point could be taken on board at that stage. In any event, a selection process applies in all courts where juries sit.

It is understood that translation is always second best and that principle goes back many years.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon) indicated assent.

Mr. Llwyd: The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), who is an experienced advocate, is nodding.

In 1575 a renowned judge, Sir William Gerrard, who sat on the Wales and Chester circuit, said that judges in Wales should be able to understand the Welsh language. He believed, as many of us do, that translation is strictly second best. I want the Bill to provide that juries, too, should be able to understand it.

On Second Reading, I referred to a Privy Council case that established the principle that English jurors sitting in an English language trial must be able to understand English. That is painfully obvious, but it is appropriate in this instance, and it assists my case.

If I thought that, in asking for provision for Welsh language trials, I was imperiling the interests of justice, I would not be moving the new clause. Clearly, that is a prerequisite. However, although translation is second best, it is wrong that a person who seeks to have his trial dealt with through the medium of the Welsh language should have it dealt with through translation. There are two reasons for that: first, anyone who has conducted a trial will know of the nuances involved in every sentence. Sometimes a word can mean everything in a case.

Mr. Morris indicated assent.

Mr. Llwyd: Again, the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon is agreeing with me.

Although there are some excellent translators in Wales, ultimately translations are strictly second best, and we should not be prepared to sanction a system that delivers second-best justice in Wales.

Secondly, with any form of translation, whether simultaneous or not, there is an inevitable time lag of a second or two, often longer, when it is possible that the defendant will have more opportunity to think of a more plausible answer. Perhaps the Minister will consider that matter. Many practitioners throughout Wales, who have, like myself, conducted many trials through the medium of the Welsh language, think that it is never as satisfactory to conduct a trial through a translation. I say that with the greatest respect, and I hope with a sincerity that the Minister will accept. I am pleading for equality with the English language to ensure equality of justice in Welsh courts.

About 98 per cent. of trials in Wales finish their course in the magistrates courts and do not proceed to the Crown court. That argument again does not find favour with me, because there will always be a case where, conceivably, a person will not get the right quality of justice purely because of the language barrier. It is only right that Welsh should be an option, and I see no real difficulty in that approach.

I shall return to the point with which I started about random selection—which, as we know, was thrown at every hon. Member who previously argued about it. The royal commission's report, published in the past week, said:

"We are reluctant to interfere with the principle of random selection of juries. We are, however, anxious that everything possible should be done to ensure that people from the ethnic minority communities are represented on juries in relation to their numbers in the local community. The pool from which juries are randomly selected would be more representative if all eligible members of ethnic communities were included on the electoral roll. Even if this were to be, however, there would statistically still be instances where there would not be a multi-racial jury in a case where one seemed appropriate"

The report says that the Commission for Racial Equality had also put that point:

"The CRE considered whether the judge should have power to order that the three jurors from the ethnic minority communities should come from the same ethnic minority as the defendant or victim. They concluded, however, that this would be impractical. While this may be so, we believe that it should be open to the defence or prosecution to argue the point and to the judge to be able to order in appropriate cases that one or more of the three jurors should come from the same ethnic minority as the defendant or the victim. We so recommend."

The principle of random selection has been used, not as a smokescreen, but rather as an absolute argument each time the matter has been raised. How long will it be cherished by the Government and remain as it is when the royal commission's views represent a substantial inroad into that principle?

The suggestion of the royal commission is even less practicable than the suggestion that I made in Committee. Nothing is more simple than ensuring that there is an electoral list, with an indication by one's name of whether one can converse in Welsh and understand the Welsh language. It then proceeds by way of computer.

In all honesty, I cannot see how the principle would suddenly be devalued. To those who may argue—although it seems that few will, probably because of lack of interest in the subject—with me about the Monmouth case, for example, on which the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) spoke so eloquently, where 2 per cent. of people speak Welsh, I say that, realistically, there could easily be a trial centre in south Wales, a Welsh trial centre in the north and one somewhere in mid-Wales. As a matter of practice, I have frequently been involved in Crown court cases that have been transferred from the town of Caernarfon to Knutsford.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point, although I do not agree with his basic premise that the transfer of Welsh cases out of Wales to Chester, and Knutsford especially, is wholly unacceptable. Does the hon. Gentleman support the efforts made—not always successfully—to prevent that?

Mr. Llwyd: As a one-time secretary of the Gwynedd law society, I wrote several letters to the circuit administrator, and I know that some heed has been taken of that problem. I agree that it is a problem, but the general point that I was making was that trial centres could take place in one, two or three centres in Wales, which would create far less potential inconvenience than if the cases were transferred to Caernarfon or Knutsford at the last minute.

It has also been argued that, if the new clause were accepted, potential jurors, be they English people or Welsh people who cannot speak Welsh, would be excluded. At the worst, one would have to hurt the feelings of jurors who could not sit on a jury because they did not speak Welsh. From experience, I would say that most potential jurors would be relieved not to have to sit on a jury, especially in a lengthy fraud trial. I say that out of a sense of jest rather than anything else.

If it is a choice between hurting the feelings of a potential juror and achieving quality of justice, of course the scales weigh heavily in favour of the quality of justice. The Minister must be aware that, as Welsh language trials are conducted with ease in magistrates courts throughout Dyfed, Clwyd and Gwynedd, that facility should also be available in Crown courts. To continue with a second-class delivery of justice is unacceptable. I plead with the Minister at this eleventh hour to accept my reasonable new clause.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I know that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) moved the new clause in complete sincerity and with a determination founded on principle, for which I respect him greatly. He will probably agree that we are discussing a tricky balance of interests. It is matter of judgment how the House decides, but I come down on the other side from the hon. Gentleman.

As I said earlier—although I deprived myself of one year—I declare the interest of having practised on the Wales and Chester circuit for 22 years. I have conducted a great many Crown court trials and, I am delighted to say, some of them have been well instructed by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, who has an excellent reputation as a good solicitor in his county. I hope by saying that that I shall ensure that he instructs me again. I do not think that the rules against touting apply in the House—at least I hope not.

I also defer to the remarks made on the subject by two extremely distinguished and senior legal colleagues of mine, who are both members of the Wales and Chester circuit: my noble Friend Lord Hooson and the noble Lord Thomas of Gwydir. Lord Thomas has now retired, but Lord Hooson is still practising. They both practised on that circuit for more than 45 years. They both came to the same conclusion as I did, but unlike myself, they are capable of conducting a trial through the medium of Welsh at any level and in any court. They share with me the experience of being involved in trials where witnesses have given their evidence through the medium of Welsh and where simultaneous translation has been used.

I agree that occasionally nuances in a person's voice, a word used or even an inflection may make some difference. However, I have never been in a case in which I have found that the nuance has been lost through the simultaneous translation. Indeed, my experience of simultaneous translation, not only in criminal courts, but in other tribunals, such as planning appeals, is that the quality of simultaneous translation in Wales is now as good as that at the United Nations, where I have seen it in operation, and perhaps better. It is capable of ensuring that the court has a full appreciation.

7 pm

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy said that the time that translation gave a person to think might make what he said more plausible. The courts are not really concerned with plausibility. Plausibility is often what convicts a liar. The lie may be plausible, but it is all too easily detected as a lie by its very plausibility. The process by which juries reach a decision is sophisticated. Unfortunately, it is not well understood, although, as a result of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice, we may be able to do some proper research into the way in which juries operate.

I do not believe that juries are deprived of the opportunity to reach the truth by the fact that they may not speak Welsh as fluently as the defendant does, if they speak it at all. Indeed, the recent experience of those who might have wished to be tried by all-Welsh speaking juries, in north Wales at least, has shown that they are capable of obtaining substantial justice without the need for the new clause.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): I remember reading a recent translation in the organisation to which the hon. and learned Gentleman just referred. Someone said in French, "This issue depends on the good sense of the people of Normandy." It was translated in English as, "This depends on Norman wisdom." How can the hon. and learned Gentleman say that all the full nuances of a language are translated unless in his cases he has understood both languages with great fluency? Is he making that judgment on the basis of his fluency in Welsh and in English?

Mr. Carlile: I am glad to have been able to take the part of feed to the hon. Gentleman's joke, which I suspect is more Morecambe than Wise. I have already said that, in my view, the simultaneous translation system available in Wales may be better than that available at the United Nations. I can speak only of my own experience, combined with the 90 or so years of combined experience of the noble Lords to whom I have referred. I recognise that there is a balance of interests, and it appears that my judgment does not accord with that of the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn).

There is a fundamental misstatement of the nature of a trial in the new clause. New clause 5(1) refers to the principal party at a trial as if there was only one. There are two principal parties in any criminal trial in the Crown court. There is the defendant who is, of course, always regarded as the most important principal party, but the trial would not occur at all were it not for the other principal party, which is the Crown. In balancing the interests of the Crown, which also have to be protected as we have seen in a very controversial verdict in London in recent days, and the interests of the defendant, we come to the conclusion that the present system of jury trial in Wales is adequate.

Many examples can be given of why it would not be just to enable people to choose to be tried only by Welsh-speaking juries. Harking back to an historical jury panel does not help the argument. I do not want to go back to jury panels that excluded women. I do not want to go back to jury panels that included only people of property. I do not want to go back to a jury class that was restricted by artificial distinctions.

One of the greatest advances that we have made in attempting to secure fairness in jury trials during this century, and especially during the second half of the century, is to increase the number of people from whom jurors are selected. I believe that random selection is a principle worth holding to.

More than just principle is at stake. Let us consider a few examples of what might occur. Let us suppose that there was a burglary in the town of Montgomery in my constituency. There was a burglary at Bunners Agricultural Ironmongers in Montgomery some time ago. It caused something of a stir because, in the middle of the night, the Dyfed-Powys police helicopter went out and caught the burglars en route back to the midlands.

Let us suppose that there was another burglary in Montgomery, which was committed by somebody who said that he wanted an all-Welsh jury. That would exclude almost the entire population of Montgomery and of Welshpool from serving on that jury, because there are not many people in Montgomery and in Welshpool who happen to speak Welsh.

It is a fair principle that the people of the area in which the crime has been committed have the right to serve on the jury. It is fair to say that they would be deeply offended —rightly so—if they found that they were excluded from being able to serve on a jury dealing with crimes committed in their area. I am pleased to see the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) in his place. The Monmouth example is too obvious to state.

Let us take another example. In past decades, a celebrated and much-loved Queen's counsel on the Wales and Chester circuit was known for his success in fraud trials. I do not know whether this is a fair comment, because I never saw him conducting a fraud trial, but I am told that one of the reasons for his success was that he had a great capacity for so totally confusing the jury that it was driven eventually to return a verdict of not guilty because it had so failed to understand the case that it could not be sure that the defendant was guilty.

Let us suppose that a guilty fraudster was prosecuted and that he had committed a fraud entirely through the medium of English, using an English accounting system while working for an English company in Wales. Being a wily fraudster, he decides that one way to cause confusion is to insist on having a trial in Welsh.

That is not an absurd example. In 22 years of working in the criminal courts, I tell you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that there is no shortage of people around who would take advantage of such an opportunity. I of course acquit the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy and the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones), who is another good solicitor, of that charge. However, there may be solicitors around who would say to their clients, "Well, why don't you ask for a trial in Welsh so that we can confuse the issue further?"

That is a realistic and practical problem. The establishment of Welsh language trial centres in different parts of Wales would not resolve the problems to which I have referred.

Mr. Llwyd: I know of the hon. and learned Gentleman's advocacy in the Crown courts and of his experience, and I appreciate his point. However, I do not see why, in Welshpool, for example, it would be impracticable to empanel a Welsh-speaking jury. The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the Monmouth example. Next door to Monmouth there are tens of thousands of Welsh-speaking people in Cardiff. If the trial centre was in Cardiff, people in Monmouth would have to go only seven or eight miles along the road. There is the answer.

Mr. Carlile: I would ask the hon. Gentleman why people from Monmouth should be excluded from serving on a jury when the alleged offences were committed in Monmouth. That, in my view, defies logic.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: I wish to say two things about the hon. and learned Member's analysis. First, most Welsh language trials would be in Dyfed, Gwynedd or other Welsh-speaking areas. The hon. and learned Gentleman is talking about exceptional circumstances. Secondly, the hon. and learned Gentleman describes Welsh-speaking fraudsters and others who might choose to use the language as a vehicle to escape justice. I wish to point out that Dyfed and Powys have the lowest incidence of crime in Britain. I am sure that the situation is similar in Gwynedd. Welsh-speaking people are law-abiding.

Mr. Carlile: The hon. Gentleman will know, if he has been following the newspapers recently, that the largest fraud committed in Wales is now between conviction and sentence, and relates to offences that were committed in the counties of Powys, for the most part, and Dyfed. That is the Foulkes Ingram case. I can immediately contradict the hon. Gentleman on that score.

Mr. Alan W. Williams rose——

Mr. Carlile: I will not give way again. There may be other hon. Members who wish to speak, and we will want to hear the Minister's response.

There is one aspect in which I echo the remarks of the hon. Gentleman for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy. It is essential that there should be enough judges and practitioners in Wales capable of understanding and speaking Welsh, to the extent that they are able to conduct with total fluency those parts of a trial that are heard in Welsh.

We have a distinguished body of such practitioners in Wales. I mentioned the two noble Lords as examples. There are many Welsh-speaking judges of great distinction. The Minister of State's brother is one of the best known of them—a greatly admired and just civil judge in north Wales. He is known to other hon. Members also.

I would be the first to say that I hope that the Lord Chancellor's Department will continue to follow the policy of looking for suitable Welsh speakers to fill judicial appointments. I also hope that the Crown Prosecution Service will pursue its policy of employing professional officers and others who can conduct trials and can assist the police with advice, where necessary through the medium of Welsh. It is important to do so. When it comes to the selection of jurors, the principle of random selection should be paramount.

Let us not forget the final point that I wish to make. If there was a case in which it was patently unjust that the trial should be conducted by the jury panel that was selected by random selection through the computerised system that is now used, a procedure remains open to the defendant and his legal advisers. It is possible to make what is called a challenge to the array, which is a challenge to the whole jury panel. It is not often done, and is probably done successfully even more rarely. I certainly have seen it done on one occasion and I believe that I have done it once myself in 22 years. The opportunity remains in common law to challenge—in extreme circumstances—the panel that is brought to court.

If a defendant came before the court on a serious charge and it were possible to show that he did not understand English sufficiently to be tried fairly, and that it was not possible for one reason or another for a simultaneous translation to meet the needs of the case, then the judge might exercise his discretion to allow a challenge to the array. The possibility ought not to be brushed aside, and I thought it right to mention it in the debate.

Mr. Flynn: I hate to intervene in what appears to be a private debate between lawyers, solicitors and the relatives of lawyers. That is probably why it has attracted so much attention in the House, attention that is out of all proportion to its importance.

I was provoked by the failure of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) to answer my simple question. How did he come to make the statement that all the fine nuances of a language are communicated when it is translated from English to Welsh? It is not possible, unless one has a thorough knowledge of both languages.

The hon. and learned Gentleman was silent on that particular issue—I respect his right to silence. I have never heard him speak Welsh. I look forward to that joy, and it is a moment for which I shall live. I do not know on what the hon. and learned Gentleman bases his judgment, but if he does not speak Welsh there is no way that he can make a decision on the matter.

The hon. and learned Gentleman made another point—one of some, if not great, importance—which was that people have a burning desire to make judgments on crimes that have been committed in their own countries. There may be something in that. However, overriding that are the needs of people who speak Welsh as a first language. No one speaks another language in the way that they speak their first language, which is usually learnt in the cradle. It is the language in which we are happiest, and most comfortable. People have different personalities in different languages. We can all think of people who are dignified and on whom we look with respect in one language who are stuttering buffoons in another. It happens in many languages. The right to speak in a proper and comfortable way is more important than the right to speak on juries.

I shall finish with one brief point. I was in the town of Harlech and wrote a cheque in Welsh at a strange bank. I handed over the cheque and my identification, but the person behind the counter brushed the identification aside, and said in Welsh that there was no need for identification. "Crooks do not use Welsh."

Mr. Morgan: Like my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) I feel a degree of diffidence about this matter, and as a non-lawyer, I am fearful of sounding like a "stuttering buffoon."

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. John Redwood): As a non-lawyer also, I wonder when I hear lawyers talk about balances whether we should also hear about the "cheques".

Mr. Morgan: The Secretary of State is trying to prove that the description of him in The Guardian last week was true. The newspaper described him as having the eyes of Hannibal Lecter and the hairstyle of Bob Monkhouse. He was trying there to show that he has also the wit of Bob Monkhouse. Most people would not want to be associated with Bob Monkhouse, even if they did not mind being associated with Hannibal Lecter.

My point was about the practicality of the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) about computerised jury lists. The case for eligibility for jury service is currently denoted on the computerised version of electoral rolls—although, I believe, not on the versions that appear in print—to ensure that OAPs are no longer called for jury service. It seems a practical extension of that principle to provide the same electoral computerised roll, only stating the availability of and the competence of a person to act as a juror in Welsh.

Mr. Alex Carlile: How would the hon. Gentleman test the ability of those who perhaps might put the letter "W" on an electoral roll to indicate that they spoke Welsh?

Mr. Morgan: That is a practical problem which seems far from insuperable when it comes to the selection of a jury at a trial. It would not be difficult for a judge to put a request to the jurors before the start of a trial, asking them to assure the court that they were capable of handling the case, whether it be a complicated fraud case or a relatively simple, open and shut burglary case. It is not an insuperable practical problem, but it would help to solve the long-standing grievance that people have felt over their inability to claim a jury trial in Welsh.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The debate has concentrated largely on the jury system. We had a similar debate in Committee. Hon. Members who represent the legal profession showed then that there is a division of opinion among them about the matter. I am sure that that would also be the case in the House as a whole.

I set out in Committee, the Government's policy about all-Welsh juries and the Government's view remains unchanged. We do not consider it appropriate to make provision to require juries of trials conducted through the medium of Welsh to be composed solely of people who understand Welsh, mainly because we cannot allow anything to interfere with the principle of random selection of juries nor place further hurdles in the way of the administration of justice.

I call in aid not only all the arguments put forward by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) but the findings of the report by the late Lord Edmund Davies. The Government's policy conforms with the recommendations of his report and I remain firmly of the view that the best way to safeguard not only the interests of Welsh speakers but justice generally is by means of simultaneous translation.

I have heard what the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) has said about nuances and so on, but, as I understand it, the translation service has improved considerably in recent years.

I can tell the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) that I am aware of the royal commission's recommendation on jury composition, but I have to remind him that it is only a recommendation. I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will consider many matters relating to jury composition in the light of the royal commission's recommendations. However, the commission itself, as I think that the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, has stressed the difficulty of departing from the guiding principle of random selection, even in a limited way. I am sure that we will want to move with extreme caution in any matters relating to the selection of juries.

It is worth reminding the House that the Bill re-enacts the provision in the Welsh Language Act 1967 which gives the right to a defendant or another party at a legal hearing to give evidence in Welsh should he or she choose to do so. I was pleased to be able to table an amendment in Committee that further clarified the position of written evidence in the courts. In future, the Lord Chancellor will produce rules of court governing the submission of written evidence in Welsh. They will be able to cover detailed matters including the need to give notice and the need to protect the interests of parties to a hearing who do not understand Welsh.

Many hearings in Wales, particularly in magistrates courts, take place entirely in Welsh. That policy will continue, but is a matter that must remain at the discretion of court authorities. Therefore, the Government cannot agree to the proposal set out in the new clause that the matter be left to the discretion of the defendant or litigant.

I am pleased to be able to reiterate today the undertaking that I gave during Committee that the Lord Chancellor's Department will continue to seek to facilitate the use of Welsh in the court service wherever it is reasonably practicable and will not interfere with the efficient administration of justice. He must be able to have regard to all the relevant criteria in appointing judges and other legal officers in Wales. The Government do not, however, believe that it will be acceptable to restrict the discretion of the Lord Chancellor to make the most suitable appointments, as the new clause suggests.

In view of what I have said, and in concluding this short debate, I hope that the new clauses will not be pressed to a division.

Mr. Llwyd: The Minister says that he is unpersuaded. Frankly, I am unpersuaded towards his view. We shall beg to differ on that. In the light of the Runciman proposals in the royal commission report, if there were a change of practice following on that which I described earlier and of which the Minister is aware, will he reconsider?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am sure that when the Home Secretary considers the royal commission's recommendation he will take into account what has been said today on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Llwyd: In that case, I do not wish to press the matter to a Division, so I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 7

DISCRIMINATION (SECTION 1(B) OF THE RACE RELATIONS ACT 1976.

'It is hereby declared that for the purposes of section 1(b) of the Race Relations Act 1976 a person does not discriminate against another by reason only of the fact that such person applies to that other a requirement or condition that he or she be able to communicate in Wales through the medium of the Welsh language.'.—[Mr. Wigley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Wigley: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause deals with the way in which race relations legislation has been brought into matters relating to the Welsh language over the past decade. We had a fairly extensive debate in Committee and our feeling is that the issue was not satisfactorily resolved in Committee. That feeling has been strengthened by evidence that came to my notice before the Committee stage came to an end.

There was a case some eight of nine years ago concerning appointments to an old people's home in Ynys Môn, where, if I remember correctly, 29 of the 30 residents were Welsh speaking. When the jobs were advertised, a requirement was that applicants should be Welsh speaking. An attempt was made to bring in the Commission for Racial Equality on the basis that it was racial discrimination to include such a clause. I accept that there are many jobs where knowledge of a particular language is irrelevant—it does not matter whether people are train drivers, or perform a host of other jobs. However, there are many jobs where a knowledge of the Welsh language is important—broadcasting and teaching speak for themselves.

In constituencies such as mine, where Welsh is the main language of 84 per cent. of the population, it is important that those appointed to jobs dealing with the public can deal with them in whichever language the public wish. It is a matter of considerable offence if, when a local authority or any other employer—or potential employer—makes it a condition that the ability to speak Welsh or have an understanding of it is necessary for a certain job, it may be taken before the Commission for Racial Equality on the basis that it is acting in a racist manner. That is nonsense.

That was not the reasoning behind the legislation that set up the CRE. It is an abuse of the Race Relations Act 1976 to use it for that purpose. There has been continuing discussion about that over many years. From meetings that my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and I had with the Minister of State, I thought that the Government would table an amendment, on Committee or Report, that would resolve the problem, and that there would be a change in legislation that would meet that, although perhaps not using the wording of the amendment—I think a Labour amendment—in Committee. We have tabled similar amendments.

I was flabbergasted when the Minister rejected the arguments outright in Committee. He said:

"I am pleased to reassure the Committee that current employment law provides the flexibility that we require."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 1 July 1993; c. 217.]

He said that it was not necessary. I checked with the CRE as to exactly its position.

7.30 pm

In a letter that I had this month from Herman Ouseley, the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality, he says:

"In the past there was a conflict between the Commission and the Welsh Language Board over the issue but I am informed that a compromise was agreed in 1991. The agreed position now is reflected in the proposed amendment to Section 4 of the Race Relations Act 1976 in the following terms:"

He then details the specific agreed proposed amendment to that legislation:

"For the purpose of the Part of the Act a requirement or condition relating to ability to communicate in Welsh shall be justifiable where the person to whom it is applied would, in the course of employment to which the requirement or condition applies, deal on a regular basis with persons who normally use Welsh and the level of ability required is no greater than is needed to do so."

There is a subsequent subsection.

That wording is very similar to the wording of the Labour amendment in Committee. The chairman goes on to say:

"I hope this clarifies the position of the Commission."

The position is, therefore, that the commission has agreed with the Welsh Language Board that there is a problem; it has agreed on the solution and that it can be by means of amending legislation. So what on earth are we waiting for, I ask the Minister. Here is the vehicle for doing it.

I accept that the wording of our new clause 7 is not identical to the wording that the Commission for Racial Equality has before it. But, if that is indeed the position, I urge the Minister to accept new clause 7 now, and he can amend that in the House of Lords, when the Bill goes back there, by putting in the wording agreed by the commission and the Welsh Language Board. That is a simple mechanism that is open to him and enables him to keep his options open, in order to put right what is a very strongly-felt perceived wrong.

The question goes beyond the technicality that I have described. Here we have what is essentially the Government's own approach to how to deal with the Welsh language. We have the Welsh Language Board dealing with an institution—the Commission for Racial Equality in this case—and coming to an agreement. That is the whole basis of the Government's set of schemes and proposals enshrined in the Bill.

What happens, then, when there is an agreement and it is necessary for Parliament to put it into effect, as will be the case with many other schemes that flow from this legislation? If Parliament turns its back and says that it disagrees and will not implement the agreement, it blows asunder the argument that the Minister made at various times in Committee that the schemes can deliver the goods, and that the Secretary of State or the Minister will adopt an agreed position arrived at through negotiation and discussion between two interested bodies.

We have very clearly a test of the Government's own approach to legislation. The argument is conclusive. The attitude of the Minister in private discussions that we had in his office a few weeks ago showed that he had sympathy with what we were trying to do and it was a matter of having an agreed form of words. We now have an agreed form of words.

I therefore put it to the House that we should accept new clause 7, although it may be flawed, with the intention of the Government coming back in the House of Lords to see whether the agreed formula that I have had from the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality can be built in at that stage, and this long-running, long-festering ill can be put right once and for all.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I will certainly look into the point that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) has just made about the agreement between the Welsh Language Board and the Commission for Racial Equality. If I heard him correctly, the proposal was for an amendment to the relevant legislation under the Race Relations Act 1976.

Mr. Wigley: I understand that the Minister has not had a copy of this letter. Had I thought in advance, I would probably have made a copy available to him. I apologise for not doing so. However, in the same way as new clause 7 amends section 1(b) of the Race Relations Act 1976, the proposed new amendment would put in a subsection (a) to section 4 of that Act. It is clearly in order for us to do that through this legislation, otherwise new clause 7 would not have been accepted for debate tonight. Using that as a basis, the question can be approached in another place and the argument taken on.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I certainly take on board what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I will look further into that matter. We have already had to look very carefully at the issue of stipulating Welsh as a condition of employment during the course of our preparations for the Bill. It was important, because one result of the Bill will be to require the presence of Welsh speakers in certain posts in the public sector in Wales. That is already the case for many jobs and it will remain the case in future. We therefore had to be satisfied that the provisions in employment law governing discrimination would not stand in the way of employment policies that aim to do no more than ensure that public bodies are able to comply with the terms of the legislation.

This is a complex area in which there seems to have been a fair degree of confusion in the wake of the Gwynedd case, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The confusion seems to have obscured the fact that employers are entitled to stipulate Welsh as a condition of employment so long as they are able to justify such a requirement. The law requires, not that an employer should demonstrate that such a requirement is absolutely necessary, but that it should be able to be justified. That, of course, is a lesser test. It would be for the courts to interpret in individual cases.

The amendment that was before us in Committee sought to define what the justification criteria amounted to. Earl Ferrers acknowledged in the debate in another place that this was an interesting way to approach the issue, and this was something that we looked at very carefully.

As I explained in Committee, the conclusion that we reached was that a formulation of this sort would not place employment policies beyond legal challenge. In particular, whatever we said in our domestic legislation would not necessarily remove such policies from challenge under European employment law. It would not be acceptable to pursue policies in this country which did not conform to European law. New clause 21, proposed in Committee, came closer to meeting these legal difficulties than does the present new clause, but I regret that neither is able to overcome them all.

The other important point that I sought to explain during the debate in Committee was that the introduction of Welsh language schemes would be an important factor in reducing the uncertainty that there might have been in this area. The Government's legal advice is that a public body is likely to be regarded as justified in requiring that an employee speak Welsh if, otherwise, there would not be enough Welsh-speaking employees in suitable posts to cope with the demand for Welsh language services. In other words, the introduction of Welsh language schemes will serve to give some indication of what is justified in this context, and will therefore serve to reduce whatever possibility there may be of employment policies being successfully challenged.

Mr. Rowlands: This has just begun to sink in to me —I am a bit slow this evening. Are we to take it from the Minister's remarks that he has not seen the draft amendment by the Commission for Racial Equality and was unaware of the discussions between it and the Welsh Language Board and of the agreed amendment?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I was not aware of the amendment. I gather that it was contained in a letter to the hon. Member for Caernarfon that he received fairly recently. I have said that I will certainly look into the matter further. I do not think that the House would expect me to go further this evening. I am trying to outline the situation as I see it, and the impact of this Bill on the subject under discussion.

The need for employment policies to be justifiable provides important safeguards. In particular, it reflects our view that the delivery of Welsh language schemes should not be dependent on every employee in the public sector being a Welsh speaker. We know that that is not the case. As I have said, much can be achieved through the use of translation and interpretation services.

Having looked at the matter very closely, I am satisfied that existing employment law, while not entirely removing the possibility of legal challenge, provides us with the required flexibility to put Welsh language schemes into effect.

Mr. Wigley: I have listened carefully to what the Minister has said. When he replied to me earlier, without the advantage of his notes, he was more sympathetic and warm than he is now that he has got back to his rehearsed script.

The Minister said in his earlier remarks that he is prepared to consider our proposal. If that assurance is to be meaningful—and if there is to be an agreed proposed amendment that requires legislation—he will need a hook on which to attach it in another place.

There is no other amendment under which the legislation can be included when the Bill goes back to the other place. If, after having looked at the matter, and having considered it with the Commission for Racial Equality and the Welsh Language Board, the Minister agrees that the change should be built into law, it would be sensible to accept new clause 7 tonight. That would provide the Minister with a vehicle to which he can attach the legislation. If, after having looked at it, he considers that there is no need for legislation, the new clause can be taken out in the House of Lords. That would allow him flexibility one way or the other.

If the Minister does not accept that, he is saying, "Yes, this is a form of words that I am willing to consider, but in practice I am closing my options now."

Mr. Rowlands: I think that the hon. Gentleman is being persuasive. We have all been here long enough to know that the Government are not likely to table an amendment to the Race Relations Act in the next parliamentary Session to deal with this particular point. The only chance is to use the Bill as a vehicle, and I hope that the Minister will accept that.

Mr. Wigley: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. This is not of great party-political import. I suspect that hon. Members on both sides of the House want to avoid cases going to the Commission for Racial Equality, industrial tribunals and so forth.

The Minister said that we must act within both our employment law and European employment law. I accept that, but I remind him—very gently—that our earlier argument about status was that European employment law was the bas's of the case taken to the European Court when a Dutch citizen objected to a language condition on a job in Ireland. That reminds me of his own words: he said that European employment law, the status of the Welsh language and the interplay of the Welsh language in United Kingdom legislation are vitally important, just as it is important in Irish legislation.

I believe that there is a way forward. I hope that the Minister will tell me either that there is another mechanism whereby this can be put into practice in another place—if he agrees to accept what the CRE and the Welsh Language Board want—or that he will accept new clause 7. If there is some other way of doing it, that is fine.

We want to make progress so that when there may be an element of racism—which exists in Wales, as it does everywhere else—the people concerned can legitimately go to the courts. The courts should not be tied by the use of this legislation for matters for which it is not intended.

Has the Minister any comment before I decide whether to press the issue? I would rather elicit an agreement to further consideration in the House of Lords than press for a vote that we might lose.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have had a great deal of advice on the Groener case, and I gave the essence of that advice earlier. The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) referred to an agreement between the Welsh Language Board and the CRE. He will know that I do not legislate on the hoof, and that the matter is properly one for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment —whom I would certainly have to consult, as well as the Government as a whole, before I could give any commitment to legislate. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will examine the matter.

7.45 pm

Mr. Wigley: I do not want this to drag on—the guts of the argument have been adequately rehearsed—but unless something is done on Report to give the Minister a vehicle with which to legislate, the provision will not be put into the Bill in another place.

I asked the Minister to clarify whether there was an alternative way of handling the matter in another place. I assume from his silence that there is not. Unless a new clause such as this is introduced tonight, there will not be a hook in the other place on which the Minister can attach any new clause, such as the letter that I have cited suggests.

I understand that the Minister must discuss the matter with his colleagues, but if at the end of that he says, "Yes, fine, this is what is needed", he is going to close his option tonight unless he accepts the new clause, or he can tell me of some other way of handling it. Surely it is a reasonable way to make progress. It is the way in which the House should legislate. We should consider all the possibilities and see how they can be met. There is a consensus on what we want to do; it is a matter of how we do it. That gives us the possibility of doing something in the House of Lords.

Unless the Minister can give some indication of a way of handling this matter in the House of Lords, we shall have no alternative but to divide on it.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I can say nothing more about the hon. Gentleman's main point. However, he should not forget that every public body operating in Wales, including the CRE, will be obliged to produce a scheme. I think that the matters to which he has referred are likely to feature in such a scheme and that may well be the proper place for it.

Mr. Wigley: That may be the case; it may be something that is appropriate for a scheme. However, the CRE and the Welsh Language Board have reached an agreement that there should be a change of legislation. If that was the outcome of many of the other schemes—that discussions will take place between the Welsh Language Board and a host of other organisations in Wales—and bodies come forward and say, "Well, this and that needs to be done, Minister", and the Minister says, "No, I am sorry; you have reached an agreement but I am not going to do it", that would underline our fears about the way in which the board will work without any statutory rights.

The Welsh Language Board and the CRE have determined that there needs to be a statutory provision. The Government are apparently unwilling to use the Bill as a vehicle, even though it is an eminently suitable one. They are not even willing to keep the option open for the few days until the Bill comes back from the House of Lords, presumably next week. The Government are showing an unreasonable unwillingness in not allowing that facility to be kept open for the next few days.

If the Minister has said his last word on the subject and can add nothing further, we shall have no option but to divide the House. It is sad that we cannot take this step when it is what the Minister wants to do—in line with the conversations that we have had—when it is what the Commission for Racial Equality wants to do, when it is what the Welsh Language Board wants to do, when it is what the overwhelming majority of the people of Wales want to do and when, I suspect, it is what the majority of hon. Members want to do.

Mr. Morgan: May I, too, press the Minister, bearing in mind the fact that we have probably reached a crunch point in tonight's proceedings? The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) says that if new clause 7 is not accepted, the right hon. Gentleman will have pre-empted the possibility of the Government's accepting an agreement that appears to have been struck between the CRE and the Welsh Language Board. If the new clause were accepted, the Government would not be pre-empted from introducing a form of words in the other place when Commons amendments are considered there.

If the Government find that such a provision is not practical, that the agreement to which the hon. Member for Caernarfon referred does not exist or that the matter has been misunderstood, they can take action in the other place to remedy matters. But if the Minister does not accept the new clause tonight, there will be no possibility of using the Bill to enact the agreement that has been struck between the Welsh Language Board and the CRE.

Mr. Wigley: I was making that precise point. There is no alternative to what we are suggesting. If the new clause is not accepted now, the whole issue is closed. I urge the Government to examine the matter to ensure that the wording of the new clause reflects the point that we have in mind.

Mr. Morgan: They are frightened of losing face.

Mr. Wigley: If that is all it is, the Government are adducing the worst of all arguments. Leaving aside any question of saving or losing face, we simply want to get rid of a problem that all concerned agree exists. I repeat, if the Government find, after scrutiny, that the drafting of new clause 7 does not represent the way in which the Welsh Language Board and the commission wish to make progress, the provision can be removed or amended in the other place.

Mr. Flynn: Many hon. Members, including myself, are hearing the argument for the first time and are totally persuaded by what the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) says. Many accusations are made about the unreasonableness and elective dictatorship of the Government. The Conservatives have little support in Wales—32 seats out of 500 at the last election—and are being unreasonable tonight.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon is simply arguing that the options must be kept open. We had a vivid demonstration last night of the dominance of the Conservatives in the other place. It is clear that they will be able to do what they like when the Bill arrives there. They can remove the new clause or alter it at that stage. If they do not accept it tonight, they will be slamming the door closed until a future Government bring forward another Welsh language measure. That will probably not happen in the lifetime of any of us here now. If the Government do not accept the new clause, they will be acting against the wishes of the people of Wales.

Mr. Wigley: The hon. Gentleman voices my feelings. If the Government are not willing to keep their options open for a few days while they investigate the issue—knowing for certain that they can remove the provision in the other place if the wording is not acceptable—they will be seen as having been totally unreasonable in their handling of this legislation.

Accusations are already flying around in the context of the earlier debate, in which plenty of emotion was expressed. We have had a cool and calculated discussion of a matter which we all agree has been a problem. If the Government do not use the vehicle of this Bill to deal with the issue now, they will be open to all sorts of accusations in Wales.

I am trying to save the Government from themselves, although they seem determined to go down a different avenue. I urge the Minister and the occupants of the Treasury Bench at least to keep their mouths shut when the Question is put, so enabling the new clause to become part of the Bill.

Mr. Rowlands: I make a final plea to the Minister. It is astonishing that such a discussion could occur between the Welsh Language Board and the Commission for Racial Equality, resulting in a well-drafted amendment being produced in respect of a piece of legislation that has already been before the House, yet neither the Minister nor his officials knew anything about it.

We are old enough to know that, unless we take advantage of this Bill to put that matter right, the chances of the next Government or the one after that finding time to make such a change will be negligible. I urge the right hon. Gentleman to accept the new clause, thereby giving him time to examine the matter afresh, after which he can move to delete it or redraft it in the other place to reflect what has been agreed between two sensible organisations.

I appreciate that the right hon. Gentleman must consult the Secretary of State for Employment, but as it seems that he does not oppose the idea and as the House would be willing to give it more than a fair wind, he should accept the new clause. As I say, the chances of passing a separate piece of amending legislation on the subject in the near future are slim.

I beg the Minister to prevent the House from dividing on the matter. We are all basically on the same side. Perhaps the Minister agrees with us, having had time to reflect on it, and will now accept the new clause. It would not involve him getting sacked. He has managed to survive for 14 years, so accepting it on the hoof, as it were, should cause him no problem.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I assure the House that we considered the matter thoroughly before the debate took place. We do not find the new clause acceptable. I have outlined the position in relation to employment law and the Welsh language. It is not Government practice to accept amendments in which we do not believe and which we think are incorrect.

The position is that there is agreement between the CRE and the Welsh Language Board. As far as I am aware, the Government have not been consulted about inserting that agreement in legislation. I hope that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) will not press the matter to a Division, but, if he does, I shall ask my hon. Friends to oppose it.

Mr. Wigley: I make a final plea in a debate that has shed light not only on the subject under discussion but on the way in which the Government listen to our arguments and respond to them. I recall taking a deputation concerned with disability issues to see a Minister of lower rank than the right hon. Gentleman who has charge of this measure. That junior Minister listened to us and said, "The advice of my civil servants is that I must resist your request but, having listened to you, I shall accept it."

Mr. Morgan: I understand that a letter has been sent by the chairman of the Welsh Language Board on the matter to the Secretary of State or to the Minister of State. I wonder whether we might elicit some information about whether he responded to that letter.

Mr. Wigley: I, too, have seen the press reports this week. There seems to have been some confusion between what is understood in the Welsh Office and what is understood by the Commission for Racial Equality and the Welsh Language Board. As there was a report of that, in the Western Mail a few days ago, I should have thought that by now the Government would at least have found out what the position was. I should have been surprised if there had not been some correspondence.

8 pm

Mr. Rowlands: The matter is becoming more serious. The Minister made a clear and unequivocal statement that neither he nor his Department knew about that arrangement.

Mr. Wigley: That was the comment made earlier. Clearly, the Minister had not seen the letter I received, but I should have imagined that the contents of a letter sent to me as a Back Bencher would have been similar to any proposals that had been brought to the attention of the Minister.

Mr. Morgan: Has the Minister seen it?

Mr. Wigley: I also ask whether the Minister has seen the correspondence with the CRE. I understand that it is being checked out at the moment and I shall be interested to hear whether he has seen it.

If he has seen it and he is aware that there was an agreement, and yet he responded in the way that he did in Committee, he was misleading the Committee. If, however, the correspondence has arrived since the Committee, it is new information on which the Government should be acting. The response from the Minister is the same as that which he gave us in Committee. In other words, I am not quite sure whether Welsh Office Ministers have been on top of their act. It sems not only that they have not, but that they are not prepared to consider the possibility that there is other information and that they need a vehicle to find a way out of it.

The debate has continued long enough and the embarrassment of the Government has been exposed for all the people of Wales to see. I hope that there is some way in which the Government can do something in the House of Lords, but I do not believe that there is. I believe that the Government, by their shout in a few moments' time, will be closing the options to something that they believe should be done. It is an incredible reflection of the Government's behaviour.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I want to clear up one thing. I said that I had not seen a copy of the letter sent to the hon. Gentleman. I am aware that there have been discussions between the board and the CRE. We at the Welsh Office have been discussing these matters with the CRE for some time. We considered the amendment that he is now putting forward quite a long time ago, but we reached the conclusion that it was not an acceptable amendment and we have not changed our conclusion.

Mr. Wigley: I take it, therefore, from what the Minister is saying that he had seen the amendment to which the letter I received refers. If he had not seen it, he could not make that judgment. So he has seen it; presumably it was not a rushed decision as the judgment was made in 1991—two years ago—and there has been adequate time to find a way forward.

It is a portent of what will occur between the Welsh Language Board and the Government. There will be schemes that take months to agree between the Welsh Language Board and various parts of the public sector in Wales. They will be sat on for two years by the Government and then, at the end of the day, Ministers will refuse to accept the unanimous advice from Wales.

We had hoped that we could have supported the legislation. Our discussion tonight underlines why we believe that there is a central vacuum in the Bill; it contains no rights at all. All the rights are there, but the Government are not willing to use them and the people of Wales will suffer.

New clause 10

RIGHT TO WELSH MEDIUM EDUCATION

'(1) Every local education authority in Wales shall provide for every child or young person of school age in Wales whose parents so desire, the opportunity to receive education in, and through the medium of, Welsh, within a reasonable distance of their home.

(2) The cost of providing education through the medium of Welsh in accordance with subsection (1) above shall be taken into account by the Secretary of State in determining the capital and revenue support requirements of each local education authority in Wales on an annual basis.'.—[Mr. Wigley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Wigley: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 9, in clause 5, page 2, line 32, after '(1)', insert

"Except as provided in subsection (2A) below.".

No. 11, in page 2, line 45, at end insert

'(2A) The scheme referred to in subsection (1) above shall not include measures in connection with the provision by a local education authority of education in the medium of Welsh.'.

No. 13, in clause 6, page 3, leave out lines 21 to 23.

No. 15, in clause 7, page 4, line 7, at end insert

'(2A) A notice under subsection (1) above may not require a local education authority to prepare a scheme in relation to the provision of education in the medium of Welsh.'.

Mr. Wigley: I hope that we do not take as long discussing new clause 10 and the associated amendments as we took to discuss the previous group. The new clause relates to the right to Welsh-medium education. Those who served on the Standing Committee will recall the considerable debate on that matter. As a result, the new clause that we tabled in Committee has been revised to give the right to Welsh-medium education to all children of school age.

The new clause contains a provision to meet the fears expressed by some Opposition Members that an additional financial burden would be imposed on Welsh local education authorities. Subsection (2) states:

"The cost of providing education through the medium of Welsh in accordance with subsection (1) above shall be taken into account by the Secretary of State in determining the capital and revenue support requirements of each local education authority in Wales on an annual basis."

That subsection should allay the misgivings genuinely and properly expressed in Committee, for which I had some sympathy.

I shall not rehearse the arguments deployed in Committee. I say only, in summary, that the provision of Welsh-medium education varies considerably from area to area. In Committee, I quoted examples of people in certain parts of Wales who had considerable difficulty in getting Welsh-medium education within a reasonable distance of their homes. That has aroused considerable passion in some parts of Wales. Of course, in other parts good and improving provision is being made.

8.15 pm

Mr. Alan W. Williams: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there are parts of Wales—his constituency may be one—where it is equally difficult to get English-medium education, especially at infant and primary level, within a reasonable distance of home?

Mr. Wigley: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman does not understand Gwynedd's education policy on primary schools. Its objective is to get every child to be thoroughly bilingual by the age of 11. If that is the hon. Gentleman's objective in what he is advocating in Dyfed, I salute that. There is a campaign in Dyfed by a small minority of parents who want to avoid any Welsh-medium education that would go anywhere near to making their children bilingual by the age of 11.

Mr. Williams: Will the hon. Gentleman give way again?

Mr. Wigley: I suspect that this will be a dialogue.

Mr. Wiliams: I had not intended to become involved in the debate. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in infant education, children aged between five and seven should have the right to learn to read and write in their mother tongue—that is, the language of the home? If that applies to Welsh speakers, it must also apply to English speakers if we are to uphold the principle of equality to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Wigley: There should be a facility within Welsh education to make all children thoroughly bilingual as quickly as possible. The most practical way to do that is by considerable immersion at an early age. Children aged five to seven are like blotting paper and they can pick up languages easily.

Mr. Williams: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wigley: No. I am sorry; the hon. Gentleman can make this own speech in due course. I am not being discourteous; I do not want to detain the House.

Children have the ability to pick up languages at an early age. Indeed, the overwhelming majority of children in my constituency speak only Welsh at the ages of three and four, but learn English at five and six and are verbally thoroughly bilingual by seven.

Over the past 20 years, there has been a tremendous growth in something known as the Welsh schools movement. It operates in the non-Welsh speaking, mainly industrial areas in Wales. A great deal of progress has been made in, for example, the old areas of Glamorgan, especially Flintshire. Great progress has been made in Cardiff, where Welsh-medium education is mushrooming at a tremendous rate. Although the parents are non-Welsh speaking, they want their children to be educated in Welsh, not just as a subject but through the medium of Welsh.

The way in which that has succeeded academically as well as socially has overcome some of the worries that I know many hon. Members had 10 or 15 years ago about building ghetto societies. We are not doing that. Society moves on in some of the English speaking industrial valleys in which a large proportion of young people—perhaps even 30 or 40 per cent.—are educated through the medium of Welsh. That is the key to the ability of the Welsh language to gain tremendous new ground in this generation.

Such education should be available within a reasonable distance of every person's home. People should not have to travel 20 or 30 miles for it, and there certainly should not be generations of young people who did not have the opportunity at all, as, regrettably, happened in some parts of West Glamorgan. I hope that things are moving forward there now, but for a long time young people have missed the opportunity. Thousands of young people in Wales who could have been fluently bilingual by now, and whose parents wanted them to be, were denied that chance because of the lack of a statutory right.

I accept that the new clause is based on the statutory rights approach. I know that the Government do not like that approach for the Bill, but I do not see how, with a statutory right, it would be possible to safeguard the position through the Welsh Language Board.

Indeed, as the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said, the Welsh Language Board and local authorities could be brought into tremendous conflict. I hope that that will not happen, but I can see the seeds of the possibility, and I would rather see a statutory right through local education authorities, with the Welsh Language Board being there to advise, to help and to come in where there are real difficulties. The basic responsibility should be laid on LEAs.

No doubt the Minister will say that it will be possible to develop schemes between the Welsh Language Board and local education authorities, and I accept that. But we heard in an earlier debate what happens when there is an agreement between two such bodies. The agreement can be two or three years down the line and still the Government do not accept it. They may have some reason best known to themselves why an agreement between two bodies in Wales is not accepted in Whitehall and Westminster. Provisions for schemes such as those suggested by the Government do not even begin to meet the requirement. There should be a statutory right in the Bill.

Mr. Rowlands: My amendment No. 11 has been grouped with the new clause, and I do not know whether I would have tabled it had I known that the two would be taken together, because I want to support whole heartedly the idea of a statutory right for parents to have their children educated through the medium of Welsh.

At the same time, for reasons that I have already explained and shall not repeat, I am deeply reluctant to allow the Welsh Language Board to become involved in the detailed development of education policy within communities, especially communities such as mine, which are sensitively balanced, with much genuine effort being made to achieve that balance and to avoid division and friction. I have a feeling that, accidentally—I do not mean this in any offensive way—the Welsh Language Board could bumble into such situations and create problems where there could have been harmony. I oppose the considerable extension of the board's activities into the details of local education authority policies.

As a quid pro quo, I certainly support the new clause, which gives parents a statutory right. I consider it far better to proceed by giving people rights and letting them exercise them. If those rights are denied people must have proper procedures for obtaining redress through the Secretary of State or the courts. The Welsh Language Board should not become involved in the arguments and be dragged in, whether it wants to intervene or not. One repeatedly sees people using the board as a means of appeal when arguments are taking place locally. Such a role would damage the integrity and status of the board, and the support that it should receive.

I thank the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) for withdrawing his original new clause as a result of representations from other members of the Committee, because subsection (2) was not then part of it. Now the new clause is balanced, and ensures that the resources issue will be tackled when we grant the right. I support the new clause, and if a vote is forced I shall vote for it, but I hope that that will be taken in conjunction with my considerable reservations about the prospect of the Welsh Language Board's having a major role and bring able to intervene in the development of individual LEA policies on the Welsh language.

Without opening too many divisions among ourselves, may I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) that in my overwhelmingly English-speaking community my children were brought up and educated through the medium of Welsh. I cannot remember my wife or myself having taught them English, yet I am happy to say that my eldest son has graduated in English, my second son achieved a grade A in English at A-level, and I hope that my daughter will achieve something similar a year hence.

Whatever pressures my hon. Friend may be under, let me tell him that, even in communities such as mine, we have managed to bring up children bilingually without the fear that they would not learn English as a result. Young children have an enormous capacity to learn and enjoy languages, and I believe that teaching them more than one language makes them more fluent, and more interested in sounds and in language itself.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: My hon. Friend's wife, who was born just outside my constituency, is from a Welsh-speaking background. That makes a vital contribution. It is much easier for children if they are educated in their mother tongue, so it was entirely natural for my hon. Friend's children to go to a Welsh-speaking school.

My hon. Friend referred to pressures that I may be under. I am under no pressure at all—or at least, the only pressure is my desire for there to be equality between the Welsh and the English languages in my constituency and throughout Wales.

Mr. Rowlands: I do not think that my hon. Friend's case will hold water. I do not want to point the finger, but my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), the shadow Secretary of State, sends his children to a school where everything is taught through the medium of Welsh, although I believe that neither parent is Welsh speaking. It would not have been possible to have made children bilingual in Merthyr unless such commitments had been made. The process did no damage whatever to the standard achieved in English. We should not set up bogeys, because they do not exist.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: Of course I am delighted, and I know very well, that my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) has chosen a Welsh medium of education in the Rhymney valley for his daughter. However, the difference between that situation and the problems in my constituency is that my hon. Friend the

[Mr. Alan W. Williams]

Member for Caerphilly was in a position to choose. It was a matter of voluntary choice, whereas in my constituency, and in large areas of Dyfed and Gwynedd, parents have no choice other than Welsh-medium education. Surely that cannot be right.

Mr. Rowlands: It is sad that for a long time parents could not choose to have their children brought up bilingually. If I lived in Dyfed and my children went to a school that taught all subjects in Welsh, I am sure that they would also be taught English, and would emerge effectively bilingual—unless that did not happen for other educational reasons. I did not wish to start too much of an argument with my hon. Friend; I simply wanted to draw to his attention the experience of a household in an overwhelmingly English-speaking community.

I support the new clause, and I hope that the Welsh Language Board heeds the warnings that we gave in Committee, which I repeated through the vehicle of amendment No. 11. The board should tread warily when dealing with the detailed aspects of LEA policy. If it does not tread carefully, it could create tensions within the local communities. So long as the board listens to the messages that we have sent from this Chamber and from the Committee, we will have a sensible and balanced approach to these issues. We should support the idea of a right of the kind suggested in the new clause.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I also support the new clause. The advantage of a right is that it creates a corresponding duty. In my constituency, and throughout Powys, bilingual education has not been available in a Welsh-medium school. That has caused great anger among a large group of parents. The situation is simply unacceptable.

8.30 pm

The issue has been considered time and again by the local education authority of Powys county council. However, because there is no duty to make the provision, it has fudged the issue time and again. That is not acceptable. As a result, the anger of the growing group of parents who wish to have their children educated at a secondary level through the medium of Welsh has grown. A quite unnecessary political issue has arisen.

At the moment, a solution has at least been found for part of Powys. A proposal has been put forward for a building, which has been used as a special school, to be created as a Welsh medium unit for the first three, or possibly four, years of the Caereinion high school at Llanfair Caereinion. The matter is now before the Secretary of State for a decision. I want to take the opportunity of tonight's debate to urge the Secretary of State to reach a decision as soon as possible.

The last schools decision from the same valley—the Banw valley—which went to the Secretary of State took 10 months. That related to an application, which was eventually granted, by a primary school for grant-maintained status. I hope very much that the decision to which I referred a few moments ago can be reached in 10 weeks rather than 10 months. Even 10 weeks would seem more than long enough.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The hon. and learned Gentleman must recognise that Powys county council's proposal to the Secretary of State may well resolve certain issues in relation to the provision of Welsh-medium education in the hon. and learned Gentleman's part of Powys. However, given the immense geographical size of Powys, it will not be of any real assistance to parents in my part of Powys who are also seeking Welsh-medium education.

Mr. Carlile: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. I was about to say that, even if that provision is granted and the application by Powys is allowed, that will not meet all the needs of my constituents in the part of Powys which is Montgomeryshire.

I should be much happier to see an entirely new Welsh medium school established somewhere reasonably accessible—perhaps near Newtown—to all those children who wish to be educated through the medium of Welsh or whose parents wish that for them.

The problem which the new clause raises is that if Powys decided to make such a provision, and it might well decide to do that on the merits of the case, it could not afford to do so. The Government should shoulder the responsibility of meeting the cost of that provision throughout Wales, or at least throughout those parts of Wales where it is reasonable so to do. However, in saying "those parts of Wales where it is reasonable so to do", I do not mean for a moment to dilute my belief that every parent in Wales should have the right to choose the medium of Welsh for the education of their children.

I would go so far as to say that this is one of the key issues in the Bill. Many of us will determine how we vote on Third Reading after listening to the Government's considered response on this point. If the Government refuse to give Welsh official status, as they have already refused tonight, and if they refuse to give a right, which sounds pretty reasonable, for children to be educated through the medium of Welsh, what is left in the Bill? All that is left is a Welsh Language Board which will no doubt produce some interesting schemes, many of which I suspect it will not be possible to enforce, and which will not have created a single worthwhile right which a single citizen in Wales can enforce through the courts of law. If that is what we are left with, it will look pretty threadbare.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: I had not intended to intervene in this debate. However, having heard the contributions of the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), I felt that I had to point out once again that the socialist principle should apply.

I strongly support the spirit of the new clause and the opportunity for Welsh-medium education. The clause is fine and I have no problem with it. However, it does not carry with it the principle of equality. Throughout Wales, there should be the opportunity for Welsh-medium education and for English-medium education.

The Minister of State is aware of our problems in Dyfed. Those problems also pertain to Gwynedd. If English-speaking parents move to our rural heartlands of Llanelli, Llandovey and Lampeter from Swansea, Neath or Merthyr, they will find that the local primary school is mainly Welsh medium. It teaches children to read and write in the Welsh language.

Parents want to help their children, especially their infant children, when they are at primary school. It is impossible for English-speaking parents to help their children to learn to read and write if the primary school teaches in the Welsh medium. That takes away a vital part of parenting and part of the enjoyment of being a parent.

It is amazing that that has happened. Over the past few years, there has been a rolling programme in Dyfed which has affected the rural areas. One hundred and eighty eight primary schools in Dyfed are mainly Welsh medium. That is fine so long as the children come from Welsh-speaking homes or if the parents choose that for their children.

I admire my hon. Friends the Members for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) and for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths). Although they are not Welsh speaking, they have decided to send their children to Welsh-medium primary schools. However, that should not be compulsory. In large areas of Gwynedd and Dyfed we effectively have compulsory Welsh-medium infant education. That cannot be right for children.

It was said earlier this evening that children pick up languages like blotting paper. That is simply not true. It is an absolute myth. Coming from a Welsh-speaking home, I was brought up with Welsh and English and I learnt them quite easily. However, I had the advantage of bilingual parents—they spoke both Welsh and English. Children can readily be brought up bilingual in a bilingual home. However, it is otherwise quite difficult and especially for average or below average children.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon referred in Committee to Europe and to trilingualism and quadralingualism and to a tremendous facility with language. That is not the case across Europe. It applies only to very small minority groups. Nearly all children in France are taught through the medium of French. Very few French people speak English or German. The same applies in Germany where there is one dominant language.

Mr. Wigley: There are millions of people in France whose first language is not French——

Mr. Alan W. Williams: No, a small minority.

Mr. Wigley: Yes, there are millions. A standard work refers to a figure of in excess of 10 million people who had a language other than French as their first language. A country like Holland experiences several languages running together because it is at the crossroads of Europe. When the Dutch football team was competing in the World cup finals, six of the 11 players could give interviews in four languages. There are times when some hon. Members cannot give an interview in one language. That is the reality of multilingualism.

Mr. Williams: The hon. Member for Caernarfon has started to believe some of his mythology. It is a case of repetition after repetition and then he believes myths. The vast majority of people in Europe are monolingual. It should be a fundamental right for all children to learn to read and write in the language of their homes—in their mother tongue—so that their parents can help them. That right is not available in large areas of Dyfed and Gwynedd. My difficulty is that the new clause does not relate to problems in my constituency.

Mr. Rowlands: It might sound a banal comparison, but if I were a younger parent, and we moved to Wokingham, I would not have expected my children to be able to learn in a Welsh-medium school. Therefore, if I as a parent lived in Dyfed or Gwynedd where the major provision is Welsh, surely I would have to accept that as a natural constraint because I had chosen to move there and accept the education facilities that are available there. My hon. Friend is making a wrong case.

Mr. Williams: Some schools in my constituency have been categorised as mainly Welsh medium, and 90 per cent. of the children come from English-speaking homes. In most of my constituency, 50 per cent. of people are from Welsh-speaking homes and 50 per cent. are from English-speaking homes. In rural areas, there is the deliberate exclusion of the English language between the ages of five and seven. [Interruption.] That is the case. The hon. Member for Caernarfon might have convulsions at the thought of that, but it is the reality.

Even though I support the spirit of the new clause, when there is no English-speaking education for many of my constituents, it does not address the problem of the Welsh language in education in my constituency. If the clause had been redrafted with the Welsh medium and the English available, it would have included the concept of equality.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon voted with us in the first Division this evening. We in Wales want a status for the Welsh language in Wales that is no less than the status of English, and the principle of equal status and equal validity. That is a two-sided coin, and hon. Members must accept that. Although we want the availability of Welsh-medium education throughout Wales, and I support that, we must also have English-medium education throughout Wales.

My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney talked about the appropriateness of the Welsh Language Board vis-a-vis local education authorities. He is right. Local education authorities carry the primary responsibility. It is a little odd to see education introduced in one new clause in respect of a 20-clause Bill.

Hon. Members must think more about this matter. We in Wales need to examine our education system in total and not just automatically adopt what is happening in England. We need a separate education Bill for Wales. Such a Bill could cover primary, secondary, further and higher education and find a place for the Welsh language.

I should like equality to prevail throughout our education system. That means the availability of the Welsh medium in infant, primary and secondary education throughout Wales, together with the availability of English medium education.

If the hon. Member for Caernarfon presses the new clause to a Division, I will not be able to support him because the principle of equality is absent. I would not vote against it, but I would abstain.

8.45 pm

Mr. Flynn: I will not repeat what was said in Committee when we discussed this matter at length. The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) was an isolated figure in Committee, as he will be in the House, and as he is throughout most of Wales for his point of view on this issue. The reason is that he is fighting against the commonsense approach that has been adopted in every corner of Wales from Monmouth to Caernarfon.

No one has suggested that the same rules for the language—the same conditions—should apply for every part of Wales, just as no one would suggest that everyone in Monmouth could go to a school on the border and demand Welsh education. They would not get anywhere if they did that.

In Carmarthen, a certain line has been pursued by my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams). A tiny group of people have written to us—they are not the most rational letters that we have received. My hon. Friend has opposed the policy of the county council.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: My hon. Friend refers to that tiny group of people. Let me assure my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) and the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), because he referred to a similar matter, that when in Carmarthen town, Lampeter, Cardigan, Llanelli and towns in Dyfed there is a free choice between Welsh-medium education and English-medium education, the overwhelming majority of Welsh-speaking people choose Welsh-medium education and the large majority of English-speaking people choose English-medium education. It is not a tiny number. In rural areas, thousands of people are being deprived of the opportunity to educate their children in the language of the home.

Mr. Flynn: The tiny group I am referring to is called Education First. It is a campaigning group. I was about to say that elected representatives of the people of Carmarthen on Dyfed county council have selected a language policy which they regarded as right for that complex county. It was a different policy in different areas —just as it would have to be in every other county of Wales that has strong Welsh-speaking areas and areas in which Welsh is not the first language. My hon. Friend is trying to impose absolute equality on education, which is totally impractical.

We have accepted that we cannot ask Monmouth district council to do things that Dwyfor district council is doing. We have accepted the complex linguistic pattern of Wales. It is not sensible to talk about a socialist principle to do it that way. It is a very crude argument that my hon. Friend is applying which, in practice, cannot work either in education or in any other aspect of the language. We must temper what we are trying to do with much common sence and an understanding of the linguistic map of Wales.

Mr. Morgan: The House will be pleased to know that I intend to be very brief and that I do not intend to enter the hornets' nest that is raised by new clause 10 which relates to the transverse rights of English-speaking people in Welsh-speaking areas; nor do I intend to try to settle the problems of the Bretons and the Basques in France. I wish briefly to refer to a matter that was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), which was the function or duty that will be given to the Welsh Language Board and how it relates to the duties of the Curriculum Council for Wales, which we will discuss on Monday.

In case the Minister of State has not seen it, I refer to the advertisement for the chief executive for the new Curriculum and Assessment Authority for Wales, although we are encouraged to refer to it by its Welsh acronym of ACAC. The Minister of State has already claimed not to have seen one document. I do not want to embarass him, but I am sure that he reads The Sunday Times and has checked the advertisement that was, I suppose, partially issued in his name, although it has come out through the PA Consulting Group on behalf of the Government to select the new chief executive, on the presumption that the Education Bill will pass through Parliament. The advertisement states that the ACAC

"will be, subject to the passage of the Education Bill through Parliament, the main central agency in Wales for taking forward the National Curriculum".

That is fair enough—there is no problem there. The advertisement then says:

"and developing Welsh language education".

One assumes that it is not simply confined to the teaching of Welsh as a core curriculum subject in Welsh schools; otherwise that is what it would have said.

Presumably, education through the Welsh medium is included. That is confirmed by the Welsh translation of the version where it refers to the duties of the ACAC as "Datblygu Addysg Gymraeg". That takes it into the area of Welsh language education generally, not merely the subject of Welsh as taught in schools—literature and language, as it were. Presumably it will be Welsh language education generally, including Welsh learner courses and, obviously, the way in which the Welsh language is used to teach physics and biology or any other subject that is taught in a school through the Welsh medium.

That raises the question asked earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney: which quango will do that job? Will we be subjected to turf contests between the Welsh Language Board and the Curriculum and Assessment Authority for Wales over who will have the last word on Welsh language education matters, assuming that Welsh language education is not simply confined to the teaching of Welsh as a core curriculum subject?

Before the Education Bill comes back to the House on Monday, we should be clear about questioning whether it will be the Welsh Language Board, because it was not excluded. Indeed, in Committee, the Minister said that the board will be heavily involved in looking after the interests of education through the Welsh medium, but apparently the Curriculum and Assessment Authority for Wales has been given the job. I hope that the Minister, on receipt of the advice that he is always able to get on such matters, will clarify the position before we proceed any further.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The debate has ranged widely and I shall try to be as much to the point as I possibly can. We all agree on the tremendous value of Welsh-medium education and the progress that has been made. What we tend to forget is that that progress has been made under the Education Act 1944. The strength of that Act is that it treats the English and Welsh-medium sectors even-handedly. My concern about new clause 10 is that, as the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) pointed out, it does not deal with the two languages even-handedly.

The Bill is about treating English and Welsh on a basis of equality. I do not believe that we would be treating the English and Welsh-medium sectors of education on the basis of equality if local education authorities were placed under a duty such as that in new clause 10 with regard to Welsh-medium education without there being a comparable duty concerning the provision of English-medium education.

The terms of the 1944 Act are admirably suited to reflect the difficult issues that can surround the most effective delivery of Welsh-medium education alongside the English-medium sector. The 1944 Act does not seek to impose the same pattern of education in all parts of Wales. As I explained in Committee, it requires that, to the extent that it is compatible with efficient instruction and the avoidance of unreasonable expenditure, pupils should be educated in accordance with the wishes of their parents. We propose that that statutory duty will remain unchanged as a result of the Bill. The success of Welsh-medium education in areas such as Mid Glamorgan is an indication that the 1944 Act is admirably suited to governing the conduct of LEAs in this respect.

The change that we propose to introduce is that the Welsh language scheme that LEAs will be required to produce should include their policy on the provision of Welsh-medium education. In preparing their scheme, LEAs and any school funding council that may be established will need to have regard to the guidelines that the board may produce on the subject and consult parents. Our intention is that the changes should ensure that, while recognising that the issue will often involve difficult and sensitive issues, the delivery of Welsh-medium education should be as closely attuned to the reasonable expectation of parents as possible.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) was anxious about the board's role with regard to education. While granting the board a role in education, we are not advocating that it should become responsible for the delivery of Welsh-medium education. That responsibility will remain with LEAs and any school funding council that is established in due course.

Mr. Rowlands rose—

Sir Wyn Roberts: I will spell it out for the hon. Gentleman, but I will give way if he wants me to. The board will have an important role to play alongside the LEA, but will not take the place of the LEA. For example, we do not foresee the board becoming involved in detailed issues concerning the delivery of Welsh-medium education in specific schools. That will be a matter of day-to-day management for LEAs and schools.

The board will simply not be in a position to become involved in such local issues. Its role will be to look at LEA proposals for Welsh-medium education covering the authority as a whole. It is only at that strategic level that sensible decisions can be made about whether the Welsh and English languages are being dealt with on the basis of equality.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister started by telling us that an LEA or school will have to submit to the Welsh Language Board a scheme for the provision of education in the Welsh medium and the board must then approve that scheme.

That will inevitably mean that the board will get involved in the provision of education in a community. The moment the board gets involved, parents who are dissatisfied with the provision of Welsh-medium education will appeal to the board, and the Minister and the board will get dragged into that issue. Whatever the Minister says, the danger of that is considerable, and his explanation does not give me any comfort.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I reiterate that the scheme will not work out as the hon. Gentleman anticipates because the strength of the board is that it will be able to develop a breadth of perspective concerning the position of the Welsh language across all phases of education. That breadth of perspective can only serve to compliment the roles of the bodies that are charged with the delivery of Welsh-medium education.

Mr. Wigley: I listened to the Minister's description of how the board will have only a strategic responsibility for the provision of Welsh-medium education. How, then, will it in practice sort out the kind of problem that has gone on for years in Swansea, where it has been impossible to get Welsh-medium education?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I said that the board would work out with each local education authority, in the light of the guidelines that will be approved by the House, the precise scheme under which Welsh-medium education will be provided. In so far as such schemes will be matters of negotiation, arrangement and agreement between the board and the LEA, I can certainly foresee benefits emerging.

One must also remember that these schemes will be the result of consultation. We shall accept a Labour-inspired amendment later which provides for extensive consultation. It will affect non-Welsh-speaking as well as Welsh-speaking parents. We are looking to the board to achieve a beneficial influence in the local authority context to which the hon. Gentleman refers. The board has not simply a strategic role, but real strength, power and influence.

Without, therefore, interfering with local decision making in any way, the board will have an important role to play in education. It will be important that the board exercises that role with considerable sensitivity. In recognising the importance of the issue, I am confident that that is what the board will do.

9 pm

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) referred to the advertisement in The Sunday Times for a chief executive for the Curriculum and Assessment Authority for Wales. The role of that authority, which we shall discuss further, is to develop the curriculum and carry out assessment in Wales. The authority will certainly have a role in developing Welsh as a subject in the national curriculum, both as a first and as a second language. It will have a role also in relation to assessment in Welsh and other subjects. It will also be responsible for the provision of teaching materials for use in Welsh schools. We may well have an opportunity of returning to the detailed provisions, powers and responsibilities of the authority.

Mr. Morgan: The exact phrase used in the advertisement is "the development of Welsh language education".

The Minister may be telling the House that the advertisement is inaccurate and that PA Consulting Group should be given a rap over the knuckles for perhaps misunderstanding its instructions.

Surely "Welsh language education" would be construed by most people as going much further than simply Welsh as a curriculum subject, whether first or second language and whether curriculum or assessment. To most people "Welsh language education" would include education through the medium of Welsh, would it not?

Sir Wyn Roberts: Yes and, arguably, "Welsh language education" would extend right through further education into higher education, as the hon. Gentleman suggested earlier. We must remember that the hon. Gentleman is referring to an advertisement for a particular post. Those who may be suitable to respond to that advertisement will know the proximate role of ACAC.

It will be for ACAC, the Welsh Language Board, the LEAs and all others concerned with education in Wales to work out their relationships. Certainly the authority will be expected to produce a scheme in much the same way as any other non-departmental public body will be expected to produce a scheme in Wales.

Mr. Wigley: I have listened carefully to the Minister, but I am far from convinced that the provisions of the Bill will answer the weakness of the Education Act 1944, on which he based so much of his argument.

In numerous places in Wales—although not a majority—it is impossible to get education through the medium of Welsh within a reasonable distance. There has not been a positive drive to do that. If the board succeeds in getting guidelines that meet that requirement, and thence local strategies, and can persuade people of the need, that is fine, but we know that if the Government resist the new clause—as they seem to do—there will be no statutory rights. Everything depends on good will, which may turn to ill will, as the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said, and all sorts of in-fighting may result.

I hope to goodness that the provision of educational schemes in the Bill achieves what the Minister wants, but I have reservations, because, as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said, unless one has rights that create duties, there is no certainty that that will happen and no way of ensuring that it does.

I shall respond briefly to the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams). Our objective in wanting Welsh-medium education to work thoroughly and to maintain the natural schools that provide Welsh in Gwynedd and Dyfed and parts of other counties is to create an integrated community; a community that is not divided by language, and where young people can speak both languages and, therefore, can apply for any job and take part fully in that community.

I am not persuaded by the hon. Member for Carmarthen that he is campaigning to ensure that the non-Welsh-speaking children in non-Welsh-speaking homes have the access to the language that gives them the opportunity to play a full part in the community in which they are brought up. There is a danger of producing an apartheid approach; of creating two societies growing up side by side, and never the twain shall meet. At one time, there was a fear of that in the south Wales valleys, but it has not turned out to be justified.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wigley: No. I am bringing the debate to an end.

That apartheid approach is a recipe for disaster, which is why I am so encouraged that few members of the Labour party go down that road.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 11

OBJECTIVE AND FUNCTIONS OF THE BOARD

'.(1) The Board shall have the objective of maintaining and expanding the use of the Welsh language.

(2) The Board shall—

(a) advise the Secretary of State on matters concerning the Welsh language;

(b) promote and facilitate the use of the Welsh language in public business;

(c) advise persons exercising functions of a public nature in Wales on

(i) the use of the Welsh language in their dealings with the public; and

(ii) how they may best give effect to the principle that in the conduct of public business and the administration of justice, the status of the Welsh language shall not be less than that of the English language; and

(d) advise other persons on the voluntary use of the Welsh language in their dealings with the public.

(3) Subject to the following provisio. ., the Board may do anything which is incidental or conducive to the performance of its functions, and may in particular—

(a) make grants and loans and give guarantees;

(b) make charges for the provision of advice or other services;

(c) accept gifts of money or other property.

(4) The Board shall not—

(a) make a grant or loan,

(b) give a guarantee, or

(c) acquire or dispose of any interest in land, except with the approval of the Secretary of State given with the consent of the Treasury.'.—[Mr. Morgan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 23, in page 1, clause 3, leave out from beginning of line 17 to end of line 24 on page 2.

No. 18, in page 2, line 18, at end insert—

'(d) formulate and publish from time to time guidelines and codes of good practice as to the use of Welsh in commerce and other fields of activity as it may think fit;

(e) provide translation and interpretation services for Government departments, public bodies or other persons and organisations;

(f) commission and carry out research relating to the Welsh language and publish information obtained thereby;

(g) advertise and otherwise promote its activities.'.

Mr. Morgan: This is an attempt by our team of parliamentary draftsmen to redraft new clause 3 completely and replace it with a fallback position. We half anticipated that the Government would not make any concessions or movement towards us on the issue of official status in new clause 1. We thought that if that were to happen, the only way to put some meat on the somewhat threadbare—to mix my metaphors—structure of the Bill would be to insert a set of goals and objectives for the board by completely taking out the existing clause 3 and replacing it. We have retained some of the powers to give grants and so on that were in the original clause 3, but have said what the board is supposed to do.

The Bill will succeed or fail on the basis of the Minister of State's answer when he is asked, when eventually he gives up the reins of office, "What did you do for the Welsh language, Daddy?" As he may already be a granddaddy, he will probably be a great-granddaddy by then. He will say, "I set up a quango for it". We want him also to be able to say what the quango was supposed to do. That is not clear from the Bill because the quango is not given any objectives. It is given a function, but it cannot test that function against an overall objective.

Our new clause states that

"the Board shall have the objective of maintaining and expanding the use of the Welsh language."

We want the Welsh language to remain a common language of fluent use in the countryside and in some of the few remaining industrial areas of Wales—in the anthracite coalfields, the tin plate areas of west Wales, the former slate quarrying areas of north-west Wales, and so on—where it may not be much of a written language.

We also wanted to expand the use of the Welsh language by adding written fluency as well as public and private sector use of the language. Clearly, in the spirit of the Bill, private sector use would have to be voluntary.

I mention that because page 50, paragraph 4.47, of the White Paper on public expenditure, command 2215, boasts about the constructive activities of the Welsh Language Board and says:

"It has achieved significant progress in a number of areas including the "Iaith Gwaith" (Working Welsh) scheme which encourages the use of Welsh in the workplace and the "CYSILL" Welsh-language computer spellcheck project."

Both those projects—mainly the first but to an extent the second—are of enormous interest to the private sector. But as the Bill makes no mention of the private sector we have added a reference to it and said that it should be able voluntarily to be included. The Welsh Language Board would therefore not be acting outside its statutory powers by getting involved with the private sector. Although there would be no compulsion on the private sector, the board would have every encouragement to spend its resources on schemes in the spirit of the "Iaith Gwaith" and "CYSILL" projects, about which the Government thought it worth while to boast in their most recent reference to why they were spending money on the Welsh Language Board while it remains non-statutory.

New clause 11 is infinitely superior to clause 3 because it gives an objective and a statutory basis to activities involving the private sector.

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) for introducing the new clause because it does at least endeavour to establish objectives for the language board.

I started out as a fan of the Bill, but, as the Report stage has proceeded, I have grown increasingly disillusioned by it. One of the reasons why disillusionment has crept in is that the Bill asks for a legislative blank cheque, which I have grave doubts about whether we should grant. For example, the Bill empowers public bodies to form schemes, but we have no idea of the character of those schemes. The Bill contains no illustrative ideas or draft models of the schemes. The schemes have no boundaries or content and we do not know the principles on which they are to be based. They must follow guidelines, but we have no idea what the parameters of the guidelines will be because they are not defined in the Bill.

The Bill also establishes a board, but we do not know how much it will cost because Ministers have refused to give even an estimate. Thus the Bill will establish a board costing an unknown sum annually to draft guidelines to be followed by public bodies drawing up schemes. But we know the shape and size of neither the guidelines nor the schemes. All that we know about the board is that 15 persons will sit on it.

It is time that the Minister gave us a clearer indication of the nature of those schemes and guidelines. Exactly what will the board propose? Until the Committee stage, I thought that I knew what the board was supposed to do because the invaluable document, "Guidelines to the Public Sector", gives an idea of the character of the present language board's activities. Based on the sensible, well-balanced view about the role and future role of the language and its promotion, I thought that I could support that excellent idea. We do not know if that is the sort of objective of the new statutory language board. We discover more and more that it will wander into all sorts of areas of activity that, in my opinion, will cause the board a lot of problems and will create a great deal of tension around its work.

9.15 pm

As my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West rightly said that we must better define the board's objectives, I shall ask the Minister two or three simple questions and this time hope for answers. What will be the likely average annual cost of the board? I asked him that question over and over again in Committee. If he cannot give us an estimate, will he tell us what estimate the present Welsh Language Board has given him? I understand that it has estimated the costs and has presented them to him. We are entitled to know what the Welsh Language Board, as the most authoritative institution on that matter, has estimated. Will the Minister give us that figure?

We are told that the Welsh Language Board will take over the responsibility for allocating some of the available grants, as set out under clause 3. Will the Minister specifically confirm that, under the provisions of clause 3, power to allocate grants will be given to the Welsh Language Board? As I understand it, most of the grants that we call section 26 money under the Development Board for Rural Wales Act 1991 and the bodies that receive them are listed on page 49 of the White Paper on Government expenditure. In total, £2·7 million of grants are listed which are given to a variety of bodies and organisations. Is the intention that the decision on who should receive those grants listed and their disbursement will be transferred to the Welsh Language Board? What percentage of the money that goes to the Welsh Books Council, for example, will be handled by the Welsh Language Board? Will the board be able to make such decisions?

The allocation of grants is an important function. Are we to transfer what is currently a Welsh Office responsibility lock, stock and barrel? If we are not, which grants that are currently paid under section 26 are to be administered and disbursed by the Welsh Language Board, which will therefore have the discretion to change and move such disbursements? Those are vital questions about the nature and functions of the Welsh Language Board. We were not given any answers in Committee and we deserve them now. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West has done a great service in trying to force the Minister to provide a better clarification of the character, nature and scope of the board.

Sir Wyn Roberts: New clause 11 largely replicates the terms of new clause 3. There are some significant differences that cause me concern, especially the recasting of the board's main duty. The alternative duties contained in the new clause serve to confuse what we intend the board to do and what we hope will happen to the Welsh language as a result.

The board's function of promoting and facilitating the use of Welsh has been deliberately cast in the most flexible terms possible. There is no restriction on the board's function, so that seems to be a fair description of the contribution that we can fairly expect it to make. It does nothing to clarify the board's legal duties to confuse it with matters that are ultimately outside its control.

We may all agree that one of the board's objectives is to maintain and expand the use of the Welsh language. That is not something that we can sensibly reflect on the face of the Bill. We shall, of course, want to agree objectives for the board and those will be matters to be discussed in the context of the board's corporate plan. We shall also need to be able to monitor whether the objectives have been achieved over a reasonable period. The outstanding characteristic of the objective proposed in the new clause is that it could be monitored only over a very long period. It would, therefore, be of little use in holding the board to account for its actions. The new clause does nothing to clarify the board's main duties and powers. It serves rather to confuse the board's actions with what we might hope would be the outcome of those actions.

As I made clear in Committee, I am pleased to be able to agree that each of the elements referred to in amendment No. 18 is an activity with which the board should have the power to become involved, although we see the board's role in translation and interpretation as that of an enabler and facilitator, rather than as a provider. The amendment could introduce legal uncertainty about whether the board had the power to undertake other promotional activities that are not specifically listed in clause 3(3). Keeping the list in the clause as short as possible ensures that whatever uncertainty may arise on that point is kept to an absolute minimum, thus allowing the board maximum flexibility.

To further that flexibility, clause 3 is deliberately restricted to listing the board's main promotional and advisory functions. That will ensure that there will be no legislative obstacles to the board's promoting the language whenever or wherever it is spoken. That reflects the arm's length nature that we intend should be a feature of the relationship between the board and the Government.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) asked me some specific questions. I understand that the board's estimate has been submitted to my officials. Of course, we have to study those estimates and the eventual allocation to the board will be our decision. It is too early in the day for me to give any further information on that point.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister has an estimate. I do not seek to tie him down, because I know that the decision is for him, his Department and the Government, but will he tell us what it is?

Sir Wyn Roberts: The board has submitted an estimate. That estimate is subject to discussion between the Welsh Office and the board. We shall have to go over it. We have not agreed it as an accepted estimate.

Mr. Rowlands: What is the estimate?

Sir Wyn Roberts: It would not be proper for me at this stage——

Mr. Rowlands: What is the estimate?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that seated interventions of that kind are to be deplored, however anxious he is for an answer.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Rowlands: Why is the Minister so coy? Before we approve the Bill which will establish the board, we are entitled at least to know what is the estimate of the present Welsh Language Board. Will the Minister just tell us? We are not tying the Government to a figure. Will the Minister please tell us what the board's estimate of the cost is?

Sir Wyn Roberts: It would be misleading for me to give a figure to the House because it might raise or decrease expectations. It would be misleading because the estimate that is under discussion may bear no relationship to the eventual allocation made. I cannot go further than that at this stage.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked me about responsibility for grants. The board will inherit from the Welsh Office some of the responsibility for making grants in support of the Welsh language under section 26 of the Development Board for Rural Wales Act 1991. It is envisaged that that will be a gradual inheritance to facilitate the smooth transfer to the Welsh Language Board of that important function. It is important that the Welsh Language Board learns to walk before it can run. With that in mind, the Welsh Office will for some time retain responsibility for the larger grants, including the Welsh Books Council, the National Eisteddfod, the Urdd and the Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin.

The amount of money available to assist Welsh language initiatives during this year was £2·8 million, of which £2·2 million was allocated to the larger organisations. That leaves £600,000 to be distributed among the smaller grant recipients for which the board will be in future responsible.

Mr. Morgan: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 5

DUTY OF NOTIFIED PUBLIC BODIES TO PREPARE SCHEMES

Mr. Rowlands: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 2, line 45, at end insert—

'(2B) The scheme referred to in subsection (1) above shall not include measures in connection with the broadcast programmes or scheduling policy of the British Broadcasting Corporation in Wales.'.

The amendment relates to a specific piece of information of which I was not aware in Committee—an interesting document that gives the response by the Welsh Language Board to the consultation document "The Future of the BBC" that was published by the Department of National Heritage in November 1992.

In the submission by the Welsh Language Board, there are two statements which worried me. I have been consistently concerned about the degree to which the Welsh Language Board will interfere in issues for which other organisations and bodies are statutorily responsible. Those organisations may have their own accounting procedures and degree of accountability.

Paragraph 3.1 of the document says:

"clearly the Welsh Language Board would see as one of its main responsibilities that the television service broadcast by S4C is properly protected from commercial and political pressures since it plays a vital part in both the strategic development and the promotion of language."

Under what power is the Welsh Language Board seeking to intervene in an organisation that was set down in the House in statute with its own board and its own systems of accountability that go through to Ministers and to the House? What will be the function of the Welsh Language Board in that regard? Is that an agreed objective of the board and, dare I ask after today's discussions, has the Minister seen the document? If so, does he agree that that is a proper function in which the Welsh Language Board should get involved? That was in relation to S4C.

Paragraph 3.5 contains a statement with regard to BBC Wales:

"The Welsh Language Board is mindful of the danger of creating a ghetto for Welsh language broadcasting which would negate the aim of creating a bilingual society in Wales. It is for this reason that the Welsh Language Board considers the totality of the BBC's programme services in Wales are its concerns, de facto and its Welsh language is its concern de jure."

What are we to make of that? The programming of BBC Wales, in both Welsh and English, is governed by its charter and its statutory responsibilities. It has its own advisory BBC council and, through that, its own chain of command and accountability through the procedures and structures laid down by the BBC. How will the Welsh Language Board establish both de facto and de jure responsibility and supervision over BBC Wales programming?

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I have seen that document and it worries me. The hon. Gentleman will have seen within the document that the view expressed by the Welsh Language Board is that the functions of the controller of BBC Wales may be changed also. He will have seen paragraph 4.5, which says:

"The Welsh Language Board expects the future pattern of the BBC's services in Wales through the medium of the Welsh language to be incorporated in the scheme which the BBC as a public body will be required to submit to a new statutory Welsh Language Board under the terms of the Welsh Language Bill."

I have read the Bill and I do not think that the BBC is one of the organisations covered by it. In the circumstances, what observations would the hon. Gentleman like to make about that?

9.30 pm

Mr. Rowlands: I had not yet reached the paragraph in question—I was working my way down—but as the hon. Gentleman has drawn the attention of the House to it, I should point out that it is an extremely sweeping and rather frightening statement.

Systems of control are laid down by charter, but this is an example of the WLB gaining the capacity to interfere with the fundamental responsibilities of an organisation established, in the case of the BBC by charter, and in the case of S4C by statute. The hon. Gentleman has therefore raised an important point.

As for how the BBC will get caught up by the scheme-making powers, I assume that clause 6(1)(o) means that the Secretary of State will announce that the BBC and S4C will be expected to produce relevant schemes. If so, such schemes should certainly not involve the pattern of BBC services. That pattern and accountability for it are laid down by charter, with a clear chain of command and responsibility. We have a BBC governing body in Wales and a BBC advisory board, so how in the name of heaven does the Welsh Language Board have a right to crawl over and scrutinise the BBC's services in Wales?

I hope that the Minister will not answer me with weasel words and that he will give me an unequivocal statement to the effect that he will not endorse the right of the WLB to get involved in matters that are properly covered elsewhere by charter and in statute. I am afraid that this is another example of the WLB becoming improperly involved in issues of public life in Wales which are already provided for in other ways.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's views. The views expressed by the Welsh Language Board in response to the Green Paper were those of the non-statutory board. Knowing the hon. Gentleman to be a reasonable man, I suggest that he has not, perhaps, paid enough attention to the requirement that the guidelines from which the schemes will result must be approved by the Secretary of State and must come before Parliament, when we are likely to have another opportunity of discussing the principles involved.

Of course, we would not expect the board to become involved in the detail of the BBC's scheduling policies. Including the BBC in the list of public bodies that may be required to produce schemes does not mean that the board will assume responsibility for the place of the Welsh language in the broadcasting system of Wales. The BBC's policies will remain a matter for it, determined under its charter and, after 1996, under its new charter. The board will not be able to interfere with the terms of the BBC's charter; nor will it be for the board to interfere with the BBC's obligation to provide 10 hours of programmes every week to S4C. The BBC does, however, fall into the class of bodies from which the board may require a scheme that illustrates how, in the context of its entire output, it gives effect to the principle of English and Welsh being dealt with on a basis of equality, when that is appropriate in the circumstances and reasonably practicable. In proposing its scheme, the BBC will be able to reflect the complex nature of its responsibilities in Wales, which include its separate radio networks and television broadcast in English and Welsh.

Despite the importance and sensitivity of broadcasting, I am not persuaded that we would be justified in ruling out at this stage that the board should be excluded from that sector, but the detail of broadcasting policy will remain a matter for the BBC. It is worth underlining that it would not be the role of the board to express a view on any editorial matters. Schemes will be solely concerned with the principle of English and Welsh being dealt with on a basis of equality. To deny the board any role in that sector would be to deny the importance of broadcasting in the Government's overall policy of support for the language.

I suspect that we are all agreed on the influence that broadcasting, and television broadcasting in particular, has on any language, be it Welsh or English. Therefore, it seems only sensible that broadcasting should be included within the board's remit. I am confident that it is a task that the board will discharge effectively, and in a way that builds on the excellent contribution that Welsh language broadcasting already makes to the well-being of the Welsh language.

In that sector, as in so many others, the board will have to be sensitive and have regard and respect also for the other contractual or statutory obligations that apply to those bodies with whom it deals.

Mr. Rowlands: I listened with great care and interest to the Minister's considered statement. I hope that the new Welsh Language Board will hear the message that we want to send out from the House, that if it treads in those sectors, it should do so warily.

As we shall have the chance to consider the guidelines when they emerge, it must be made clear to the board that such guidelines should avoid the worries and concerns that I have expressed, which arise from the language used in the consultation document or in the submission by the old Welsh Language Board. If it heeds that lesson, I hope that such a problem will not occur. However, we should give the new Welsh Language Board more than a gentle warning that if it intrudes into issues of the kind that we have raised—the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) shares my queasiness—a big row will ensue. I hope that the new board will heed that message. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

9.38 pm

Mr. Wigley: It is with considerable regret that I rise to explain why my hon. Friends and I will vote against Third Reading of a Bill for which we have campaigned for so long—the best part of 10 years—and in such depth. The objectives of the Bill, as we have understood them, were to create a new framework of hope for the Welsh language and to provide mechanisms that would ensure that the difficulties that have been experienced in recent years would be overcome. We are unhappy about six parts of the Bill because of the way in which the Government have failed to deal with the issues in the House of Lords, in Committee and again on Report.

The first and overwhelming problem was the subject of an earlier debate—official status. There has been pressure from all directions on the Government on that. There is no doubt about the will of Wales. The chairman of the Welsh Language Board—a Government appointee, on whose work the Bill is based, and whose period of office is coming to an end—said in a letter to us about official status for the Welsh language:

"We believe that this should be stated in totally specific terms in the Bill. If it is not included, the debate will continue in Wales, quite rightly, about the failure of the Government to act on this matter—and that debate would be totally understandable—and this would devalue everything else which otherwise would be possible under this legislation. This can only mean that the Welsh Language Board will be under a disadvantage from the very start."

I pay tribute to the Welsh Language Board—to John Elfed Jones, to Winston Roddick for the work that he has done on the legal side, and to the chief officer, John Walter Jones, for his work. The Bill has let them down and I feel sorry for them. The central question of status, on which the Archbishop of Wales wrote to the Secretary of State only a few days ago, requesting a Government rethink, has not been dealt with.

There is then the issue of rights, and particularly rights to education, another subject on which we touched. The Bill has not provided rights for anyone other than the Secretary of State and the Government. There are no additional rights for Welsh speakers. The Bill has not given statutory rights on which people can base a claim to use the Welsh language. That is a major weakness in the Bill.

We have already had a debate on juries and the need for juries that understand what is transacted and spoken in courts. We have debated race relations and we exposed the way in which the Government have not tackled that problem. After two years of discussion between the Welsh Language Board and the Commission for Racial Equality, the Government have not been able to introduce the change in legislation that both those bodies, and the people of Wales, want.

A matter that we discussed in Committee and that was debated at length in the other place was that part of the private sector which provides public services, including telephone, water and electricity services. We expected that those essential services would be included in the Bill, but they are not. There is no guarantee that information on the forms will be in Welsh. There are schemes and a bureaucratic mechanism that can go on and on, but that lack of a guarantee in the Bill is a missed opportunity.

I would rather that we came back with a Bill in another form in the next parliamentary year than put on the statute book now something that we shall no doubt be told has to last for another 25 years, with all those central weaknesses. The Welsh Language Board will find it immensely difficult to do its work when it is not underpinned by any principle, any right, any guarantees. There is a vacuum at the centre of the Bill where they should be.

I feel sorry for the Minister because he has undertaken a great amount of work on the Bill.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The hon. Gentleman should not feel sorry for me. I am the one who is sorry to hear him say what he proposes to do. Does he not realise that the Bill is an enormous advance for Welsh-speaking people and that he is risking that benefit to them by voting the way in which he intends to?

Mr. Wigley: I note the right hon. Gentleman's anger and I understand it. He has put an enormous amount of emotional commitment into the Bill and has tried to get a consensus. No doubt a consensus could have been reached, but he is a captive member of a Government that have little knowledge of what is going on in Wales and he has been unable to get his own way on matters such as status, on which he had based so much of his own hopes. Had he succeeded there, he could have got the unanimity that I think was available in Wales to support the consensus across party lines.

We made it clear at the start that we were looking for basic things to be added to the Bill as it went through Parliament—the sort of things that the Minister promised to the Welsh Language Board in December when its members were on the point of resigning because the Bill was so weak. These things were not forthcoming, in the House of Lords or in the House of Commons.

Then we had the Bill in Committee—a Committee packed with nine Tory Members from English constituencies to make sure that they got the majority in everything. The 70-odd amendments and the 20 or 30 new clauses that were put forward were just steam-rollered out of existence, with not an inch being given on any of them.

I do not hold this against the right hon. Member for Conwy, no matter how angry he may be with me, but there is sadness about the opportunity that has been lost. I do not know whether, by doing anything else, he could have persuaded the Government to do the things that the people of Wales want. All that we know now is that the Bill is woefully inadequate to do the job that was wanted by both the right hon. Gentleman and the Welsh Language Board. We are not getting it.

It is a sad night and, yes, I do feel angry about it. Not against the Minister of State—we have to know who our enemies are when it comes to the language—but against the system that tells Wales, despite the feelings of the overwhelming majority of Welsh Members on this issue, that we must have what a Conservative Government give us.

If ever there was an argument for us to have our own parliament, to make our own laws on matters relevant to our own country, this is it. If the Government think that this is the end of the story, my goodness it is not; this is the beginning of the story and the beginning of a campaign. On the way that we have been treated over this Bill, we will build the movement until we get our own government and our own parliament to pass our own laws in these matters.

9.47 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile: It is very difficult to follow so powerful and heartfelt a speech as we have just heard from the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). I agree with much of what he said on all the issues that he mentioned, apart from the matter of juries, on which I spoke earlier.

The Government will have their majority tonight, as the Minister of State knows; the Government will have their Bill. There is no risk to the Bill caused by those who protest against the Government's views by voting against it tonight, as I shall.

We see that a statutory Welsh Language Board is to be set up as a result of the Bill, and that really is the end product. I join the hon. Member for Caernarfon in praising the non-statutory Welsh Language Board, which has been remarkable, has covered a period of years and has devoted a great deal of thought to the issue and done much to benefit the language.

I offer all good wishes to the statutory Welsh Language Board, but I think, like the hon. Member for Caernarfon, that it will find itself frustrated by the limits within which it operates. It runs the risk, at least, of being not a great deal more than a paper tiger. I hope that it will express its views so strongly that they can rarely be ignored, particularly by many of the public bodies in Wales which in years gone by have shown a good deal of resistance to the march of the Welsh language, which most of us, including the Minister of State, welcome.

In my view, the real deficiency of the Bill is that, after all the years of discussion upon it, all the efforts of the Welsh Language Board, the debates here and in the other place, and the lengthy and detailed debates in Committee, not one citizen of Wales will have a single right that he or she can enforce by judicial review through the court, or by any other means. Not one organisation in Wales, apart from the statutory Welsh Language Board, will have a duty which the citizen can enforce against it.

That is a profound disappointment. It is a sufficient disappointment for me to advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to join the Members representing Plaid Cymru in the No Lobby a little later tonight.

9.49 pm

Mr. Flynn: For a brief period in 1988 I was my party's Front-Bench spokesman on Wales and the first subject that I raised was the need for a Welsh language Bill. Never did I foresee that, some years later, I would find myself having to vote against such a Bill. The former arch druid said that half a loaf is better than no loaf at all. Sadly, he overstated it. What we have left tonight is not half a loaf, but a few crumbs that have been given to us by our colonial masters.

In Committee, we had many hopes of what would come from the Bill, but every one of those hopes has been trampled on—not by our elected Members from Wales, where there has been an extraordinary unanimity, from the almost totally English part of Wales—where the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) has adopted a reasonable attitude to the Bill and defended his own position—to the almost totally Welsh language-speaking parts of Wales. The unanimity has been there.

When there was a vote as to whether Welsh-speaking defendants should have the right to elect juries that spoke their own language, that right was denied. That was a remarkable result. It is a basic right that exists in almost every corner of the world. By whom was it denied? By the hon. Members for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning), for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant), for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) and for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). Those are the people who have trampled on the Bill.

The Minister has a proud record and we all pay tribute to him. He is now in his 15th year of ministerial office and he has made great contributions to the Welsh language. He has been a great servant of Wales and we have all been generous in our contributions. That is why we feel angry tonight: he has turned down reasonable Opposition propositions.

The language raises strong passions in all of us, as it should. It is the most ancient language in Europe—a language that was spoken here in London many years before Anglo-Saxon, the mother language of English, appeared in these islands. It is a language that had rich literature and sophisticated poetry 2,000 years ago. That language has not been helped one jot tonight.

What we have heard all the time is "it may", "perhaps" and "there will be schemes". When the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) rightly argued tonight for the Minister to lose a bit of face and agree one minor amendment—which he could correct later, if he wanted to, in the other place—he trampled on that amendment.

What the Government have done tonight has inspired new nationalism in Wales. They have shown the people of Wales that we are a subject race. We are being abused by people who cannot be elected in Wales; who have been rejected time and again by the electorate of Wales. Tonight we have seen the arrogance of an elective dictatorship.

9.52 pm

Mr. Morgan: The problem with the Bill is that it suffers from the Secretary of State's St. Mellons syndrome: he visits a community and pretends to take a great deal of interest in the subject under discussion, but a week later he drops a large amount of organic mushroom fertiliser on it from a very great height.

The right hon. Gentleman has not fought the battles that he should have fought in the Cabinet. He and the Minister of State have visited the subject of the Welsh language, but when anything important arose he resisted the changes that were proposed and the compromises that were offered by the Opposition. There has been no give and take and he has not done his duty.

As for the St. Mellons syndrome, the Secretary of State should perhaps consider the Welsh language to be a single-parent language, and that duties of paternity have fallen upon him—which, in a way, he asked for by accepting promotion to the Cabinet. He has taken responsibility tonight for the state of the legislation, but he has not carried out his paternal duties and has left Welsh as a single-parent language, without the support that it should have had. The Bill should have done the job properly on the privatised public utilities, on jury trials in Welsh and, above all, on the question of official status.

That is why we feel that the Secretary of State has shown that he intends to use Wales simply as a political platform for his own long-term ambitions on the right wing of the Tory party. He has not repaid to Wales the debt he owes it by the fact that it has provided him with his first promotion to Cabinet status. That is why he has not done his job in the way that he could have done. He has not taken the opportunities that were available to him. So we have not received the equality of treatment that we might have expected had there been give and take on the part of the Government.

The right hon. Gentleman said that there had been some Government amendments. In the main, they have filled obvious omissions in the companies and charities legislation, not matters brought to his attention by the Opposition as concessions to be made. They were simply matters about which he had erred by not listening to the advice of specialist bodies. He has made some minor concessions to the Opposition, but one requires a microscope manufactured in a Welsh Development Agency Japanese factory in the valleys to see them. That is why we feel badly let down.

We on the Labour Front Bench are not recommending a vote against the Bill. We shall be abstaining tonight because we hope to have the opportunity before long to do the job properly. That will be done when we revisit the question of a Welsh language measure, when we are in government.

9.57 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. John Redwood): What pathetic heroic indecision on the part of the Labour party. Here was an opportunity for them to vote for a measure that will further the interests of Welsh language speakers and will be good news for the Welsh language. Yet there they sit on the Labour Benches—all four or so of them—not knowing what to do, gripped by indecision and quite unable to reach a conclusion.

I pay tribute to the work of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State. He has worked tirelessly and well in the interests of the Welsh language and has brought good measures to the House—[Interruption.] I assure the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) that my right hon. Friend and I are entirely at one on this issue. We believe that it is the right Bill for the right circumstances and I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman intends to vote against it. How extraordinary for him to be voting against a positive and practical measure for the Welsh language. He will be voting against the interests of the people of Wales.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon said that there were no rights and opportunities in the measure. It contains numerous opportunities. It gives people the opportunity and right to enjoy the benefits of the schemes that will come forward under the legislation. Is the hon. Gentleman really saying that he and his party wish to undermine the consensus that was being built patiently by many men and women of good will to further the interests of the Welsh language and the Welsh culture?

The hon. Member for Caernarfon must tonight answer the difficult questions. Why is he rupturing the consensus, turning down the olive branches offered by my right hon. Friend and throwing back into my right hon. Friend's face the hard work he has done and the good wishes he has put forward in the Bill for the Welsh language? That is what the Welsh people will want to know and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will realise what a mistake he is making tonight.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) suggested that the board will be a paper tiger. It will not and the board will resent his comment. It will do its job well and with distinction and it will get every encouragement from us.

I hope that when tempers have cooled a little after tonight's debate, the Opposition parties will think again and realise that there is something to be said for the Bill and that rebuilding the consensus is the way forward for the Welsh language.

It is important for Opposition Members to understand the feelings of the many people in Wales who do not speak Welsh, just as surely as it is important for them to understand the feelings of those who speak Welsh, and it is understandable that they should wish to look after their interests.

The Bill represents good progress. The Government have listened and have made 21 amendments. We have made a number of improvements to the Bill as a result of the work of the Committee and my right hon. Friend spelt those out in great detail. He also answered patiently all the points made, so I have no hesitation in recommending the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Appropriation (Northern Ireland)

10.11 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Sir John Wheeler): I beg to move,

That the draft Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order 1993, which was laid before this House on 7th June, be approved.

The draft order, which covers the main estimates for Northern Ireland departments, authorises expenditure of £3,116 million for the current financial year. Taken together with the sum voted on account in February, that brings total estimates provision for Northern Ireland departments to £5,492 million, an increase of 9·6 per cent. on 1992-93 provisional outturn.

It is customary on such occasions to highlight the main items in the estimates, but I shall be very brief, and shall not comment on each vote. I draw the attention of the House to the Department of Economic Development's vote 1, in which £148 million is for the Industrial Development Board. That will enable the board to carry out its role of strengthening Northern Ireland's industrial base and to meet its existing commitments, primarily in the area of selective assistance to industry.

In vote 2, £37 million is for the Local Enterprise Development Unit, Northern Ireland's small business agency. That will allow the agency to maintain and build on the success that it achieved during 1992-93, which was one of its most successful years.

In vote 3, £193 million is for the Training and Employment Agency. That includes £47 million for the youth training programme, to support some 12,500 training places, and £52 million for the action for community employment programme, to provide 9,500 places for long-term unemployed adults in projects of community benefit. A further £21 million is for the job training programme, which offers training and work experience to unemployed adults, and £12 million is for the company development programme, which will increase to 300 the number of companies assisted to improve their competitiveness in external markets.

Token provision of £1,000 has been included in vote 4 to cover expenses to be incurred in the privatisation of the Northern Ireland electricity supply industry. A supplementary estimate covering the actual expenses and proceeds from the sale will be presented to the House later in the year.

I now turn to the Department of the Environment. In vote 1, £176 million is for roads, transport and ports. This includes some £144 million for the roads service. Department of the Environment vote 2 covers the important area of housing. Some £193 million will provide assistance mainly to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and to the voluntary housing movement. When net borrowing and the Housing Executive's rents and capital receipts are taken into account, the resources available for housing will be some £552 million. This is an increase of some £2 million over 1992-93. This substantial sum will support the continued improvement of housing conditions.

Department of the Environment vote 3 covers expenditure on the water and sewerage schemes. Gross expenditure in 1993-94 is estimated at £174 million, an increase of some £27 million over 1992-93 outturn. Also, £77 million is for capital expenditure and £97 million for operational and maintenance purposes. I will not comment further on the Department of the Environment votes.

The estimates for the Department of Education seek a total of £1,253 million, an increase of 2·5 per cent. over last year. Vote 1 includes £772 million for recurrent expenditure by education and library boards, an increase of £23 million over 1992-93. This includes £407 million for school teachers' salaries, which is sufficient to maintain the pupil-teacher ratio at present levels. Also included is £250 million for other expenditure on schools and on further education services and £115 million for libraries, youth, transport and administration.

Vote 1 also includes £39 million for boards' capital projects, including provision for new laboratories and technology workshops to enable further progress to be made on education reforms. In addition, £8 million is for integrated schools, and £129 million for voluntary schools.

The next set of votes relates to the Department of Health and Social Services. Total net provision of £1,209 million in votes 1 and 3 will maintain and improve the standard of the Province's health and personal social services. This is an increase of £74 million over estimated outturn for 1992-93.

Also, £1,127 million in vote 4 is for a large range of social security benefits administered by the Social Security Agency. This represents an increase of more than 6 per cent. on last year.

Finally, I turn to the Department of Finance and Personnel. In vote 3, over £4 million is for the community relations programme, reflecting the importance that the Government continue to attach to community relations.

In my opening remarks, I have briefly drawn attention to some of the main provisions of the estimates. In replying to the debate, the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), will respond to points raised by right hon. and hon. Members. I commend the order to the House.

10.18 pm

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I welcome the Minister of State, Northern ireland Office, the right hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), to the Dispatch Box. When Members of Parliament are appointed as Ministers to the Northern Ireland Office and when hon. Members are appointed as shadow Northern Ireland Ministers, some of our friends tend to think that we are between a rock and a hard place. In some cases, that is probably true. However, the more that the right hon. Gentleman settles into his brief, the more he will find that the majority of people in Northern Ireland are honest, decent, law-abiding citizens who want nothing more than to live in peace with each other. I wish the Minister well in his difficult brief.

We again refer to the Government's allocation of resources among spending Departments within Northern Ireland. As on former occasions, this debate should have been a welcome opportunity for hon. Members to express their concerns about a wide range of problems affecting Northern Ireland. Because of the hour—I do not blame our Welsh colleagues for their deliberations—we are limited once again to a very short debate. However, I am given to understand that the usual channels have agreed that we can return to the subject for a much longer period when the House reconvenes in the autumn. Therefore, I hope that hon. Members from Northern Ireland will forgive me for delivering my prepared speech.

In spite of what the Minister has told us about the amount of money that the Government are allocating to Northern Ireland, unlike what happened on former occasions, tonight's proceedings take place with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury waiting in the wings before taking centre stage and delivering a series of swingeing cuts. It seems that the Government expect the most vulnerable people in Northern Ireland and in the rest of the United Kingdom to foot the bill for their financial ineptitude. Sadly, the Government's incompetence is starkly evidenced by the overall rate of unemployment in Northern Ireland, which is still the highest of any region in our islands—13·7 per cent. of the work force, compared with 10·3 per cent. in the rest of the United Kingdom.

I take this opportunity to welcome the recent decrease in unemployment in Northern Ireland. I also welcome today's announcement of the recent decrease in unemployment in the rest of Britain. However, I remind the Minister that the Northern Ireland figure remains shamefully high. Unfortunately, the overall figure of 13·7 per cent. unemployment in Northern Ireland is dwarfed by some of the most appalling statistics revealed in travel-to-work areas. Cookstown and Derry, from which I returned yesterday, continue to suffer more than 18 per cent. unemployment. In Strabane, 23 per cent. of the work force is unemployed.

I hope that the Minister appreciates that a seasonally adjusted fall in unemployment of 1,500 is certainly welcome, but it allows no room for complacency. However, this month's announcement by the Department does not include the unacceptable number of long-term unemployed concealed within the monthly figure. For the Minister's benefit, I remind him that 53·9 per cent.—more than half the unemployed in Northern Ireland—have been out of work for a year. What hope can the Minister give them? Perhaps he will tell the House how far the order will go towards getting the long-term unemployed in Derry or Strabane back to work. They represent 59·5 per cent. and 64·5 per cent. respectively of their area totals.

What is more worrying about the Government's plans to find spending savings by attacking the poorest in Northern Ireland is the effect upon the already high number of people in the region who are living in or near poverty. In the 1930s, Joseph Rowntree discovered widespread hardship, squalor and suffering in areas such as York and Liverpool. Like Northern Ireland, parts of Merseyside hope to receive objective 1 status. As we approach the end of the century, research carried out by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation on household budgets and living standards in Northern Ireland has shown that for a couple with two children current income support meets only 74 per cent. of their basic minimum budget. In addition, income support and children's allowances were found to meet only 43 per cent. of the amount needed to provide adequate living standards. Frankly, in the latter part of the 20th century, those statistics are a scandalous indictment of the Government's failing.

The hardship that many Northern Ireland families are currently experiencing is mirrored by the difficulties that the region's young face. The annual report of the Northern Ireland Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux states:

"High levels of unemployment mean that young people can no longer confidently look forward to securing a job or apprenticeship. The best opportunity secured by upwards of 15,000 young people every year is a place on a Youth Training Programme."

What a waste of young talent and potential.

If the Government continue merely to dump young people in poorly paid schemes and refuse to utilise the greatest resource available to them—and the people of Northern Ireland—we will begin to see more than 50 young people present themselves every week to the Housing Executive as homeless. We will begin to see lengthening queues of unemployed young people joining the 8,000 who are already unable to find a place on youth training programmes and who consequently must live on £23·90 a week.

Dr. Joe Hendron (Belfast, West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the young people to whom he is referring—those in virtually every part of Northern Ireland and especially those in the cities and towns—are the same young people who, when training schemes come to an end, are cynically exploited by paramilitary organisations? They find themselves sandwiched between the paramilitaries and the inevitable confrontations between security forces. In many ways, they are lost and find their way into prison or at the end of a gun, taking someone's life or being killed themselves.

Mr. Stott: There is a great deal of truth in what the hon. Gentleman says, as someone who has a great deal of experience in such matters. If we could give those young people a proper job, and if there was hope for them in terms of employment provision, that would help them immeasurably not to fall into the arms of the paramilitaries. Unemployment and the lack of hope are probably the greatest recruiting sergeants for the paramilitaries.

In short, we will see further increases in the level of debt, homelessness and poverty among all sections of society in Northern Ireland, all of which will be a direct result of the policies promulgated by the Conservative party. As has been made clear by further leaks and speculation, the Secretary of State for Social Security is impatiently sharpening his axe before taking it to the benefits that are paid to those who have no other form of income.

The Minister will know that, of all the regions in the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland has the highest rate of people with disabilities—a total of 17·4 per cent. Seventy five per cent. of them rely on the social security system for part or all of their income. If the Government take their intended sideswipe at those who claim invalidity benefit, the Minister and his colleagues will consign three quarters of the disabled adult population in Northern Ireland to further hardship and anxiety. Therefore, the Minister is faced with a large number of potential victims of any Government spending cuts in Northern Ireland. How can he possibly justify an action that will result in 201,000 adults with disabilities in Northern Ireland being forced to pay through their meagre benefits to restore the Government's political fortunes?

I welcome the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) to his new post in the Northern Ireland team, although he is not in his place. I am sure that he is aware that his predecessor set in motion a review of education administration in Northern Ireland. I hope that he will give such a wide-ranging review equally extensive consideration and that he will not reach any hasty conclusions.

As I said earlier, I returned from Northern Ireland yesterday. I had spent some time visiting Meanscoil in Belfast. The school does not have state funding and is consequently seeking a commitment from the Minister As its name suggests, Meanscoil teaches the curriculum in the Irish language and has been doing so since 1991. It is funded by parents and the community. It is the only school in the whole of Northern Ireland to provide Irish-medium education to those pupils who have already received their primary education in the Irish language. It seems to me that the school satisfies the necessary requirements. Will the Minister consider its case sympathetically? I shall write to him about it tomorrow morning.

Dr. Hendron: The subject of Meanscoil Feinte is dear to my heart, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The only Irish-medium secondary school is in my constituency. The Government have already accepted their responsibility for the Irish language in primary school education, so I hope that they will look positively at this secondary school in west Belfast.

Mr. Stott: I know that my hon. Friend recently visited the school and that he is as concerned as I am to ensure that the Irish language is fostered and maintained. I understand that four primary schools teach in the Irish language. From the age of 11 no school other than this one teaches the curriculum in Irish for children up to the age of 16. We have just had a big debate on the Welsh language. It is important that cultural links and the language are preserved and protected. I hope for a sympathetic response from the Minister.

The education service as a whole ultimately depends on the quality of its teachers and lecturers for the achievement of the required standards and the implementation of the changes that the Government have introduced. Although most face the added pressure of education reform positively, the changes are demanding so much energy and commitment that the quality of the provision for pupils and students in schools and colleges is in danger of being lowered. As someone who is married to a teacher in this country, I can confidently tell the Minister that education changes have caused great difficulty to the teaching profession.

If that possibility is to be avoided it will be necessary to employ not only the most effective forms of in-service training and advisory and support services to assist teachers in implementing the changes, but to win the vital endorsement and support of parents, teachers and employers for the service that the teaching profession in Northern Ireland provides.

The Government have decided in their wisdom that Belfast international airport is to be privatised. The people who work there are concerned about their futures, their job prospects and pension provision. On Tuesday morning I spoke to a number of trade unionists who represent the work force there. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), the hon. Member for Antrim, South (Mr. Forsythe) and I have been extremely concerned about the police force at that airport. They are not members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary; they wear a different uniform. Nevertheless, they are sworn constables under a magistrate. If they are to be transferred to the private sector, their concern is about their operational impartiality and duties.

I wrote to the Minister of State on 17 June asking him whether a representative of the police force at the airport, the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron) and I could meet him to discuss the police force's concerns. The Minister has not responded to my letter but I hope that he will respond positively so that that important organisation —the police force at Belfast airport—can put its genuine and serious concerns to him.

If the perceived advantages of the European single market are to be realised, it is crucial, because of the island of Ireland's peripheral geography to the rest of mainland Europe, that industry, commerce, tourism, transport and energy policy are harmonised on an island basis

In its crudest terms, Northern Ireland has benefited from additional EC funding as a result of objective 1 status. But welcome as such investment is, compared with the funds granted to the Republic, Northern Ireland still receives a disproportionate part of the cake. As has been said, a comparison with the Republic on the basis of a head count shows that Northern Ireland is granted only one third of the sum to which it might otherwise be entitled. That illustrates an unfortunate consequence of the European Community viewing Northern Ireland's economy in simple regional terms rather than addressing the needs of the island of Ireland economy as a whole.

Two weeks ago, during the recent debate on the renewal of direct rule order, we heard how difficult it will be to get an agreed constitutional settlement for Northern Ireland. I do not doubt for an instant that it will be difficult but it will not be impossible. By contrast, however, making the island of Ireland economy work is an opportunity, not a problem. I am sure that all Members representing Northern Ireland will work together to ensure that full advantage is taken of any potential increase in cross-border aid.

In his speech in Dublin last year, Dr. George Quigley, chairman of the Ulster bank, reinforced the concept of "Ireland, an island economy". I recommend all hon. Members who have not read Dr Quigley's paper to do so because he describes how businesses in the north and south are working closely together. He said:

> "As Chairman of Ulster Bank, which is in the fairly unique situation of doing 50 per cent. of its business in the South and 50 per cent. in the North, I find no difficulty with the proposition that Ireland is—or should be—an island economy. Both North and South would have signally failed to give substance to the 1992 concept if, occupying a small island on the periphery of the EC, they neglected or were unable to function as a single market. The Bank's fortunes are intertwined with the prosperity of both parts of the island".

Hon. Members will be aware that the Secretary of State for Transport recently granted the American airline, TransAir, a licence to fly directly from Belfast international airport to New York. I warmly welcome that move and am pleased that my representations in support of the licence did not fall on deaf ears and that I finally have my baggage back from Riga. The new link between Northern Ireland and the United States will attract extra valuable inward investment and begin to counter the isolation to which Dr. Quigley referred in his speech.

Now that business has set the agenda, the specialist Government agencies in the north and south have an important role to play in consultation with the business community. A seminar in Northern Ireland formally confirmed the agreement of the International Development bank and the Irish Trade Board to work closely together to increase the number and range of products supplied within the island of Ireland. A series of jointly organised sourcing exhibitions will encourage companies to supply goods currently imported from outside Ireland. Equally important are the planned initiatives in conjunction with the Confederation of Irish Industry and the Confederation of British Industry to open up areas of public procurement in the island in a way that strengthens companies so that they can bid successfully for public sector procurement contracts in the rest of the European Community.

I agree with Sir George Quigley's analysis that for far too long the economic orientation of both parts of the island has been along a horizontal rather than a vertical axis. In a global economy, it is essential that we continue to look outwards towards the rest of Europe and beyond. It is crucial that both Governments do not neglect the potential that exists within the vertical axis, the strengthening of which will create a more solid springboard for growth within the island of Ireland and for conquering markets within the European Community. Making the island economy work is essential. It is an opportunity; it is not a problem.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I shall make a brief comment about the speech by the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott). Before I do so, I wish well the new Minister, the right hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), and also his new colleague, the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). I trust that in the right hon. Gentleman's arduous duties, especially in regard to the prisons of Northern Ireland, he will have the benefit of bringing his experience to bear on problems that are vital to the best in the community.

The prisoners, who come from both sections of the community, run right into the community. There is a great need today for there to be an understanding of how the families feel and an understanding of what is happening in the prisons of Northern Ireland. I am sure that the House wishes the Minister well as he tackles a difficult and continuing problem in Northern Ireland.

It comes as no surprise to hear the hon. Member for Wigan talking about an island economy. I have the document that has been much talked about and that programme is set forth in it. Level 1 is:

"Co-operation between Departments and institutions on both sides of the border."

Level 2 is "Harmonisation of policies". "Integration of administrations" is level 3. That is what we heard from the hon. Member for Wigan tonight.

I have experience in Europe. I have been an elected Member of the European Parliament continuously since I was first elected. I have topped the poll at every election to the European Parliament. I have been there. I have never once seen the deputies, as they call themselves, from the south of Ireland voting for anything that was of benefit to Northern Ireland. Not once. I have challenged them about that. I have voted in the European Parliament for things that were of benefit to the south of Ireland, as long as they were not detrimental to the north of Ireland. Those deputies have never done the same. I am sick of the talk about them being all for this island economy.

I was in Strasbourg this week. I heard the deputies demanding £8 billion. Never once did they mention Northern Ireland. There was not a cheep about it. They never even said once that of course Northern Ireland deserves the treatment that we demand. In fact, they told the European Parliament that they were good Europeans. As the predecessor of the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron) said in the House of Lords this week, "Yes, they are good Europeans as long as you pay them well." Six million pounds a day and they will be good Europeans. It ill becomes the hon. Member for Wigan, the spokesman for the Labour party, to read to us tonight a lesson about the glorious co-operation that we shall have from the south of Ireland.

As for Dr. Quigley, I happened to meet representatives of the business community in Northern Ireland at a meeting known as the meeting of the seven. I am sure that other Northern Ireland Members have been to such meetings, too. I took up Mr. Quigley there on something that he had said. Faced with his own business men around the table, he backed off. I told him that it was all very well singing the praises of his own bank—with 50 per cent. of its business in the south, it profits the bank to go in for co-operation with the south—but such co-operation certainly does not profit Northern Ireland, since businesses in all sectors of the economy in the south are trying to undercut the competition from Northern Ireland.

It is a pity that the Minister had no time to tell us about the structural fund and what additional money will result from it. The House should realise that something strange has happened to it——

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): Does my hon. Friend agree that, it is disgraceful that the Northern Ireland Office sends out the documentation on the structural fund to every Tom, Dick and Harry in Northern Ireland, and to every community organisation and tenants association there, but has not, to date, sent it to Members of Parliament?

Rev. Ian Paisley: It is indeed. I happen to have a copy because I am a member of the European Parliament, but I do not see why colleagues here should not have been sent a copy.

To return to the structural fund: the cake has not been enlarged, but the number of those wanting a share of it has increased. Germany will get the largest slice, because it has achieved objective 1 status for east Germany. Belgium and France are to receive money, and Italy will too—even though it was not able to spend the money that it has already been given. Presumably Italy will proceed to hoard the money, or perhaps it has been stolen by the Mafia, or perhaps the Italian Prime Minister stole it.

All these Governments are demanding a slice of the cake, so our slice will be smaller. Merseyside and the highlands and islands are also to get a share, and rightly so, but I should like the Minister to tell us how much we are likely to get. Demands for £8 billion from the south have been cut to perhaps £7·5 billion, but those who are to get that much are not satisfied. I wonder how much will be cut from our money. Will we get £1 billion, or less?

This week I talked, with my European colleagues the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and Mr. Nicholson, to Commissioner Millan. He said that, when the figures are announced, there will be some surprises: they are all to be reduced.

[Rev. Ian Paisley]

So, far from getting anything out of the cohesion fund, we will be paying into it——

Mr. Stott: Maastricht.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Everyone knows my attitude to Maastricht, and the official attitude of the Labour party, so the pot should not call the kettle black.

The four poor countries—Portugal, Greece, Spain and Ireland—have all put their hands in the cohesion fund kitty, which is a quarter as big again as the structural fund. So the taxpayers of the United Kingdom—of Merseyside, of the highlands and islands, and of Northern Ireland—who are crying out for money as objective 1 areas will find that they are putting their pounds into the pockets of the countries I have mentioned. Dublin is shouting loud and already has £3 million a day, and will soon be getting £6 million. That fact will shortly come out in the wash.

We need to hear what the Government think they will get. The last time that we had structural pay-outs, what did Northern Ireland get as an objective 1 area? It got an increase of 8 per cent., which hardly covered inflation. The south of Ireland got an increase of between 80 and 90 per cent. Spain, Portugal and Greece got an increase of over 100 per cent. When Ministers were negotiating, why did they not ask for double the money because we lost out before? The Commissioner has told me that Ministers asked for no increase, just for their crunch of the money. The Northern Ireland Office must come clean and tell us exactly what it feels it will get from the structural fund, and where the money will be spent.

I read the debate in another place, and I would like the Minister to hear something that was said there. Lord Cooke of Islandreagh raised the matter of the structural fund, and the Minister answering said:

"the Government will fully accept the additionality requirement."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 9 July 1993; Vol. 547, c. 1656.]

Will the money we get, whether it is a little or a lot, be additional, and where in the appropriations will it be spent? The Minister must address that question in his reply, although we know that we shall not have much time for a reply.

There are other matters of great interest that I would have liked to have dealt with tonight, but, as we know, we have only a limited time. I thought that the hon. Member for Wigan would have curbed the length of his speech, as we are curbing ours, but he did not, because he was so interested in the school that teaches Gaelic. I rather laughed at that, because the census figures tell us that only about 5 per cent. of the people in Northern Ireland speak Gaelic, and even fewer read and write it. It is not like Wales. I spent part of my life in Wales, and every church I preached in had both a Welsh and an English service in the morning. That does not happen in Northern Ireland.

Furthermore, only a small percentage of the Roman Catholic population speak Gaelic. The situation is not on a par with that in Wales—I understand the deep feelings of Welsh speakers, which were expressed so well earlier tonight. To argue about that is to get into minutiae that we should not be getting into.

Mr. Stott: I appreciate that we have a time constraint on the debate. The hon. Gentleman will recognise that, in the four years that I have had this responsibility for the Opposition, I have cut my speeches short on every appropriation order debate. This evening, I thought that it was important to flag up what I and my party consider to be important issues. I do not need any lessons from him about the length of the speeches that I make from the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): Oh, shut up and sit down!

Mr. Stott: And I need no lessons from that hon. Gentleman either.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am very sorry that I gave way to the hon. Member for Wigan. It is ridiculous; we are limited for time, and he is trying to justify himself. I welcome the fact that we are going to be able to discuss this matter at a later date. We need to do that. I regret that the hon. Gentleman took all the time he could, because there is not only the SDLP; there are also the Popular Unionists, and their voice should be heard too.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): First, I welcome the right hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir. J. Wheeler) to the Government Front Bench as a member of the Northern Ireland team. It is no insult to him, or indeed to me, that my colleagues who are in the building tonight have deserted this Bench as a protest at the intolerable way in which the business that relates to Northern Ireland has been handled, not for the first time, but for the second time that we have tried to have this debate.

There are so many areas of administration that must be dealt with in the scope of this ridiculously short debate that it is impossible to do any of them justice. Those of us who represent constituencies in Northern Ireland are obliged to try to summarise our year's work in a very few minutes, to draw on that experience and to seek to expound reasonable alternatives where we feel that there is inadequacy, right across the scope of the Northern Ireland Office administration.

Our English, Welsh and Scottish colleagues have the benefit of both a meaningful stratum of local government, which helps to relieve the burden of parochial responsibilities that Northern Ireland Members have to deal with, and of being able to address various departmental issues within debates dedicated exclusively to the function of those Departments. We, on the other hand, are obliged to paint our picture with a great broad brush that can do little to capture the nuances and attitudes pertaining to the area in which we live.

Nor do we have the benefit of inside knowledge, which can be ascertained only where there is either direct involvement or an adequate system of checks and balances —a system that would be enhanced by having a Select Committee on Northern Ireland to examine and monitor Northern Ireland matters. The first is unobtainable because we are a small Opposition party; the second because there has been a stubborn unwillingness to concede even a degree of openness about the way in which Northern Ireland is governed.

Yet, when anything goes wrong in Northern Ireland, there are those who invariably contrive to create an impression that Ulster Unionists are to blame. Whatever is wrong, the responsibility lies with a succession of Governments who have had sole and unbridled power in the Province for the past 21 years, and that certainly is not the party to which I belong.

My colleagues and I have some ideas about how progress can be made, and I believe that that is amply demonstrated in terms of the work that is done by our district councillors, where they have managed to claw back responsibilities to themselves despite the resistance of some departmental musclemen and quango placemen.

At a time when the community in Northern Ireland is more ill at ease with itself than it has ever been during my 10 years in the House, it is becoming increasingly important to create at least an atmosphere of social and economic continuity and stability. I am not suggesting that there is anything in this life that cannot be improved upon, but I am tired of the Government going out of their way to mend things that are not actually broken. We are assailed, year in, year out, with far too many fanciful ideas that are far too costly and disruptive, and that in practice do not work the way that they were intended to. Paper exercises are too regularly failing in practice.

In this respect, I want to turn to the Department of Health and Social Services and question whether the present piecemeal policy of rationalisation of acute hospital services is in the best interests of the consumer. I have had to endure the trauma of trying to defend maternity and paediatric services in the two hospitals in my constituency. These two hospitals—the Erne and Enniskillen and the South Tyrone in Dungannon—are administered under separate health boards, and each board, one assumes encouraged by the Department, embarked on its own programme of rationalisation in isolation. No one appeared to think that, if amalgamations proved necessary, it might be sensible to consider the overall delivery of maternity and paediatric services throughout Northern Ireland.

The case of the Erne has been won, but South Tyrone's case—after nearly two years—is to be held in limbo for possibly another year. It appears that, if administrators have a cock-eyed idea that cannot be sustained, they merely give themselves time to move the goalposts and hope that the constructive opposition will go away.

I hope that the Minister will understand that, in the case of the South Tyrone, we are not going away. We know that the motivation for the proposed changes in the delivery of maternity and paediatric services has to do with the arbitrary figure of 2,500 births per unit per year. That may or may not be justified in hospitals that serve large mainland conurbations, where consumers live in a small geographical area. However, it has little relevance in a rural area of Northern Ireland, where average income is lower and distances greater, but where that is offset by a high degree of family support. In such cases, accessibility means a great deal.

My hospitals are as financially efficient as larger units, and the units dealing with between 900 and 1,000 babies per year have a low perinatal death rate that many larger units would envy. The system simply is not broken, either in financial or in safety terms; I beg the Minister not to allow the boards to mend it.

It is much more urgent, however, for the Minister to ensure that community care services are put in place in time to meet the demands resulting from shorter post-operative hospitalisation and the increased number of day-surgery treatments. I ask him to consider carefully how such services can be delivered with the community as distinct from to the community.

He may protest that it is perhaps too early for me to try to argue conclusively that the new health boards—devoid of any elected representatives—are ineffective; but I believe that the breadth of professional talent that was hoped for is missing. There are clearly a few excellent people, but they are a minority, and the non-executive members are largely and understandably dominated by those with an executive role.

The latter—also a mediocre bunch—seem preoccupied with finance and organisation, to the detriment of the health service itself. They are preoccupied with glossy brochures and business consultants' reports. Surely it is better to put finite resources into shortening waiting lists and waiting times, and maintaining a hospital and community care infrastructure that is accessible to the consumer.

Before leaving the subject of health and social services, I must ask whether the Minister intends to do anything about the inequity in medical and other services that we in Northern Ireland appear to provide on demand for citizens of the Irish Republic. That country neither reciprocates nor provides those services for its own people.

We have already been presented with examples of the high cost of providing third-level education scholarships for students from the Irish Republic; it has often been cited in the House. Now the Minister has informed me, in answers to parliamentary questions, that 15 per cent. of private nursing home places in Fermanagh are occupied by residents who came directly from the Irish Republic.

I was disappointed to learn that the Northern Ireland Office cannot tell me what that means to the Western health and social services board and the Department of Health and Social Services in terms of social security and general practitioner costs. However, it can be deduced from the cost of in-hospital treatment—over £32,000 last year—that a good deal of money is involved. That money should be spent on providing better home help and other services for my constituents. Is it not scandalous that Cavan general hospital in the Irish Republic discharged 21 patients directly to our private nursing homes, one with such horrific bed sores that special equipment had to be bought by the Erne hospital?

About 12 per cent. of my constituents are over 65 years old, and I want the finite resources available to my health boards going to improve their quality of life. Why should we be subsidising the parasitic Government in Dublin, who would presume to lecture us on political proprieties?

Nor does the extortion end there. There is clear evidence that it is easier for someone from the Irish Republic to get a public authority house in Northern Ireland than it is for someone born in the Province who has perhaps lived his working life in England and wants to return home to retire. In matters relating to education, the social services and housing, can we afford to finance Eire's spongers to the extent that we do?

The Minister has already told me that he will not increase the funding available to the Western health and social services board to compensate for the demands of the Republic's elderly who come into my area. Will he tell me when he intends to put a stop to that abuse?

Let us consider some activities of the Department of Economic Development—in particular, the way in which its industrial development board operates. I do not fail to recognise the difficulties enshrined in job creation, and I pay tribute to the good work being done in the Department and the IDB. But it would pay dividends if the efforts to attract inward investment and business opportunities in places such as the United States were more equally divided between officials, who work directly for the IDB, and contracted agents, who would have the advantage of working on home ground.

It is not possible, however bright and able the Department's nominees may be, for them to cover enough ground in the time available and to maintain the follow-up on promising leads. The indigenous agent who knows the territory can be of immense value if he or she is properly tasked, targeted and rewarded. On the other hand, if not productive, he or she is more easily expendable than a civil servant who has been encouraged to uproot family and home to undertake the task.

Local councils have a role to play in promoting businesses from within their own areas, targeting clearly defined regions of, say, the United States from an exporting, joint venturing and inward investment perspective. Four councils representing County Tyrone have come together to do just that in the mid-west of America and hope to be able, with IDB co-operation, to make use of, and task, an agent in that area so that he may identify opportunities. I hope that the Minister will see that as a practical, tangible opportunity for cross-party, intra-community co-operation, in contrast to some of the more ethereal schemes that exist, and I hope that he will give the initiative his support.

At home, I will only urge him to ensure that there is unity of purpose between the Departments of Economic Development and of Agriculture in sorting out the urgent need to develop our agrifood industry before it is too late. I leave him with the challenge that we must protect and develop realistically our milk-based industry.

I draw attention to the way in which the modicum of democracy which at present exists in the education and library boards is threatened in the Department's paper on reorganisation, although it is noticeably lacking in any reference to the need to rationalise the Department's headquarters. I hope that the Minister will set my mind at rest about that.

Education must never be taken out of the hands of parents and teachers. Sadly, since I left the classroom just over 10 years ago, I find a profession which had maintained the highest standards, not least in the primary sector, very demoralised, with teachers falling over themselves to retire early.

I am glad that the Minister with responsibility at the Department of Education for Northern Ireland has recognised that, and has decided to slow down the pace of proposed change and look anew at the whole question of curriculum content. I congratulate him on that decision. It is time that teachers were restored to their proper role, and that someone got a grip on the inspectorate, which represents executive authority gone mad.

I must express disappointment at the limited funding available for new capital projects. While I welcome two major projects in my constituency in the voluntary sector, and I am pleased to have been involved in pressing for one of them, I am horrified to discover no major provision listed in the controlled sector. The Minister would be offended if I whispered, "Discrimination," but I would simply be reflecting how that has been interpreted in some quarters.

Some rural primary schools in my constituency are more than 60 years old, and there is pressure to rationalise because of falling rolls, but no one appears to have considered it a good idea to group those schools within a new rural school to sustain my rural community, or to take cognisance of the excellent study of the future of primary education commissioned by the Rural Development Council, which was broadly in favour of clustering.

While the Department has been mending things that are not broken, it has left the urgent matter of adequate infrastructure on the proverbial long finger. Will the Minister make it his priority to find extra cash to make an impact on that area? In a region of high unemployment, our children's education must have precedence.

I shall refer briefly to the Rural Development Council. There should be urgency to develop a coherent rural policy, but it will not happen unless the council is given greater authority and influence. It currently lacks teeth and plays second fiddle to every other Government Department and agency. Planners continue to be systematically destructive towards the rural community, and take little notice of its needs or rights.

I am running out of time, so I shall conclude by telling the Minister that Northern Ireland should be governed with continuity and stability; by consent rather than by diktat; by sustaining what is good and improving on what is imperfect, but never by trying to mend things that are not broken.

11.12 pm

Sir James Kilfedder (North Down): I join in welcoming my right hon. Friend the Minister on his first appearance at the Dispatch Box. He will find that the Ulster people are kindly, hospitable and friendly. No matter how their representatives in the House may sound, there is a big heart in the majority of the people of Northern Ireland.

It is impossible to deal with the order in the short time that is available, so I shall mention just three points. This is the European year of older people and it is appropriate to draw attention to their problems and their needs. They are seeking not sympathy or pity, but fair play, justice and proper consideration of their plight. Most of them are living on relatively small incomes which, in many cases, have been reduced as a result of the lowering of interest rates on, for instance, their building society accounts. Unfortunately, the majority of them are just above the threshold of eligibility for state benefits.

The cost of living in Northern Ireland is greater than in any other part of the United Kingdom. Some of our senior citizens are endeavouring to eke out their pensions by eating less or buying cheaper items. Some even try to save on the cost of heating by restricting it to one room or one bar of an electric fire. Therefore, imagine my surprise and alarm when the Government announced in the Budget the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel and power. Everyone in the United Kingdom, including Northern Ireland, will have to pay that tax—those who are earning enough to be obliged to pay income tax and those who are not.

In that sense, it is an unfair tax which will hurt, in particular, the retired people who do not receive state benefit, which I understand would then entitle them to some compensation, although I am not sure what will be available. It is well established that during winter there is a substantial increase in the number of deaths among pensioners. I fear that this harsh tax will cause more suffering to our senior citizens and expose them to greater danger of death through hypothermia. There is still time for the Government to abandon the tax on domestic electricity, oil, gas and coal.

I am deeply concerned about the welfare of elderly people in residential care homes, whose numbers have mushroomed. Some homes are excellent, some are not, according to the complaints that I have received from the relatives of the elderly residents. It is all very well for the Government to state that registration may be refused if the health board considers that the applicant is not a fit person to operate a residential care home, but frequent visits should be made every year and without notice. Relatives should be given leaflets inviting complaints and stating where they should be made. Telephone numbers should be provided so that someone with a grievance can immediately contact an official, who can then immediately go and check that home.

I understand that some residents who are supported at public expense in residential care homes are not being given by the owners the statutory allowance of £12·65 a week—or, at least, not being given the full amount. I am deeply concerned about that. Often, those residents are vulnerable and cannot look after some aspects of their affairs. I hope that there will be an investigation into that throughout Northern Ireland, as we must ensure that they are receiving the money to which they are entitled.

I deplore the moves by the Department of Health to close state residential care and nursing homes, which provide the standards by which private homes can be judged. I urge the Government to preserve, in particular, the Banks residential home in Bangor, which was purpose built and provides an excellent and homely atmosphere.

In speaking of the elderly, I think of the loving care shown by the nurses who look after them, either in residential homes or in hospitals. I pay tribute to those nurses, male and female, who, by their dedication and hard work, make life more comfortable for patients of all ages in hospital. Young people in Northern Ireland who have the vocation should be encouraged to train as nurses. It is annoying and perplexing that, in an area of high unemployment, young people who are eager to become nurses are discouraged. It is ridiculous that some nurses are made redundant when it is clear that the nursing staff in hospitals are overworked. We need nurses as well as doctors to ensure the highest possible standard of patient care.

For years, I have been fighting the various plans to reduce the number of beds in the Ulster hospital in Dundonald and in the Bangor hospital and the transfer of essential services to other hospitals in Belfast.

Here in London, the movement is the other way round. The Secretary of State for Health maintains that money and facilities should go to densely populated areas outside the capital. That makes sense. But the Eastern health board, which covers North Down and Belfast, moves the beds from my constituency into Belfast, thus depriving the dense and growing population of North Down of its rights. That is a form of discrimination, and I resent it. In the name of the people of North Down, I challenge the Eastern health board to play fair. The people in my constituency deserve the best hospitals. The doctors and nurses demand them, and certainly the patients deserve them.

I should like to mention many other matters, but, in fairness to the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady), who wishes to speak next, I shall stop here, adding only that it is unfortunate that the people of Northern Ireland, through their representatives, do not have an adequate opportunity to examine the issues set out in the draft appropriation order. I look forward to the day when we shall have a truly democratic forum.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity, albeit brief, to participate in the appropriation debate. First, on behalf of my party, I welcome the new Minister of State, who introduced the debate, and his ministerial colleague the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, whom I have already welcomed on a previous occasion. I hope that their endeavours in Northern Ireland will be for the benefit and welfare of all the people there and, on that basis, we promise our co-operation.

It is appropriate to put on the record the fact that the shortness of the time allowed to us tonight will allegedly be compensated for by extra time in the autumn, when the debate will be reconvened, as it were. On the understanding that that is a firm undertaking, I feel that it would be inappropriate to deal at this late hour with many of the broader issues that the appropriation debate would normally involve. I shall therefore restrict my remarks to the matters that cannot wait until the autumn to be debated and acted upon.

[Mr. Eddie McGrady]

The first such issue concerns the Department of Agriculture. I welcome the potato feedstuffs scheme, which was introduced to alleviate the financial plight of potato farmers in Northern Ireland. The Department succumbed only after five months' pressure but, although it is late, the scheme is still welcome. The danger is not yet over. Many of the potato farmers, who form the bedrock of the agricultural scene in Northern Ireland, have been so financially devastated in the past year that despite the scheme they still require assistance in the new planting season, so I hope that some effort will be made to provide that, by means of either the structural fund or the special potato board funding.

One peculiar circumstance now affecting the farming community may cause some mirth, because it is the fact that cattle have no passports. Nevertheless, that circumstance is causing some distress along the southern border. Cattle that have been imported from the Republic of Ireland do not get any identification, so they are ineligible for cow and beef premiums in Northern Ireland. I ask the Department of Agriculture and the Minister to make representations to the appropriate department in the Republic of Ireland so that there can be co-operation over the certification and identification of animals that travel across the border.

It will not surprise the Minister if I touch briefly on the crisis in the fishing industry, because two of the three ports in Northern Ireland are in my constituency.

The fishing industry, like the potato farmers, has been devastated. It has been devastated not by the weather, but by Government policy and legislation. In that regard, I refer particularly to the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act and the follow-on from that, the Sea Fish Licensing (Time at Sea) (Principles) Order 1993. They represent the most devastating revision of the common fisheries policy since 1983 which is having a tremendous effect on the environment and the economic environment of the hinterland of those two ports and of Portavogie.

There is no doubt that the so-called Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992 has nothing to do with fish conservation and that it will not achieve the objectives that it set out to achieve. It is incapable of performing that function. That point was debated at the time and there is no point re-examining the issue tonight. The more important, immediate and urgent point relates to sea fish licensing.

As a result of pressure, the implementation of that proposal has been postponed until 1 January 1994. That is an indication of the difficulties that it is causing. The fishermen of Great Britain and Northern Ireland seem to be the fall-guys for fish conservation policies in Europe. It is evident that other countries fishing around our waters do not abide by conservation and licensing matters.

It is particularly galling when one can stand, as I can in South Down, and see the fishermen from the Republic of Ireland putting out just a mile across the water virtually without restrictions and with a policy of an enhanced fishing fleet, when the fishermen of Kilkeel, Ardglass and Portavogie cannot do that. I urge that the licensing time at sea provisions be re-examined to assist those fishermen.

The real way to achieve conservation is through decommissioning. However, the Government have turned their face away from a meaningful decommissioning scheme. The efficient and modern vessels will go out of action and that will leave an inefficient and non-modern fleet to carry on fishing. The decommissioning scheme should encourage those with the largest quota drives to set aside, if they so wish, like the farmers, part of their endeavours to provide for conservation.

I must briefly refer to the Department of Health and Social Services, as I am sure all hon. Members would, because of our dramatic experiences in Northern Ireland as a result of the changes imposed by the Department. There seems to be an attempt to centralise even the most modest acute services in the conurbations.

As the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) said, we are a rural community and we must have reasonable access to acute facilities. We are not looking for anything other than that. One of the most galling aspects of all this is that we had a so-called consultation period. However, when representatives of the community or of the duly elected councillors of Down and Mourne went to the Eastern health board, they found that there was no consultation.

When those representatives asked the board what was meant by acute services, by midwifery-led maternity services and by emergency and casualty services, the board bluntly refused to define what it meant. How can we have consultation in respect of a paper when the authors cannot explain what they mean? That is happening right across Northern Ireland. We have not had the required consultation.

One of the most interesting events in health and social services in Northern Ireland in recent times has been the intervention by the Department in the contractual goings-on of the Eastern health board vis-à-vis the Royal Victoria hospital. For the first time, the Department has admitted that ultimate responsibility is with itself. Until now the Department has said, "No, you cannot consult us at this stage; that is all to do with the administration on the ground at board level." We always knew that ultimate responsibility was with the Department itself.

I ask the Department to intervene to ensure that acute facilities are left in the area which is broadly covered by Down and Mourne health authority. There were three hospitals in the area. One has already been closed, one hospital in Banbridge is threatened, and Kilkeel hospital will be closed. Only the Down group of hospitals will be left.

I take the point about the so-called maternity services throughput of 2,500. The last I heard, it was 2,000. The Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists has clearly said that that is not the case and that it is a departmental figment. It would be quite happy with a proper liaison group. Throughput could be as low as 500 and there could still be an effective maternity service. That is what the rural populations of Northern Ireland require.

I must finish, to be fair to the Minister, but I should refer to the closure of statutory residential homes. The Department says, "Cut 12 per cent." It does not matter whether 12 per cent. of beds is a realistic figure for the demographics of an area. It is a balance sheet exercise of cutting 12 per cent. If the Minister would listen for a moment, we are talking not about closing beds but about closing homes. The rooms are people's homes. They are not beds, they are the homes and environment of old people. We must take great care. Already, two homes in Newcastle have been closed and people have been shuffled off to three other homes which are about to be threatened with closure. I ask the Minister to review that matter.

I see you looking at me, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I take the hint very clearly. However, we have only scratched the surface of the topic. Will the Secretary of State tell the people of Northern Ireland what will happen to the European fund to which the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) referred in great detail? The Northern Irish people are disgusted by what is happening. We would like to know what new instructions, if any, are being issued to the Minister and the negotiating team in the Council of Ministers to ensure that Northern Ireland deprived region No. 1 gets a reasonable funding allocation to enable it to sustain a measure of economic growth.

11.32 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Robert Atkins): I have but seven minutes to try to respond to the debate. I therefore agree with comments about the shortage of time to examine several important and urgent issues for hon. Members who represent the various strands of opinion within the Province.

I thank the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) and others for their kind words about my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) and my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), who recently joined the team. They appreciated those comments and they look forward to working, as I and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and my noble Friend the Earl of Arran have done for some months, with such a friendly bunch.

Several issues have been raised. I will write to hon. Members on matters that I cannot address in my brief reply—or encourage my ministerial colleagues with certain responsibilities to do so. Perhaps I shall touch on matters that are my responsibility within the Department of Economic Development and the Department of the Environment, and conclude, if I have the time, on matters relating to structural funds, about which there is concern and a need for clarification.

The hon. Member for Wigan made several comments and referred to the problems of unemployment. I agree that there are still a great number of concerns. Much of the unemployment is endemic for reasons that the hon. Gentleman and all other hon. Members understand. It is my task and that of the Industrial Development Board and other organisations to do what we can to create new jobs and encourage new companies to come to the Province and provide opportunities for new employment. We had a successful year in 1992-93. Nearly 2,000 jobs were created in new major companies around the Province. That task continues with the tacit and often overt support of hon. Members representing Northern Ireland constituencies who do a great deal to assist in that respect.

I pick out the point raised by the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) about his activities and those of the organisation in his constituency with the delightful name of TEDI. Other hon. Members and organisations are also encouraging links between various parts of the United States and, indeed, other parts of the world. The work done by those organisations, properly constituted, is valuable and is appreciated by IDB and others.

There is always some concern when there is a potential conflict between the activities of local councils and the IDB when they are not properly controlled. If they are not properly controlled, we get conflicts and difficulties. Essentially, if the organisations are properly set up, they do a great deal of work.

The hon. Member for Wigan raised a point about the airport. I will be delighted to see him and anyone whom he wishes to bring. That matter is important. I am sorry that he has not yet had a reply, but he should get one—I make a pledge now.

I agree with the points raised by the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone. They were sensible and thoughtful and I will try to implement them as soon as possible. He made some points about planning in rural areas. Hon. Members know my view on planning in rural areas, but let me put it on the record now. I am entirely in favour of industry in rural areas—I am not against it. However, it must be recognised that there are pressures on rural areas when that happens.

Let me repeat that I am entirely in favour of housing in rural areas. It is essential that those who work in agriculture and other small industries have the right to be housed, especially if they have a family connection that involves them wanting to stay in the area in which they live. I have no argument with that. The only discussion —I suspect that hon. Members share this concern—is perhaps about the quality of the properties.

I spent a delightful day with the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) in his constituency. We looked at a number of planning concerns. We found—perhaps to his astonishment, if not to mine—an identity of purpose and understanding about what is happening there. Hon. Members will understand that there is an interest there.

I shall conclude my brief remarks—I want to return to a number of issues, perhaps through correspondence—by referring to the points raised about the structural funds, which are exercising all hon. Members, not least the hon. Member for Antrim, North. To answer his question, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and others have fought hard for not simply a significant increase for Northern Ireland. We have asked for a significant increase on what was requested last year plus inflation, so that pressure is firm.

The hon. Gentleman and others will have heard on the wireless this morning comments from Commissioner Millan who made it clear that the British Government, through my right hon. Friend, have been fighting extremely hard for the cause of Northern Ireland and, indeed, the United Kingdom. This morning, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State spoke directly to Commissioner Millan on the telephone. He made clear to Commissioner Millan, who was receptive in this regard, the importance of Northern Ireland maintaining its objective 1 status, but having no more than its fair share.

We must recognise that there is pressure on EC funds at present. I think that everyone understands that. We recognise that the specific pressures are coming from the former eastern part of Germany, parts of Portugal, Greece, and so on. I make the point—this shows how hard we have fought for Northern Ireland—that Northern Ireland's gross domestic product per capita is about 76 per cent. of the EC average, which is well above objective 1 status figures in other parts of the EC. We have fought hard against the odds to ensure that Northern Ireland gets a fair crack of the whip. If hon. Gentlemen are fair, and I know them to be so, they will understand that. We must continue that fight as Northern Ireland is entitled to a fair share of these moneys. My right hon. and hon. Friends in my Department and in the Government pledge that we will do so.

We have had an all-too-brief debate. All the points raised by hon. Gentlemen will be considered. We will respond as urgently as we can on the details of health services and residential homes—a subject which my hon. Friend the Member for North Down (Sir J. Kilfedder) raised. He speaks with great care for the elderly in his constituency. I hope that we can talk about these matters again after the recess and at some length so that hon. Members on both sides of the House and the official Opposition have the opportunity to raise matters and I, as a Minister, and my colleagues have the opportunity to respond.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order 1993, which was laid before this House on 7th June, be approved.

PROCEDURE

Ordered,

That Mr. Paul Channon be discharged from the Select Committee on Procedure and Mr. Andrew MacKay be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

PETITIONS

Post Office Services

11.40 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I rise to present a petition which is signed by my constituents who are concerned about Government plans to privatise the Post Office and to transfer VAT payments from post offices to banks. This has been an extremely contentious issue and the House may be astonished to know that in a little over six weeks I have secured no fewer than 11,490 signatures from my constituents in suburban and rural areas. My hon. Friends have similar petitions to present. I shall read the material allegations.

The Humble Petition of the undersigned presidents of Gordon sheweth that we express deep concern that the Government proposes to privatise post office services and compulsorily transfer social security payments from post offices to banks, and we oppose these measures jointly and severally as they threaten the very survival of rural post offices and deny the efficiency and convenience of the present system, especially in rural areas.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House will do everything possible to impress upon the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry and Social Security the need for an autonomous post office service in the public sector and to abandon plans for the compulsory transfer of social security payments to banks.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

11.41 pm

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): I have the honour to present to the House a petition from the residents of Argyll and Bute regarding their concern that the Government might remove their right to receive pensions and benefit payments at local sub-post offices. If that happens, it will undoubtedy threaten the survival of sub-post offices and rural village shops, with which they are so often connected. That would cut deep at the heart of these communities. The signatures were collected throughout the length and breadth of Argyll and Bute and I pay special tribute to the sub-postmasters and mistresses and all involved, both young and old, who helped collect them. The petition is signed by more than 9,500 of my constituents and I support it. It concludes with the following words:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will do everything possible to impress upon the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry and Social Security the need for an autonomous post office service in the public sector and to abandon plans for the compulsory transfer of social security payments to banks.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

11.43 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The petition that I present is signed by my constituents in Orkney and Shetland, by others in other parts and by constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston). It is in similar terms to those presented by my hon. Friends the Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie).

The signatures have been collected in a relatively short period of time. I echo the thanks to sub-postmasters and mistresses who have helped to collect them.

The Government have said that they will not go down the road of a compulsory transfer to banks, but they still encourage payment of benefit into bank accounts. That could lead to the destruction of the network of sub-post offices throughout the country, which is a valued rural service.

The total number of signatures on the petition, including those of my hon. Friends and myself, amounts to 42,000, which makes the message loud and clear.

Wherefore your petitioners pray

That your honourable House will do everything possible to impress upon the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry and Social Security the need for an autonomous post office service in the public sector and to abandon plans for the compulsory transfer of social security payments to banks.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Defence Industries (Chelmsford)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

11.44 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): My constituents and I are grateful that I have an opportunity to raise an important issue in Chelmsford and in the constituencies of my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) and my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale).

The background to this short debate is somewhat contradictory, because, in the past two months, Chelmsford has benefited from a fall in unemployment, in both the local authority area and the parliamentary constituency, of 551 and 384 people respectively. Unfortunately, however, the good news created by those substantial and consistent falls in unemployment has been lost because of last week's announcement by Marconi Radar that, sadly, it had to make a further 300 people in Chelmsford redundant.

We have paid a heavy price for the peace dividend and a more peaceful world. It is ironic that those who are most critical of defence-related redundancies advocate even more defence cuts. The Labour party has consistently voted for a 27 per cent.—£6 billion—cut in the defence budget. The Liberal Democrats would like to see defence spending cut by 50 per cent.—half the defence budget—over the next seven years. Both policies would have an even more traumatic effect on defence industries in my constituency.

To understand the impact of the redundancies in defence-related industries in Chelmsford in the past 12 to 18 months, it would be sensible to put into context the history of the manufacturing base in the town. Chelmsford has always been associated with the Marconi companies, and many people in Chelmsford consider them to be synonymous. Twenty years ago, the Marconi companies and English Electric Valve were the town's major employers, providing jobs for 11,000 people with thousands of back-up jobs reliant on their success.

The 1989 census of employment shows that three quarters of Chelmsford's manufacturing jobs were in the standard industrial classification group 3, which includes engineering and vehicles. Employment in that group was dominated by the GEC companies: Marconi Communications; Marconi Radar; and English Electric Valve.

In the past 18 months, there has been an all too dismal repetition of job losses in those companies. In January 1992, 150 jobs were lost at Marconi Communications; in March 1992, 140 jobs were lost at Marconi Phone; in June 1992, 600 jobs were lost at Marconi Radar when it moved its manufacturing to Leicester; in June 1992, 225 jobs were lost at Marconi Communications; in September 1992, a further 300 jobs were lost at Marconi Communications; in February 1993, 95 jobs were lost at English Electric Valve; and now 300 jobs have been lost at Marconi Radar.

Almost 2,000 jobs have been lost in a relatively short time. I do not need to remind the House of the misery that that causes to the men and families directly involved, to the companies, which do not enjoy making people redundant, and to the town because of the knock-on effect those redundancies have on suppliers, back-up staff, shops and the area's commercial life.

[Mr. Simon Burns]

The men who have been made redundant are highly trained and desperate to be in work, contributing to our nation's manufacturing base and using their skills to the utmost degree.

There are two reasons for that dismal catalogue of redundancies. First, the ending of the cold war and the subsequent peace dividend, coming as they did so swiftly and unexpectedly with the crumbling of the Berlin wall and the iron curtain, have meant that we live in a relatively more peaceful world. Consequently, the Government have rightly had to reassess the defence requirement of this country.

Secondly, we as a nation have an excellent record in defence industry exports, but the peace dividend has coincided with a worldwide recession, which has meant that the market for defence equipment and communications worldwide has contracted, and that the competition has intensified. As part of the need to remain competitive or lose out even more, the Marconi companies have had to take drastic action.

What of the future? I have a number of suggestions, which I am pleased to make, to help to alleviate the short-term problems facing my constituents and to try to help to improve long-term prospects for defence-related industries. I welcome the fact the Government have signed up to KONVER, the European Community programme to provide financial assistance to areas suffering from redundancies in defence-related industries.

Chelmsford will compete for that money to help with reskilling and retraining. However, under the EC rules, two thirds of the money is designated on a criterion under which Chelmsford would not usually be able to compete. That is farcical. A recent university of York report for the European Commission on the economic and social impact of reductions in defence spending and military forces on the regions of the Community identifies Essex as the second worst-hit area in the EC.

First, it is imperative that the criterion is changed so that Essex can bid in all the categories of the KONVER funding. I know that work is being done at county level to come up with an excellent idea to use some of that money directly to help over the long term companies facing problems from a contracting defence market.

Secondly, the companies must continue to broaden their base by diversifying into non-military products. The companies have long recognised that, and for a number of years they have been doing all that they can to diversify as quickly as possible. Marconi Communications has had an ambitious programme of diversification for a number of years and has met success in supplying communications equipment to the BBC, to the Independent Broadcasting Authority and to clients worldwide.

Similarly, Marconi Radar and English Electric Valve are channelling their energies into diversifying while recognising that there will still be important defence contracts to be won. It should not be forgotten that the defence market has not disappeared, but has simply been reduced because of changing circumstances.

It is important for diversification that it is remembered that it is a slow process and means either moving into new markets against well-established competition or investing heavily and speculatively in trying to develop niche markets. Neither can be achieved overnight, and it is imperative that, during the period of uncertainty and realignment, the Ministry of Defence and the defence industries work closely together. At the end of the day, their needs are mutual. I am pleased that both the companies and the Ministry recognise that they need to co-operate because of mutual interests and mutual future benefits to both sides.

Thirdly, it is crucial that, whenever feasible, British contracts go to British companies to protect British jobs and British expertise. Once again, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister and his predecessor on ensuring that more than 90 per cent. of our defence contracts go to British companies. That is only right, because we must look after our own, as one can rest assured that no one else will.

In that respect, I make a plea for Marconi Radar with regard to the RAF tactical radar project. It would give a vital opportunity to put the Ministry of Defence seal of approval on an excellent new product with £300 million of export potential, which would protect jobs. It would also provide an opportunity to preserve unique skills and technology in this country. I fully appreciate that my hon. Friend the Minister is not in a position directly to comment on that, but in passing I wanted to make a constituency plea for the contract.

When the Ministry of Defence puts out tenders for contracts, it is important that they be dealt with swiftly —contracts for new products, for repair and maintenance, for spare parts or for updating and uprating equipment and services. I appreciate that this is a difficult area, because the Ministry has a duty to secure value for money for its paymasters, the taxpayers, but any speeding up of the process would help defence industry companies. If anything can be done to expedite the awarding of contracts, that would be warmly welcomed by the industry and by the country at large.

Lastly, it is important that everything possible be done to help redundant people to re-skill and get back into work as soon as humanly possible. All the companies in Chelmsford are continuing to do all they can to relocate workers within the GEC group, but that is difficult in today's economic climate. They are also doing all they can to help with counselling and setting up advice units to help these people over an extremely traumatic—in the short term—time in their lives.

It is extremely heartening to see how the Essex training and enterprise council has moved swiftly to respond by trying to help, and by contacting the companies concerned —in this instance, Marconi Radar in particular—to see what it can do to alleviate the problems in the town. I know that everyone is grateful to the TEC for that response, and to the company for considering proposals put to it by the TEC for joint initiatives to tackle the problem.

We must continue to ensure that all possible help is given to re-employ these people and to protect our manufacturing base, which has thrived for so long in Chelmsford. Above all, it is crucial that these men should not be forgotten. No one in Chelmsford can forget their plight because for too long we have had to live with the problems that they are facing. I certainly cannot forget the trauma through which they are going, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree and my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon cannot forget them either, because their constituents are similarly affected.

It is important that these men appreciate that everyone is on their side, that we are not prepared to forget them, and that we are all prepared to work together for them. We must lobby the Ministry of Defence for contracts, and work with Essex TEC and the companies concerned to put together packages to help with re-skilling. I hope that the Government will do what they can to ensure that the recovery continues at a sustainable pace so as to create demand, especially in non-defence-related industries. When that demand picks up, companies will respond by taking on skilled workers to meet it.

All these factors amount to a package. We must work together to get workers back into manufacturing as quickly as possible, because there is nothing more debilitating or demoralising for people who desperately want to work than to be unable to use their skills owing to what is happening to defence industries and contracts, here and in the rest of the world, because fortunately we now live in a more peaceful environment.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Jonathan Aitken): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) not only on his good fortune in winning the ballot and raising this important subject for debate but on the convincing and compassionate arguments that he marshalled on behalf of his constituency.

My hon. Friend's constituency has had a long association with the defence industry, and particularly with GEC-Marconi and its predecessors. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the way that he has been so consistently energetic and assiduous in promoting the interests of his constituents, particularly in the defence industrial sector. He made a valuable contribution to the major debate that was held in the House in May on the defence industrial base, and he frequently tables parliamentary questions, writes to me and lobbies me and other Ministers in the Ministry of Defence on behalf of his constituents.

In this context, I should also pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) and to my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale), who is here tonight. Many of their constituents also work for GEC-Marconi, and they champion the interests of their constituents. The defence industry workers in that part of Essex are fortunate in having three such doughty fighters for their interests in the House.

The backdrop to, and the reason for, tonight's debate, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford has acknowledged, is the profound recasting of the strategic environment caused by the collapse of the former Soviet Union, and the disappearance of the Warsaw pact. Our recently published defence White Paper, called "Defending the Future", shows in more detail than ever before the way that we have remodelled our forces to take account of those great changes. Immense though the benefits are to our security and economic well-being, those changes are bringing in their wake painful reductions in some parts of the defence industry.

The outcome of the 1992 public expenditure settlement means that, between 1990-91 and 1995-96, the defence budget will reduce by around 12 per cent. in real terms. Sadly, the equipment procurement programme is bound to diminish in absolute terms, even if not proportionately. However, those reductions start from a high base line, and we shall retain a substantial defence equipment programme. As my hon. Friend was good enough to say, it is certainly not disappearing.

It will still include highly sophisticated and technologically innovative equipment, which will sustain many thousands of jobs in the defence industries, as well as permitting our armed forces to receive the best and most up-to-date equipment. If one adds together our British domestic procurement budget, defence export annual sales, and the opportunities that exist for defence industries in market testing, one gets a total defence cake of well over £13 billion. That shows that there is still plenty for the defence companies to go for, despite the downturn.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford was most concerned about the recent job losses at GEC-Marconi. I pay tribute to the company for the way that it has made, and is continuing to make, a major contribution to Britain's defence effort, for which we in the Ministry of Defence have been most grateful. I recognise that in recent years, and for a number of reasons, the level of employment in the company in Chelmsford has fallen considerably. I was sorry to learn of the most recent announcement of job losses by GEC-Marconi Radar and Control Systems.

The company employs 1,400 people in Chelmsford on the design and development of radar equipment, primarily for defence applications. The business in Chelmsford is relocating, partly to new premises elsewhere in Chelmsford and partly to another site. The proposed reduction of 300 jobs is in part because a number of jobs needed to run the old site will no longer be required at the new premises, and partly because the company is also reviewing its structure to reduce operating costs and improve its competitive position.

It is of no comfort to those who have lost their jobs that such restructuring is necessary, and indeed vital, if companies are to survive in the new tighter competitive environment. I understand the deep personal distress that those changes cause to individuals and their families. I thought that my hon. Friend was most eloquent on that point, and I can only add my personal sympathy to what he said.

It is right to emphasise that, in the last five years, my Department has placed a large number of contracts with GEC companies in Chelmsford, 20 of which are each worth over £1 million. The total value of contracts placed with GEC companies in Chelmsford over that period is over £100 million.

Among the substantial contracts carried out for my Department in Chelmsford in recent years have been contracts with GEC-Marconi Communications for the supply of satellite communications equipment, and Triffid Army radio link communications equipment; with English Electric Valves for image intensifier tubes; and with GEC-Marconi Radars and Control Systems for tracker radars for the Sea Wolf missile system. These products make an important contribution to our nation's defence effort.

My hon. Friend referred to two projects in particular. The first of these is the programme for the conversion of type 911 tracker radars. We have surplus type 911 trackers as a result of a cancellation of a previous programme.

[Mr. Jonathan Aitken]

There is an opportunity to use these to meet the requirement for vertical-launch Sea Wolf on type 23 frigates, but they require some conversion work.

Marconi Radar and Control Systems are already involved in supporting the radars used in several Sea Wolf point defence missile systems. Complex negotiations have now been taking place with Marconi for some time. I can assure my hon. Friend that we are pursuing these vigorously, and hope to be in a position to place the contract by October.

The second programme my hon. Friend asked about is the tactical radar replacement programme for the Royal Air Force. The competition for this requirement, for which GEC-Marconi is one of four contenders, is now in progress. Although the order is a comparatively small one by Ministry of Defence standards, we recognise the importance which both the United Kingdom firms bidding for the work attach to winning it.

I know that my hon. Friend will understand that, until the evaluation of the tenders has been completed, it would be inappropriate for me to discuss in detail the merits of any bid across the Floor of the House, but I can assure him that the eloquent points he made will be taken into account in the final decision, which we hope to be able to announce by the end of next month.

I hope that these indications of contract announcement dates will be helpful to my hon. Friend and to all who work at GEC-Marconi.

My hon. Friend referred to a study published by the European Commission which showed Essex as an area of the Community with the second highest dependency on employment in the defence industries. This study was based on work carried out by the centre for defence economics at the university of York. There is no doubt that a substantial proportion of industrial concerns in the county are defence-related, but I have to say that we are not entirely convinced that the comparisons in that study between regions in different member states have been done on a like-for-like basis.

This is not just an academic point, as the study's assessments of overall defence dependency have been used by the commission as the basis for allocating funds under the KONVER programme, to which my hon. Friend referred tonight, and also in his speech in the industrial base debate in May. The KONVER programme is a matter for which the Department of Trade and Industry is primarily responsible.

As my hon. Friend knows, the Government have some strong reservations about such schemes, because they represent a partial approach to industrial adjustment. We have also taken issue with the basis of allocation of funds between member states. But, having entered these caveats and reservations, the Government intend to take advantage of the scheme in order to help constituencies such as my hon. Friend's. I take on board his point that the criteria need to be changed, and will bring that argument to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry.

I was glad to hear my hon. Friend speak of the success of GEC-Marconi in diversification matters, and in particular its sales to the BBC and to other institutions and companies in the export field. We are delighted when defence companies diversify into new markets, and it makes good sense for many companies to do so.

But it is important to say yet again that it is not for the Government to direct companies to diversify. Our interest is in seeing a profitable and competitive defence industry. It is for companies to decide how best they can be profitable and competitive—and if that means diversifying, so be it. I am glad to hear that GEC-Marconi has done so well without any intervention or orders from Government.

I know that my hon. Friend shares my lack of enthusiasm for a defence conversion agency—a distaste which I feel on grounds of both principle and practice. I will not here rehearse the familiar arguments why this is really another socialist interventionist scheme dressed up in new clothing. I think that we all agree that the Government should give what useful advice and help they can, without in any way being an interventionist Government with taxpayers' money.

The Department of Trade and Industry's recent publication "Changing Tack" provides step-by-step advice for defence companies wishing to diversify, backed by the expertise of professional management consultants Touche Ross. In that way, we assist and encourage management flair, rather than stifling it with regulations, bureaucracy or ill-targeted subsidies paid for by the taxpayer.

I was grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing out that British defence contracts support British jobs and expertise in some 90 per cent. of cases in which we award contracts. We believe in fair and open competition, but the fact that more than 90 per cent. of our contracts go to British firms shows where our heart lies. We do not wish to neglect the importance of Britain's home-grown defence industries.

Let me say a little about our relations with industry generally. It is important that my Department and the defence industry work together closely. We do not believe that relations are in any way unhappy at present; indeed, I was pleased to note that the defence manufacturers gave a cautious welcome to the announcements in the recent White Paper.

I acknowledge that, two or three years ago, there was a feeling—born of the uncertainty of the time—that, during the period of deliberation on "Options for Change", the Department was not as open with industry as it might have been; but I think that my right hon. and hon. Friends who have held ministerial office experienced difficulties at that time. They had to formulate defence-policy parameters and set the priorities—duties which, possibly, are for Government alone.

Once decisions were made, however, we made strenuous efforts to provide industry with all the information necessary to enable it to make sound commercial judgments. Our aim was, and is, to enable companies to remain competitive and successful in both domestic and overseas defence markets. The GEC group as a whole, and GEC-Marconi in particular, have certainly done that.

We are trying to provide the defence industries with as much knowledge of our requirements as possible. There has always been a significant flow of information from the Ministry of Defence to companies right across the spectrum from top-level committees such as the National Defence Industries Council and the Chief of Defence

Procurement's regular meetings with the trade associations, down to the informal contacts between individual companies and MOD officials. The work that hon. Members such as my hon. Friend can do in strengthening that bridge of information and understanding is considerable.

We are doing all that we can to provide defence companies with more and more information. We shall soon publish a comprehensive list of endorsed staff targets and staff requirements, which we shall update annually. Those documents are the driving force for procurement action on all projects in which we expect to spend at least £5 million on development or £10 million on production. We hope that the publication of that comprehensive list will be helpful to all actual and potential defence contractors, including GEC-Marconi.

The process of managing the defence budget is dynamic. Inevitably, we must make painful adjustments to certain programmes from time to time, because of the changing international strategic situation, to which my hon. Friend referred. We shall continue to fine-tune the programmes, but I think that industry understands the difficulties created by the changes in the world security environment. Although there are bound to be tensions and problems, I think that on the whole there is an amicable and constructive dialogue between my Department and industry.

I feel that, in general terms, we should welcome the more stable international situation that now exists. Of course there are still some trouble spots in the world, such as the former Yugoslavia; nevertheless, we have been able to shift some of our national resources away from defence. I recognise that that is only a modest comfort to those who work in the defence industry, and I sympathise greatly with the plight of the workers in Chelmsford described so eloquently by my hon. Friend. Sadly, it is a fact of life that there will be fewer MOD orders in the future than in the past; that is why companies such as GEC-Marconi are having to adapt accordingly.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fourteen minutes past Twelve midnight.

House of Commons

Friday 16 July 1993

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Police

9.34 am

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): I beg leave to present a petition that has been collected by Elizabeth Mary Lambert, a redoubtable lady of the constituency of Chesham and Amersham. She and nearly 3,000 petititoners wish to give more support to local police forces in relation to criminal damage to private and public property. They are appalled by decisions of the Crown Prosecution Service and believe that decisions not to prosecute are demoralising to the police. They want us to give more support to the police throughout the country.

The petition ends:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House will take the aforementioned into consideration.

To lie upon the Table.

Social Security Fraud

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

9.35 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt): I am pleased to introduce this debate. My first task is to give the apology of the Liberal Democrat spokesman on social security, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), who told me last night that he would be unable to attend this morning. As we know, we arrange our business only a few days in advance, whereas sometimes business for other parties is arrranged much further in advance, and that is why the hon. Gentleman cannot be here this morning. I know of his interest in this subject, so I thought it best to record his apology. He has also taken the trouble to speak to the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley).

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): In the context of that apology, perhaps my hon. Friend could place on record the Liberal Democrats who have attended today in their leader's absence?

Mr. Burt: During the morning, we shall see whether any Liberal Democrats attend. My hon. Friend makes a valid point and during the day we will see whether any hon. Members travel the Liberal Democrat Benches.

It is a year almost to the day since the House had an opportunity to debate the important subject of social security fraud. On that occasion, at a considerably less civilised time of the day, my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) secured an Adjournment debate to which my hon. Friend who is now the Under-Secretary of State for Employment responded.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary asks and receives no quarter. She brings a vim and vigour to the Dispatch Box which she displayed to the full in those debates. Indeed, a debate between her and my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield on the subject of fraud and social security abuse could sell more tickets than a gala night for "Jurassic Park". She takes that spirit to her new Department, and all her colleagues in the Department of Social Security wish her well in her new appointment.

Since the previous debate, the subject of social security has rarely been out of the public eye. Many facets of the benefit system are currently being subjected to scrutiny and welcomed public discussion. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has made it one of our priorities to bear down on fraud and abuse in social security, as every penny misappropriated means less for those in real need.

Today, the House has an opportunity to hear about the prevention, detection and deterrence measures that we are taking to tackle fraud and abuse in the system, and I propose to make that the focus of my remarks today.

The sheer scale of spending on social security means that it is in everyone's interest to maintain and preserve the integrity of the system. This year, spending on social security will be in the region of £80 billion—a massive amount by any standards, amounting to nearly a third of general Government expenditure and over 12 per cent. of the country's gross domestic product. To the taxpayer, that represents an enormous financial commitment—about £13 for each working person every working day.

[Mr. Burt]

Without doubt, the vast majority of people claiming benefits are fully entitled to them. Social security exists to help those who genuinely need it, which is why we spend over £15 million a year on publicity to ensure that people have the information they need to enable them to claim what they are entitled to.

Regrettably, however, there are some people whose behaviour and actions bring the social security system into disrepute. They are cheats, pure and simple, whose exploitation of the system is costing the taxpayer dear; cheats because they effectively deprive the needy and vulnerable by claiming money from the public purse to which they are not entitled; and cheats are disliked by all fair-minded people in society.

Let us be quite clear about it; social security fraud is a crime—and a very selfish one at that, since every pound claimed fraudulently is a pound less available to people who are genuinely in need. It has been estimated that social security fraud could amount to more than £1 billion a year —in other words, the fraudsters are costing at least £1 a week for every working person in this country.

When people go down to the pub tonight, or visit the supermarket at the weekend, they should look at the prices and think about the extra pound that they could have had in their pocket. That pound has been taken from them by someone who has cheated.

No responsible Government can ignore fraud and abuse on such a scale. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has placed his commitment to bear down on fraud and abuse alongside our other priorities of making sure that help is focused on those genuinely in need. I stress that that commitment on fraud and abuse is made alongside our other priorities on behalf of the needy and the vulnerable in the system.

We have taken a number of measures to ensure that benefits are more effectively focused on people in need. For example, the Employment Service, which administers benefits paid to unemployed people, has in place procedures to test that those signing as unemployed are available for work and, moreover, are actively seeking it. Only this week, we have tightened up the income support rules that apply to people who come into this country from non-European Community member states so that they no longer have entitlement to benefit.

Our intention is to make sure that those people who are entitled to help get what they are entitled to—no more, no less. My essential message for the House is this: those who deal with us honestly and who are in genuine need have nothing to fear; but those who try to cheat the system will be caught, made to repay and could end up in court and earn a criminal record for themselves.

I recognise, of course, that the battle against fraud must be tackled on a number of fronts. On the one hand, there are claims that are fraudulent—either from the outset, or arising from a failure to disclose a material change in circumstances. Some people deliberately set out to defraud the system in this way; there is a worrying element in the criminal fraternity that has developed rackets involving multiple claims and false identities.

Others, however, seemingly drift into fraud—perhaps even unwittingly at first—for example, by simply forgetting to report a change in circumstances. But later, when they reflect on the cost of rectifying what started as a small lie, they turn a blind eye and perpetuate the falsehood, and, before they know it, a substantial overpayment has arisen. The boundary between forgetfulness and fraud has then been crossed.

Another area of fraudulent activity relates to the misuse of order books. To put this in context, in 1991-92 some £230 million worth of social security order books were recorded as lost or stolen, and 35 per cent. of those, worth approximately £85 million, were shown to be fraudulently encashed. A further £16 million was lost through fraudulent encashment of girocheques. Against that backdrop, it must therefore be right for the Government to take measures, first, to prevent fraud occurring, secondly, to detect fraudulent activity and thirdly, to deter would-be fraudsters from committing fraud.

In short, we are minimising the opportunities for fraud; we root out fraud when it occurs, we stop it from continuing and we recover amounts overpaid and prosecute offenders when appropriate.

Prevention is therefore at the heart of our anti-fraud effort. The social security system has always incorporated internal security and management checks—they are essential to prevent both internal and external abuse—but we owe it to the taxpayer to keep a tight system of validation and verification checks in operation to prevent abuse. We are constantly looking at ways in which to make those more effective through comprehensive assurance checks and an audit trail analysis to help us identify inconsistent or dubious pieces of information.

In this respect, technology plays a crucial role. The DSS and its agencies have been developing comprehensive and ambitious plans for fraud-resistant computer systems. We have already installed new computers to help fraud managers to identify patterns of crime, monitor performance and deploy resources in the most effective manner.

We are not only tightening up systems within the DSS. In recent months, significant progress has been made in combating order book and girocheque fraud through close co-operation and joint working with the Post Office—yet more proof, if it were needed, of the importance of the Post Office to the DSS.

A whole variety of improvements are now beginning to emerge, including, first, new, clearer guidance to Post Office counter clerks to help them spot various types of fraud which can occur—for example, bogus payees or manipulated and counterfeited payments. Secondly, an illustrated anti-fraud handbook has been produced for counter clerks called "Foil Fraud", which has been reinforced by a series of articles in Post Office Counters' internal magazine. Thirdly, the DSS and the Post Office have ensured more secure delivery of order books, safer storage and tighter control of order books once delivered. Fourthly, methods have been introduced to prevent encashment of order books reported missing.

That last intitiative is known to us as the ALERT project. It is particularly exciting, since it involves the use of new technology and the reading of bar codes printed on order books. Trials in the London area have already shown some impressive results, and an extension of the project is planned for the autumn.

The House will also know that we have been encouraging people to opt for automated credit transfer, ACT, because it is a safer, more cost-effective means of making benefit payments, and is far less prone to fraud and abuse than order books or girocheques. Hon.

Members on both sides of the House have recently made clear the importance they attach to preserving choice in the method of payment, and we have reaffirmed our commitment, as I did today, to maintaining a network of post offices. But the fact remains that ACT is less susceptible to fraud, and our policy will continue to be to encourage people to opt for it.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): When we debated ACT, there was some confusion about the financial implications for the Post Office of a large-scale move to that method of payment. Can the Minister give a further guarantee that, should that happen, no post office will be financially disadvantaged to the point where the savings the Government may make on ACT will mean that the post office network is no longer financially viable? Can he guarantee that the financial consequences of that policy change will not lead to the closure of post offices?

Mr. Burt: I am quite assured that the DSS's encouragement of people to opt for ACT is not a threat to post offices. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the financing of post offices is a complex matter, involving contracts with other Departments. We need a network of post offices, because they help us in so many ways to deliver benefits. We therefore believe that ACT, on its own, will not harm the post offices. I assure the hon. Gentleman that that is not the intention of the DSS.

Mr. John Sykes (Scarborough): Does my hon. Friend accept that Opposition Members—there is only one here—are aware that people who want to opt for ACT can do so of their own accord? No Government on earth can force them to do so. The Opposition have whipped up a campaign of hysteria.

Mr. Burt: My hon. Friend is right. It is a great shame that, all too often, policy ideas with many good intentions behind them can be unhappily distorted for purely party political ends by the Opposition. As a result, people are genuinely scared about matters that pose no threat to them. It is essential that we put our commitment on record. My hon. Friend is right that it is a great shame when those who should be more responsible fail to act in that manner.

As my hon. Friend has said, people will still have the option to receive payment at the post office and, for those who choose to be paid by order book, we are introducing this month a new design of order book, which contains a number of new security features. It will make illicit copying more difficult, with more secure watermarking and a variety of other complex design features aimed at decreasing the incidence of fraud and abuse.

The old order book had remained unchanged for many years. With new, modern printing technology, it is now easier for us to produce an order book. In addition to security arrangements, the new order book will combine a more user-friendly, easier-to-read format, which represents a significant step forward in our commitment to the customer, as well as illustrating our determination to prevent abuse and keep ahead of the fraudster. We shall continue to make the best use of design and print technology, introducing—without warning—new, subtle design changes from time to time to frustrate the efforts of criminals.

Our determination to root out fraud and abuse is perhaps best demonstrated by the sheer scale of the resources that we have dedicated to tackling fraud, the significant savings that they achieve, and examples of the kind of cases that have been identified in recent months.

This year, the Secretary of State has set a target of savings amounting to some £1 billion to be saved through the intervention of fraud teams working in the Benefits Agency and local authority housing benefit and council tax departments.

The Benefits Agency alone employs just over 3,000 highly effective and professional fraud staff. Most are employed in the 168 fraud sector teams, and 250 specialist staff based in London and other major cities are dedicated to the investigation of organised fraud, including cases involving stolen, altered or false proof of identity to make multiple claims; counterfeiting order books and giro-cheques; bulk or systematic theft and the buying or selling of instruments of payment; and pledging order books to moneylenders in exchange for cash loans.

In 1992-93, the organised fraud unit alone made 1,400 arrests and secured £42 million worth of savings.

The House should be under no illusion about the kind of determined fraudster we are up against today. Some are sophisticated, while others are plain brazen. The House will have seen or heard of the results of the operation in south-east London yesterday morning. I am assured by the team involved that it was not staged with a view to helping us out on this debate, but the publicity that it has usefully generated this morning has brought to the public's mind, first, the skill and determination of our fraud teams, to which I pay due tribute, and, secondly, the scale of the problems involved.

I shall give a couple of examples to colour in some of our people's activities. Some investigations start with a tip-off delivered on a scrap of paper. After nine months' investigation, Operation Rolling Stone led to the arrest and conviction of five men who had defrauded the benefit system of more than £500,000. In that case, the suspects were also being investigated by Customs and Excise for their part in a multi-million pound VAT fraud.

The gang used complex anti-surveillance techniques to evade the investigators, frequently changing journey patterns en route to the benefit office. After much painstaking work, our investigators could construct the pattern of the journey and gather crucial evidence of the criminal activities.

Our investigators must sometimes go to great lengths to pursue their quarry. In that case, they had to spend six hours in a seedy pub in a most undesirable area, with just a pint of shandy between them, and even had to join in the dancing. A final irony came when one of the team, sitting observing outside, found two of the offenders coming out of the pub. Unaware of the presence of the investigator's van, they kindly leaned against the vehicle and had a long chat about the identities that they had just used and where they were going next. Walls have ears, and so do vans.

Another case involved following a man who had claimed income support using different identities. His routine was relatively tedious: café for breakfast; benefit office; and finally the pub, where he would fall asleep. On one occasion, he varied the routine to visit the local cinema, where the film "Basic Instinct" was being shown. To maintain surveillance on that occasion turned out to be less onerous for one of our investigators. The fraudster in that case was convicted, and sentenced to four years' imprisonment.

[Mr. Burt]

Another case in south London resulted in 50 minicab drivers being found to be claiming benefit. That operation saved £165,000. One individual was found to be using false documents and identities and an empty property was being used for income support claimants, with a driver travelling more than 200 miles from his home area to work. I sometimes think that if people put as much time and energy into an honest day's work as they do into fraud, they would be pretty effective.

It is not uncommon for our investigators to locate a number of counterfeit order books in premises. A recent case, Operation Hammer, unearthed 90 order books, 450 counterfeit books, credit cards, cash cards, and blank birth certificates. Some £2·4 million was saved in that operation.

Naturally, work extends to co-operation with local authorities over housing benefit fraud. In one case, a claimant and a landlord were found guilty of conspiring to defraud the DSS and a local authority. The prosecution arose as a result of a regular cheque delivery exercise conducted by the local authority's benefits investigations team. From the authority's visit to deliver the benefit cheque, it appeared that the claimant did not live at the address for which he was claiming benefit.

Further investigations by the police showed that the gentleman had a variety of different identities, for which he had housing benefit claims at two different addresses. The police also found a letter from the landlord to the claimant, warning him that local authority staff were hand-delivering girocheques, and that therefore the landlord would be preparing a room for the claimant to show that he had lived at that accommodation. For that conspiracy, the claimant received a sentence of four years and the landlord a sentence of two years.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Is my hon. Friend aware that the crackdown on fraud is happening nationwide? Only this week, 70 police officers were involved in swooping into properties in the Fishergate area of Preston, where more than 34 people were investigated and many were caught defrauding not only the DSS but housing benefit.

Mr. Burt: My hon. Friend makes a good point. All over the country, officers are working in close co-operation with other enforcement agencies like the police and local authorities, to find those who are defrauding the system. I am sure that my hon. Friend would like me to pay tribute to the officers involved in that operation, and to thank them for the savings that they have made on behalf of everyone else.

While discussing detection, I should stress the importance that we place on liaison with both the Employment Service—with whom we have entered into a joint agreement to improve liaison and conducted 200 fraud drives last year—and with local authorities.

That brings me to the much-improved arrangements for local authorities to help them step up their efforts against housing benefit and council tax benefit fraud. My Department already provides, free of charge, fraud training for local authority investigators. From April this year, we have provided fresh financial incentives for authorities to investigate benefit fraud.

Without the intervention of local authority fraud staff, housing benefit and council tax benefit fraud would remain undetected, and payments would continue to be made week after week to people who were not entitled to them. More anti-fraud efforts by authorities will therefore result in significant savings to the public purse, in which local authorities can now share. In addition to housing benefit and council tax benefit savings, authorities will also share in any associated savings in income support which they discover and which result from a successful investigation.

As a further incentive for authorities, full-rate subsidy is now payable on overpayments of benefit which result from fraudulent claims. Authorities will still be able to retain any overpaid amounts they recover. That presents an opportunity for authorities, as well as taxpayers, to benefit from increased efforts against fraud. Authorities stand only to gain. Once they achieve their baselines, there is no limit to the amount of financial benefit that authorities can receive from central Government under those arrangements; the more they save the taxpayer, the more they receive in additional subsidy.

We are also considering further measures that authorities can employ to prevent benefit fraud. For example, my Department has commissioned a study into setting up a central register of housing benefit claimants. The register's purpose is to prevent individual claimants and unscrupulous landlords from making multiple claims to benefit in one or more local authority.

The Government have put in place a package of incentives that has been widely welcomed. I have been much reassured by the spirit of co-operation that prevailed throughout lengthy consultations with the local authority associations on these issues, and I pay tribute to them. We now look to local authority and Benefits Agency fraud staff to work together, making the best use of their resources, to ensure that benefit is paid only to those with a genuine entitlement.

Finally, I should say a few words about what we can do to deter fraud. I have an important message for the fraudster, "Whatever sort of benefit fraud you are engaged in, not only will you get caught, but we shall require you to repay the money, and you could well find yourself in court facing a criminal record."

No one who commits benefit fraud can be sure of getting off without criminal prosecution. Our policy is to select the most appropriate cases for court action, and we have an almost 100 per cent. success rate. More than 5,000 people were prosecuted last year alone.

Increasingly, social security fraud cases attract high-profile publicity, such as we have seen this morning in some of the national newspapers. People are rightly disgusted when they see what cheats get up to, and the sense of moral outrage is understandable, particularly when every pound lost by fraud means a pound less to spend on the needy and vulnerable.

It is right that people should be outraged by social security fraud, so I also have a message for people who know someone else who is committing fraud: "If you know someone who is abusing the system, you are having to foot the bill, not the Chancellor—not me, not my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and not the Government, but you, the ordinary law-abiding citizen of this country." I believe that publicity can act as a powerful deterrent, and I can assure the House that social security cheats will increasingly find themselves under the spotlight.

I thank those national newspapers that take the trouble to expose fraud and which cover—not just the incidents, but the convictions and sentences. In London, the Evening Standard has been running a campaign against housing benefit fraud, and a variety of national newspapers are also doing their best to help in the fight.

Ultimately, the Department of Social Security intends to ensure that, where there is no other means of support, the most vulnerable are protected. To do so, we need the support of the public and the taxpayer for what we do. We owe them a duty to ensure that the provision for others is spent not only wisely and fairly, but honestly. Those who seek to cheat on that support rob not just the Government, but every man and woman in this country—and up with that we will not put.

10.3 am

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): I welcome the Minister's opening speech, and the moderate and generally factual way in which he presented it. As the debate unfolds, I hope that the Jurassic tendency does not creep in, and that we can keep to the facts.

I wish to place on record immediately that the Labour party is as committed as any other party or the Government to rooting out fraud. We certainly support the measures that the Government have announced to ensure that the fraud crackdown continues.

We must place the issue in context, and I can do no better than quote the Secretary of State for Social Security, when he said that most social security claimants were

"as honest as the day is long".—[Official Report, 18 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 9.]

That does not mean that we must not root out fraud. I agree with the Minister that every £1 of fruad means £1 less to spend on genuine claimants in genuine need. We must be sure that all social security money is used for the right purpose.

The Minister briefly outlined some of the measures taken to combat fraud. They include financial incentives to encourage local authorities to fight housing benefit and council tax fraud, the allocation of additional resources to allow the Benefits Agencies to employ more specifically trained investigators and make greater use of information technology to identify fraudulent claimants, and the allocation of additional resources to fight fraud.

This morning, the hon. Gentleman has also outlined some new measures, partly based on the Comptroller and Auditor General's report, on the Government's investigation into combating organised fraud. I am pleased that the Minister has given more details on that measure.

I have a copy of the CAG's report. I found that the first recommendation involved the effective allocation of resources to meet the known fraud risk. The second consisted of four stars, as did the next. The following recommendation involved changing forms and the order books—an issue which the Minister dealt with this morning.

When I looked to see what four stars signified, I found that the information was not available on grounds of confidentiality. We are meant to be enjoying the spirit of open government, but it is fairly difficult for the Opposition to comment on some of the Government's measures, because we do not know what they are. I understand the reason for the confidentiality at one level —clearly, some of the actions must be confidential—but it is difficult to comment on all the work undertaken if some of it is kept secret.

I shall comment on the some of the work already under way and then widen the debate to include the general issues of fraud and the other side of the coin: ensuring that claimants receive the benefits to which they are legitimately entitled. Much work has been undertaken in recent months, particularly by the Benefits Agency working in conjunction with local authorities. It must be stressed that local authorities have been as keen as the Government to crack down on fraud, particularly in respect of housing benefit,and council tax.

Example after example throughout the country has shown that local authorities of whichever political persuasion are attempting to crack down on organised fraud. That fraud is often organised by unscrupulous landlords, who make bogus multiple cliams for housing benefit on behalf of individual tenants who do not exist.

We must praise the Association of London Authorities, which has worked with the London treasurers in establishing a London fraud unit in local government. That fraud team will ensure the sharing of information on fraud across boroughs and assist in preventing and tracking down large-scale fraud operations across London.

The team's activities have obtained some publicity, and I hope that this morning's debate will generate further publicity for its excellent work. I have read the detailed proposals of the work to be carried out by the Association of London Authorities in conjunction with other agencies. I commend its attempts to crack down on fraud across London.

My local authority in Manchester pays £130 million in housing benefit each year. An inquiry in 1991 showed that there was a high level of fraud among local landlords. Now, two fraud investigation teams have been appointed in the audit department specifically to deal with organised fraud involving housing benefit and individual fraud to ensure that loopholes are closed as quickly as possible. I commend local authorities throughout the country for the way in which they are seriously tackling the issue to good effect. Rooting out such fraud is in the best interests of genuine claimants.

There has been a change in the way in which local authority subsidy is arranged. The fact that local authorities received only 25 per cent. of the total cost of the money that they recovered through investigating fraud was unsatisfactory, and we welcome the fact that those authorities are now able to receive all the money obtained. An immense amount of work has been undertaken in recent months on the subject, but there is a feeling that many of the changes are being introduced too fast, without proper guidelines to ensure that the officers are fully briefed on the actions they should take.

The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux questioned the adequacy of training given to fraud officers who, it said,

"often appear to be ignorant of the law and of claimant's rights and appear to be responsible to no one".

There seems to be a lack of accountability in some of the systems set up to undertake interdepartmental agency work. I hope that the Minister will look at some of the guidelines to ensure that adequate training is provided.

There is a feeling that the recovery targets set for local authorities are unrealistically high. I know that there is a lower level and a higher level, but my investigations across the country convince me that many local authorities find it extremely difficult to hit even the lower targets—not because of a lack of will to undertake the work, but from a feeling that the Government have set the targets unrealistically high. They should be reconsidered, to ensure that local authorities are given a realistic incentive to investigate fraud.

I make this point because local authorities have to allocate dedicated staff to undertake the investigations. Because of the tight budgets under which they operate, they want to be sure that the training and transfer of staff for fraud work will be cost effective. They must therefore be given, as promised, proper incentives by the Government to hit their targets by investing money in such work and getting it back when they actually hit the targets.

The fact that the Government, I understand, are looking again at the shape of the incentives regime is being viewed with some cynicism. I hope that the Minister will confirm today that there will be no negative change, and that local authorities will not be penalised for pursuing fraud. Local authorities must be able to gain benefits from investigations of this nature.

The Minister commented on the targets for fraud savings that the Government are setting in the social security budget. The Secretary of State has clearly said that he hopes to save £1 billion in the financial year by cracking down on social security fraud. The Employment Service has a separate target: 63,000 claims withdrawn following investigation.

That is a great hike compared with savings from previous years. In 1986-87, the target was £144 million, in 1990-91, it was £332 million, and in 1991-92, it was £433·7 million. So the target has been doubled in one year. We should continually bear in mind the fact that, in the context of the overall budget, even £1 billion is not a large amount. The overwhelming majority of claimants are honest and receive their just entitlement to benefit, as I have already said. In terms of overall expenditure on benefits, £1 billion is barely more than 1 per cent.—a tiny figure.

Clearly, every pound has to be used effectively—we do not deviate from that position—but let us always remember the context so that we do not get things out of proportion. In any case, Government targets do not always have to do with real money. Rule changes in 1989 expanded the number of items that can be counted as fraud savings.

In particular, the new rules included irregularities, not necessarily proven fraud, and they provided for notional savings from cases where an investigation might have found an irregularity without recouping any cash. Moreover, the figures are arrived at by multiplying recorded fraudulent claims savings, real or notional, by a factor of 32, based on the belief that, if a fraud had not been discovered, it would have taken at least 32 weeks before it was later discovered.

Thus, many target figures are only notional, not hard cash savings. They are extrapolations which the Government use to arrive at their £1 billion-worth of savings.

There is some danger of overstating the amount of fraud in the system. The Benefits Agency admits that it has no way of determining the true level of fraud:

"There is no fraud targeting of specific groups of people whether by race, region or national origin or by social status."

The agency emphasises:

"We do not keep statistics on benefit fraud broken down by nationality or by immigration status, including asylum seekers."

It therefore seemed a little strange that the Secretary of State should say in Brighton last year:

"We have tightened up on bogus asylum seekers. Already nearly 20,000 have evaporated into thin air."

We are not arguing that bogus asylum seekers or people claiming social security benefits illegally should not be clamped down on; but I hope that, when the Government give statements to the press or the House, they will talk about actual figures and cases, and not make generalised statements that can be misconstrued. The problem, after all, is small.

I hope that we will remain cautious and not use emotive language when dealing with cases of fraud. Quite a number of welfare rights groups have expressed their concern about the treatment of certain groups who appear to be subject to special scrutiny and unreasonable testing, in the form of DSS identity checks in local offices.

I want absolute assurances from the Minister that fraud will be dealt with case by case, not by lumping together groups of people and making assumptions about whether they are more likely than others to put in fraudulent claims. We must ensure that investigations are done sensitively by well trained officers—and case by case, not judging by people's circumstances or status, be they homeless, young or any other type that the Government may want to pursue.

Mr. Nicholls: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that welfare rights organisations themselves should perhaps come out and make the point that it is no part of their remit to make light of fraud? Given the consensus between us on this occasion, it might considerably help the public debate if they made the point clearly that fraud is unacceptable, and if they urged their members and those whom they look after to co-operate as fully as they can in stamping it out.

Mr. Bradley: I am not aware of any welfare rights organisation that has publicly condoned fraud or that has not undertaken its duties with the highest professional competence. These organisations ensure that they do not assist bogus claims, and they carry out crucial work to make certain that everyone entitled to benefit receives the benefit for which he has sought assistance. These organisations also ensure that all the benefits to which people may be entitled are properly administered on their behalf.

As I have said, we must be careful not to be emotive or to generalise. I hope that we will not fall into the trap to which the Minister alluded—in previous debates some of those who have spoken have done no credit to themselves. They did not further the cause of ensuring that the debate is taken seriously.

The Secretary of State's speech at last year's Tory party conference had more to do with rallying his supporters and perhaps strengthening his position in the Cabinet than addressing the issue of fraud. [Interruption.] I shall take that as a sedentary comment. Would the Government Whip like to intervene?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. We will obey the rules here.

Mr. Burt: The hon. Gentleman spoke about conduct in debates. My hon. Friends can speak for themselves, but I can say that no Minister has ever done anything less than full credit to himself in fraud debates. It is the Government's duty to make it plain to the House and the country how we feel about fraud. It is entirely right for us to express our views on fraud in strong terms.

Mr. Bradley: I shall leave others to judge the intemperate nature of those debates by reading them.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Fraud is obviously wrong, but does my hon. Friend agree that it would be useful to have in Government time a debate on tax evasion in the City of London, and major fraud by major companies?

Mr. Bradley: My hon. Friend anticipates the next part of my speech. It is important to adopt an even-handed approach to fraud, and to examine it from all sides. To get a proper perspective, we must examine some high-profile fraud cases, expecially those involving tax evasion.

The Minister waved today's editions of the papers. By chance, I looked at yesterday's Evening Standard which states:

"Whitehall caterers cooked the books in £1 million fiddle."

We cannot look at social security or local government fraud without looking at fraud in Government, industry and private enterprise. High-profile trials have included Guinness, Blue Arrow and Maxwell. Those and many others have cost taxpayers billions of pounds.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members that, although it is perfectly in order to make a passing reference to issues that may appear to be germane, the debate must centre on social security fraud.

Mr. Bradley: I accept your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I wonder how many people who have been convicted of tax evasion and fraud are now on social security. According to the Government's estimate, tax evasion costs the taxpayer up to £4 billion a year. That places in context the Government's £1 billion target for social security fraud. That is a passing reference, and I shall say no more on the matter.

Mr. Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that in many cases involving tax fraud and companies going bankrupt in rather, shall we say, curious circumstances, there is often a great loss to the national insurance fund? That hits people who contribute to that fund, and it is important that that aspect of company and City fraud should be followed up as assiduously as any other kind.

Mr. Bradley: My hon. Friend is right. We are debating the loss of taxpayers' money that could be used for other purposes, and especially to help those in the greatest need. Any loss of revenue disadvantages the country generally. We should clamp down on tax fraud and general fraud wherever it appears.

Mr. Nicholls: Crime is indivisible, and should be punished. Why does the hon. Gentleman seek to distinguish between the two types of fraud? Is he afraid of the tendencies of his hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn)?

Mr. Bradley: The hon. Gentleman was clearly not listening. I have made quite the opposite point—that the issues are not separate, and that we should look at the total loss of revenue. We should be even-handed in stamping out social security fraud or fraud in any other aspect of public or private life.

The debate has concentrated on organised fraud, which is the cause of most of the abuse. As the Minister rightly said, individual abuses often occur because of ignorance or mistakes in filling out forms. Only a small part of the saving of £433·7 million was due to the recovery of payments made as a result of error rather than overpayment as a result of fraud. I appreciate that when a claimant realises that he has made an error, it has to be rectified immediately. However, social security officers have a duty to give claimants the maximum help to ensure that they claim correctly.

Some valuable work has been undertaken to simplify claims forms, but more needs to be done, because, for many people, the forms are complex. Staff training, and officers who are sensitive in their dealings with claimants, will help to ensure that claimants do not encounter difficulties in filling in the forms.

I am sure that many hon. Members have taken up cases on behalf of constituents and, on making representations to social security officers, have found that mistakes in administering the forms have caused the difficulties. Money is repaid to the claimants, but we must ensure that claimants' errors that can be built into fraud statistics are balanced by statistics on administrative errors. That will ensure that benefits are properly calculated, and that people receive them when they need them rather than at some later stage.

The other side of the clampdown on fraud is an assurance that people will receive the benefits to which they are entitled. A high take-up is essential to ensure that the poorest in our society receive the meagre income to which they are entitled through the benefits system. In the wider context of the public expenditure debates, it is worrying that, in the Financial Times this week, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is quoted as saying:

"The reason why public spending is rising remorselessly is . . . partly the increasing take-up of benefits. The latter factor was a desirable thing but had to be re-examined in the light of public borrowing".

I should like an assurance from the Minister that there is no intention to "re-examine" the take-up of benefits, or to limit take-up by people legitimately entitled to them. It would be scandalous if it were to be looked at in that context. His words may have been truncated, but what he said was clear. We have to ensure that everyone receives their just entitlement from the benefits system.

The latest Government figures show that, in 1988-89, some £1·6 billion of benefit money went unclaimed. Figures compiled by the DSS and International Social Service for the main means-tested benefit show that a quarter of people entitled to income support do not claim that entitlement.

Over 30 per cent. of people entitled to housing benefit do not claim it, and approximately 50 per cent. of those entitled to family credit do not claim it. Take-up of family credit is now higher, at 64 per cent., as shown by a report from the Policy Studies Institute for 1991. Even so, many families are not claiming the benefit that the Government see as the crucial one to protect and support families in work.

Mr. Nigel Evans: While I accept that those who are entitled to benefit ought to receive it, the counter-argument is obviously true: those who are not entitled to benefit should not get it. That is the main thrust of our debate. Is not the hon. Gentleman's problem with the debate the comments of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) last year in the Daily Express? He said:

"Labour has been linked to freeloaders for too long. I was brought up on a council estate and know ordinary folk expect rewards for hard work. They have no time for people who lie in bed when they are fit and able to get a job."

What is the hon. Gentleman's view of that?

Mr. Bradley: I have made the Labour party's position clear, and it does the hon. Gentleman no credit to undervalue the need to ensure that people who are justly entitled to benefits receive them. The figures that I have quoted clearly show that there is a vast amount of under-claiming of benefits.

Mr. Corbyn: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Bradley: No, I will not give way at the moment, as I must continue with my speech. I hope that the Government——

Mr. Nicholls: We want Jeremy.

Mr. Bradley: I am sure that my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) will be able to make some salient points later. I am representing a vast number of Members of Parliament here this morning, and my hon. Friend will be helping me considerably.

I seek from the Minister an assurance that the publicity campaign to ensure that people receive their entitlements is not undermined by the need to reduce public expenditure. As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North has already mentioned them, perhaps now is the time to pay tribute to the work that welfare rights officers undertake throughout the country, not only with individual claimants but in taking up campaigns on benefits to ensure that all those in their locality are receiving the benefits to which they are entitled.

I am anxious that, through the multi-agency approach adopted with the clampdown on fraud, more work should be undertaken to ensure that there can be a one-stop method of claiming benefits. More resources must be put into computerisation of benefit records so that, when claimants arrive at one agency to claim a certain benefit, there is an automatic link-up with records from other departments and other agencies to ensure that they are quickly alerted to the fact that they may be entitled to other benefits.

The link between local authorities and the DSS is important in that process, but I know that local authorities would like more resources to develop internal computer systems—so that, for example, when individuals claim housing benefit, they are immediately alerted through the computer link-up to other local authority benefits to which they may be entitled, such as free school meals. That ensures that claimants do not have to trawl around different departments in the local authority to make different assessments and different claims to ensure that they are getting their entitlements.

More work needs to be done on such systems, and I hope that the Government will look at that with a view to putting additional resources into that aspect of local authority and other agency work, so as to simplify the system and ensure that people do not lose out on their benefits. The take-up of benefits is not satisfactory, and we must ensure that people receive their just benefits.

Another benefit that is not being properly considered by the Government is the social fund. The annual report of the social fund came out only last week, and it is a great sadness to millions that the Government have refused to reform it, despite many reports, such as that in March by the Social Security Advisory Committee describing it as "an appalling lottery".

Because of cash limits, even if a cause is judged deserving, a person may be refused help if the budget has been spent. The problem with the social fund has always been that the time of year when one walked through the door influenced whether one received help from it.

Many cases involve two people in identical circumstances, one of whom makes a claim from the social fund on 1 April, at the beginning of the year, and the other who claims later in the year, say in January or February. Because of the cash-limited nature of the social fund, the latter claimant does not receive money from the fund, because all the money has been spent. It is unfortunate, to say the least, that the Government have not recognised the vast amount of research and work on the social fund that shows the faults in it, and that they have refused to accept those criticisms.

Richard Berthoud of the PSI calculates that the social fund distributes half as much——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman continues—perhaps he knows what I am about to say—I should say that it seems to me that the point that he is making is the reverse of fraud. The burden of his argument is that entitlements are not being dealt with. I hope that he will not pursue that any longer, because it is not strictly germane to the debate.

Mr. Bradley: I understand whay you are saying, Madam Deputy Speaker. I can only say that many of my constituents who have been to see me over lack of access to the social fund have said that they feel that it is fraudulent that they have not been able to receive help from the social fund. Within that broad context of fraud, I am discussing the inadequacies of the social fund. The Secretary of State said in the annual report on the fund that, in 1992-93, 45,491 people were refused a loan to buy essentials or were too poor or in debt to repay the loan. That does not bolster confidence in the social security review.

I accept that that may be slightly wide of the mark of the debate, but I hope that the Minister will urge the Secretary of State to look again at the organisation and administration of the social fund. It is a sad commentary that people are too poor to receive the help they so desperately need from the one source of money that may be available to them. Although they have to pay that money back, it is the only way that many people with short-term problems can gain access to funds over and above the meagre level of income support.

On top of that, the other sector where claimants feel that they may have been fraudulently dealt with is within the stiffer targets that have been introduced this year to reduce the number of people getting unemployment benefit.

The Department of Employment said that 9 per cent. of initial claims should not be pursued by civil servants——

Lady Olga Maitland: (Sutton and Cheam): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is not the hon. Gentleman's speech far wide of the subject of social security fraud? Should we not now return to the main point?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Lady can safely leave that matter in my hands.

Mr. Bradley: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I shall be brief on that point.

We must ensure that, in the pressure to root out fraud, we do not also root out genuine claims, whether for unemployment benefit, social fund payments or any other benefit.

One worrying aspect of the changes in working practices within the social security benefit offices is the move to market testing. The social security fraud division of the Benefits Agency is a candidate for privatisation next year under the Government's market testing programme. During the feasibility studies, staff of the Benefits Agency expressed the fear that without direct accountability within the agency, there could be blackmail and abuse.

One study actually stated:

"The scope for abuse of this type of information is enormous and must be regarded as a very high risk area in the context of market testing."

I put that on the record so that the Minister can respond to it this morning and assure us about the way in which market testing and privatisation of the benefits system will be organised, especially in the most sensitive area of a crackdown on fraud.

I have made absolutely clear—and put clearly on the record—the Labour party's commitment vigorously to pursue fraud, not only in the social security system but wherever it may occur, and especially tax evasion. At all times, we must deal with the other side of the coin and be equally committed to ensuring that everyone receives his just entitlement under the benefits system. The system is complicated and complex, and a minefield for many individuals seeking help.

We must ensure—through the resources that we put into the system, the training of staff, the way that claim forms are considered and efficient administration—that each claim is dealt with carefully. The purpose of the staff must always be, as I am sure it is, that each individual receives the benefit to which he is entitled.

It is a worrying time to read in the public expenditure review the statement that I have already mentioned. We must not place the burden of that statement on the poor who are desperately trying to make ends meet through an inadequate system.

I repeat that the Labour party's commitment is to stamp our fraud, but it is also to ensure that each individual receives the entitlement that he so justly deserves.

Mr. Vivian Bendall (Ilford, North): I want to discuss two aspects of social security fraud—first, in the minicab sector and, secondly, in housing benefit. I must first declare an interest as I represent the Licensed Taxi Drivers Association. That interest is recorded in the Register of Members' Interests.

A great deal of information has been collated by the association. It wrote to the Employment Service inspectorate setting out evidence given to the Public Accounts Committee. I want to draw the attention of the House to some of the facts and figures of cases analysed by the association. The first case, code name Operation Met 999 Special, occurred in 1991. Officers from the Metropolitan police and inspectors from the social security fraud squad interviewed 159 minicab drivers at Heathrow airport, of whom 62 were found to be claiming unemployment benefit. The result of that investigation was a benefit saving of £73,018.

The second case, Operation Icarus, also involved Heathrow. In July 1992, 150 minicab drivers were questioned, of whom 107 were found to be fraudulently claiming income support. There was a resultant benefit saving of £161,357. In April 1993, Operation Achilles—again at Heathrow—was run over three days. Of the 150 minicab drivers questioned, 50 were found to be claiming unemployment benefit. There was a saving of £45,000. More recently, on 25 June and 1 July, during an operation in London's west end, 89 minicab drivers were questioned of whom 26—30 per cent.—were found to be claiming unemployment benefit.

The Government estimate that there are 38,000 to 40,000 minicabs in the London area. Taking the first three cases, a total of 459 drivers—1/87th of the London total—were questioned, with a total benefit saving of £279,000. If the figures are representative of fraud within the minicab sector, £24 million in benefit payments could be saved. That is not an inconsiderable sum. Of course, fraud does not stop at London—it is occurring in many cities, such as Glasgow, Cardiff and Leeds. It does not need much imagination to realise that an enormous amount of money is being fraudulently claimed by minicab drivers.

I have been carrying out some investigations with the help of the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. Although it has not been stated, it appears to me that not enough money is being made available for the number of investigations required. Strangely enough, at this very moment a major operation is under way at Heathrow involving the Metropolitan police and social security fraud inspectors. However, the operation is time constrained because of financial restrictions.
